April 27. "Il Barbière di Siviglia." Produced to exhibit the versatility of Fornasari, whose Figaro was entitled to at least the merit of a new and original treatment. The divertissement of "Les Houris," in which Dumilâtre, Camille, Planquet, Scheffre, and M. St. Leon were "things like air so bodiless they seem'd!"

May 5. "Il Don Giovanni." Fornasari as the Spanish libertine for the first time, we believe, and admirable. The rest of the characters, particularly Persiani's Zerlina, absolute perfection. Mem., Mario is the best Ottavio we have ever heard.

May 11. "La Gazza Ladra." Another triumph for Fornasari, whose forte is the dignified and pathetic. Grisi most admirable as Ninetta, and Brambilla interesting as Pippo. We must not forget to mention the great Lablache as the Podesta. "None but himself can be his parallel!"

May 18. "I Puritani." Grisi, Mario, Lablache, and Fornasari! what a quartetto! Those who were absent cannot even imagine the effect of their co-singing. "A te o cara" was never more effectively given by Rubini than by Mario, whose voce argentina leaves you nothing to wish for in tone, and whose manner is every day improving rapidly. The ballet of "Asmè," revived with a stronger cast than ever: Cerito, Guy Stephan, Camille, Planquet, Perrot, Coulon, Gosselin, and St. Leon. A word or two here about Guy Stephan: "Grace is in her steps"—we have seen her snatch applause in the presence of Taglioni; and if conventionalism and prejudice were out of the way, we are not quite sure that Guy Stephan is not one of the first dancers in the world. Trahit sua quemque voluptas is an old saying, on the strength of which we will dare to exclaim—by which last word, reader, be it understood we mean danseuses.

May 23. "Lucrezia Borgia." Principal characters by Grisi, Brambilla, Mario, Panzini, and Lablache. Grisi, as usual, when she gets an opportunity, tragically beautiful.

June 1. "Linda di Chamouni." In this delightful opera Persiani was perfection both in operatic and dramatic display. In the third act particularly.

June 20. "L'Elisir d'Amore." Madame Persiani was all that could be wished for in this charming buffa opera of Donizetti; Mario sang "Una furtiva lagrima" most exquisitely. Lablache, "Ecco ipse" of all that is great and genuine, was wonderfully fine and effective as Dulcamara.

June 22. The beautiful ballet of "Ondine, ou la Naiade," was produced, in which the etherial Cerito fascinated us and all other spectators, as we have already chronicled.

June 29. "Don Pasquale." An immense triumph, both for the composer and the representatives, or rather interpreters, of his eloquent muse. Donizetti's genius rather inclines to comedy; but, to borrow a style of phrase from Falstaff, he "can circumvent" anything he likes. "From gay to grave, from lively to severe," would be a good and expressive motto for his versatile ability.

July 6. Last act of "Lucia di Lammermoor," and last scene of "Anna Bolena." Principal characters by Persiani, Mario, Panzini, and Mdme. Grisi.

July 13. The novelty of this night consisted of the second act of "Guglielmo Tell," which was magnificently represented by Persiani, Mario, F. Lablache, and Fornasari.

July 20. On this night the celebrated and contested pas de deux between the rival danseuses, Elssler and Cerito, was brought to an amicable footing, and was as successful to both as either could wish. Cerito has more of the "buoyant sense of being" about her than Elssler, but the latter is a more finished dancer.

July 27. "La Cenerentola." Nothing to notice but the repetition of the various artistes' perfections, and, if possible, more perfect than ever.

Aug. 3. "Così fan Tutte," with a new petit ballet, entitled "Le Délire d'un Peintre," which we have noticed in a previous number.

August 10. Selections from "L'Italiana in Algieri," &c. Ballet divertissement, "Le Délire d'un Peintre," which we have noticed already, and which does great credit to the classical imagination of M. Perrot, its inventor.

These constitute all the novelties, or the novel changes, that have been rung during the season, which for the subscribers terminated last Saturday. Three additional nights this week have been added as a codicil to the will of anybody who would like to be present, and the consequence, particularly on Thursday for the benefit of Fanny Elssler, has been a most voluntary throng. To-night closes this magnificent piece of entertainment.

What Mr. Lumley means to do for the future we cannot presume to say; but this we shall fearlessly assert, that if he go on as he has begun we shall heartily say, when he undertook the management of the Italian Opera. In a former number, congratulating him on his outset, we said, "Chi ben comincia ha la meta de l'opera,"—now we will make our valedictory in the assuring words that his

O faustum et felicem hunc diem!

MICHAEL WILLIAM BALFE.

Michael William Balfe is the son of a highly respectable professional follower of Terpsichore, and was born in Dublin early in the present century. At a very precocious age he evinced a most extraordinary genius for the art in which he has subsequently so truly distinguished himself, and selecting the violin for his young aspirations, he was put under the tuteiage of Mr. William O'Rourke (the present popular professor in London, composer of "Amelie," &c., but who is, we suppose, for the sake of English euphony, obliged to forego the n in his patronymic, and allow himself to be cave'd Rooke), with whom he made such rapid progress that he very soon performed a concertino of his master's composition, a an amateur society held semi-publically at the Exchange in his native city, about the year of the battle of Waterloo. He subsequently and soon began to reveal his creative faculties, and was a contributor to a little pleasant work entitled "Miniature Lyrics," the words of which were by the late Haynes Bayley. After this he was articled, we believe, to the clever vocalist and composer Horn, whom he accompanied to England, and under whose surveillance he frequently performed at Vauxhall. We know not what fortuitous circumstance led him to visit the continent, but whatever it may have been, we cannot but be indebted to it for nursing and fostering for awhile abroad, and then restoring to us at home, one of the most versatile geniuses that the musical world can boast of. During his residence in Italy he produced several successful operatic pieces, in most of which he distinguished himself also as a principal performer.

The music of Balfe is characterised by an almost too florid and occasionally careless freedom; but no maestro is more master of effect, or better knows the instruments he is handling. Moreover, wanting strength of physique, he is a charming, chaste vocalist, and withal a good actor. Number up these several qualifications, reader, and with us you will not fail to come to our conclusion that such a man is "an honour to his day, though seldom seen!"

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

On Monday an adaptation, by Mr. G. Soane, of Scribe's libretto, "Le Puits d'Amour," with Balfe's music, as produced recently at the Opéra Comique, Paris, made its appearance at this house, and was most brilliantly successful, à forcede la musique; for the plot of the piece, independently of being unnatural and immoral, was nothing but an outrage upon English manners and historical truth. We may not wonder why the French retain a hatred towards us, when they have to deal with such personages as Edward III.; but we cannot help confessing our surprise to see a British public first expatriate an artiste like Balfe, to seek protection from a hostile shore, and then receive him back again with open arms, after perpetrating a lampoon upon their national character in that foreign land. Certainly, Balfe did not write the said libretto, but still he was particeps criminis; and the only excuse we can make for him is, that whatever the import of the words may be, like Terpander, he has "clothed them in melody." The little ballad, "Annette, the fisher's daughter," in which the story of the "Lover's Well" is narrated, is simple and expressive, and was beautifully enunciated by Mrs. H. Grattan, as Tressilian. Allen sang charmingly; Barker excellently well, too; and GLORIOUS PAUL, as Quance, the sheriff of London, was a fellow of "infinite mirth." The finale to the first act is in Balfe's usual dramatic spirit; but when shall trombones, trumpets, drums, &c., allow us to detect harmony? Madame Eugene Garcia was more effective in the part of Geraldine than in anything we have hitherto seen her; and Miss Turpin was most graceful and excellent in what she had to do. The opera was announced for repetition four times a week, amidst universal applause.

The scene our Artist has selected for illustration is from the 2nd act, and represents a subterranean hall:—in the centre, or a little to one side, is a sofa, on which is discovered Geraldine, who, as the author says, "believes herself dead and in Elysium, or the other place;" Tressilian the narrator, adds that he "couldn't exactly make out which." There is a great deal of somnambulism in this scene, which very much disquiets the beholder; but our artist has luckily seized a moment of repose and caught, not a weasel asleep, but "the rarest work of Nature," where

Never yet did slumber lie
On a cheek of so much beauty—
On so blue, so bright an eye!

Sleep generally closes eyes of all hues, but Geraldine's optics are superior to vulgar laws. She sings a duet with the king in a wide-awake style, and then composes herself to sleep on the sofa in most complacent form.

SCENE FROM BALFE'S NEW OPERA OF "GERALDINE," AT THE PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

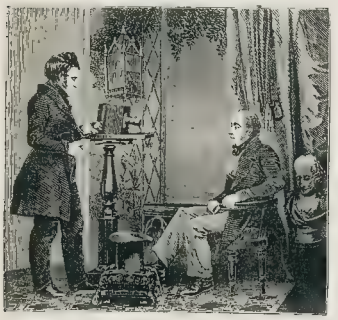
THE WIND OF HEAVEN!

NATIONAL SONG.

The wind of heav'n is a dulcet thing,
When, from the South, with breath of Spring,
It comes on a flowery-laden wing,
And tells the young birds to wake and sing!
The wind of heav'n is a demon sound,
When it scatters the forest pines around,
Tearing their roots from the yawning ground,
Filling it then with the torrent's bound!

The wind of heav'n is the softest sigh
That ever yet bore the lark's on high,
When, wrapt far deep in the azure sky,
He sends down to earth his melody!
The wind of heav'n is a howling blast,
When over the ocean wild 'tis cast;
Silencing ever the sweetest, last
Fond vows to home that some lips had pass'd!

The wind of heav'n is a mournful thing,
When through the old churchyard it doth sing,
Or high in the belfry turret ring
At midnight: sad thoughts it then can bring!
But the wind of heaven is a joyous breeze,
When it wafts Britannia o'er the seas,
And guides her to thousand victories,
Where the tropics burn or arctics freeze! W.



LINES WRITTEN ON SEEING A DAGUERREOTYPE PORTRAIT OF A LADY.

BY MISS ELIZABETH SHERIDAN CAREY.

"To the artist and true connoisseur, the mere vehicle employed will be a matter of little importance, and he will be delighted with whatever is excellent of its kind."—D. C. READ. Preface to the Catalogue of his Exchange.

Wondrous it is! form, face, and air,
Dress, attitude, are pictured there!
Nay, pictured not—why praise of Art
Where Nature, only, plays the part?
No gifted touch could this excel;
No pencil breathe so sweet a spell!
Not Reynolds, as his "scorn of fame,"
Could put this magic head to shame,
Nor with the splendour of his hues,
O'er canvas, weather traits diffuse;
Not Lawrence, with his suasive line,
His pearly shades, and soft carmine,
Not Hoyter, who, with wizard hand,
Limns forth the "Layds of the Land,"
And shows how fair, how all serene,
In sov'reign beauty shines a Queen;
Not one with chalk, and chastise ml,
And varied tints, and patient toil,
Back'd by the love of ancient schools,
Their hints, their practice, sleight, and rules,—
Could us cerarcly surpass*
A portrait truer than the glass.

Here is no feature half awry,
Too large a nose, too small an eye,
No forehead just an inch too low,
No faulty stroke, no faithless glow; †
And, best of all eulogia! here
No false deceiving charms appear;
But the fair face as Nature made it,
So hath the regal sun portray'd it!
The cordial, frank, old English air
Suits nobly on the features there;
And shrewd and bland, with cheerful wile
She seems to seek an answ'ring smile.
That is her turn—you may compare it,
And that her very glance—I'll swear it!
There is her brow, sans cap or wimple,
And there her mirth-enjoying dimple—
That comely cheek, and rounded chin—
To mar them were a mortal sin!
There clusters each bright waving tress,
And there's, I vow, her last new dress—
A shaded silk, each stripe and fold,
And, as I live! the chain of gold
Whose glitt'ring circles lightly deck
The alabaster of that neck;
And, see, the brooch—that petted snake,
More happy than in flow'ry brake.

Most marvellous! so soft, so true!
A precious pearl—a rare bijou!
So much herself—keep it beside you,
Nor time nor tide can e'er divide you;
Or place it, in the sun, before you, ‡
And strongest fancies will creep o'er you;
Those sportive eyes will seem to glisten—
That little ear, well pleased, to listen—
That arch and coaxing smile to play,
And mare your very heart away—
Those lips to breathe, to move, to talk,
And, with a gentle aspiration,
To share their owner's morning walk,
Give you right courteous invitation.

Oh! hence immortaliz'd Daguerre—
The fair La Creevy's; dark despair!
Whom'er shall wisely wish to be Portray'd in pure reality,
And to the likeness of his friend,
Would have no borrow'd beauties blend;
Nor yet, by clumsy art defaced,
Find charms and much lov'd traits erased.
And view, disgusted, crude outline—
Wits to ours, attitude, design—
With bold presence assume the place
Of beauty, intellect, and grace!
Whene'er, in short, seeks life and truth,
In health or sickness, age or youth,
And need not beg "some pow'r to gie 'em
To see themselves as others see 'em"—
Will to the sunny roof repair,
And stare to find their shadow there;
But wither'd beau, and wrinkled belle,
Whose mirrors fatal tidings tell,
Who fret and fume, and peak and pine
O'er youth and beauty's long decline,
And fan the glass that e'er declares
Their shrunken mien and silver hairs—
Those tott'ring knights and sorrel dames
Who still aspire to kindle flames,
And dream of love and Cupid's darts,
And Hymen's bonds, and bleeding hearts,
And think it very hard to show 'em
As all the world has chanced to know'em;
And they, though young, of homely air,
Who due to be eateen'd most fain,
Who, closely wrapt in self conceit,
Believe themselves perfection sweet,
And loathe the pictures that disclose
Not tints of lily and of rose,
Nor in the false, obsequious line
Make Venus or Adonis shine—
Of fop, and fool, and sere old maid,
Of truth's unfait'ring forms afraid,
Hope not the patronage, Daguerre,
With them thy art is fool, not fair,
"More truth!" and "stuff!" and "imposition"
"Unfit for any exhibition!"
"Black, dirty daubs!" "Laugh! coarse and vile!"

"Old, ugly things that never smile!"
And "why the Good Queen Dowager
Should mount to CLARDET'S studi—o,
And Louis Philippe come to err
So much as to the Baron go.
They cannot for their lives declare!"
So hate ye, BEARD, CLARDET, DAGUERRE!

Take back the picture now, Lucrece
(Reluctantly we must resign it!);
And, dusting on its ev'ry trace,
Ere in its casket you enshrine it,
Whene'er you gaze, and gaze and feel
Its mystic influence o'er you steal,
And seem to commune, though apart,
With the sweet sister of your heart,
Betrunk you she would prize, like you,
A sister's faithful semblance too.
We wot a certain hazel eye,
Bright as the star in yonder sky—
A pencill'd brow, a forehead fair—
And glossy braids of raven hair—
A merry glance—a sunny smile,
Whose playful sweetness doth beguile—
A winning, heart-illum'd face,
Where goodness hath impress her trace,
Proclaiming o'er each fexile trait
Her own supreme eternal sway.
But why these seems here recall?
Peep in your glass, you'll see them all;
And, if you would "dear Sarah" please,
Send her the portraiture of these—
A sparkling, speaking, fond reflection,
For ever prin'd by pure affection.

Our engraving represents the photographic process at Mr. Beard's establishment, Parliament-street, Westminster.

* Nothing can be further from my intention than to decry the brilliant productions of these masters, or to wanton from painting the highest honours awarded to it by its most ardent admirers—among whom I desire to be ranked. I refer only to that unerring accuracy of resemblance which, unattainable by the pencil, renders the Daguerreotype invaluable in portraiture.

† Defects "plenty as blackberries" in the productions of the La Creevy school.

‡ Who can have forgotten the warm hearted little miniature-painteress, Miss La Creevy, afterwards Mrs. Tim Linkinwater, in "Nicholas Nickleby?"

§ The dazzling, but often fugitive, lights of expression, which not infrequently elude the practised and accomplished pencil, are rarely, if ever, caught by an inferior hand. To copy the features is a task of little difficulty; but to inform them with the character, and animate them with the expression of the sitter, requires gifts and attainments not possessed by the ordinary face-painter. Here the Daguerreotype is unrivalled, and preserves, for ever, the fleeting sunbeam of a smile.

‖ It is impossible to purge poor human nature of conceit. "Amour propre sème les portraits," but, as the Daguerreotype tells "the truth—the whole truth and nothing but the truth," they who, unmoved of the attributes, pretend to youth, beauty, grace, and intellectual character, and to whom many years' close consultation of the glass has failed to dispel the "dear delusion," are indecorously disrobed when they copy their honest reminiscences, and as they can be in no wise persuaded of the unpalatable fact that the Daguerreotype is unflattering, they fall foul on it, and denounce it with a heat and vindictiveness unspeakably amusing. It is needless to say that such exponents only can be disappointed by a discovery that cannot be too highly estimated by the social affections. What treasure can we possess more coveted than the perfect likeness of the friend or relative most dear to our heart, and when did the pencil thoroughly satisfy the expectations of the eye familiar with the form, air, and bearing of the portrayed?

BOULOGNE (UPPER) HARBOUR.

Boulogne has, during the past week, been a focus of gaiety, to which thousands of pleasure-seekers have been drawn. The great attraction has been the races; the first day being Monday, and the second on Thursday. The affiche and conditions of the sport are signed by "Le Maire de Boulogne, Président de la Société des Courses, Al. Adam;" and of the result we intend presenting our readers with a picturesque illustration in our next journal. The races extend through three weeks: the course lies six miles off the town. On Monday the town was full of visitors, computed at 7000; and neither a horse nor vehicle could be hired for any money. Thousands of persons reached the course by steam.

The harbour of Boulogne has been much improved of late; and great exertions are making to render Boulogne in every respect superior to Calais in the facilities it will afford to visitors to the Continent. Since the opening of the South-eastern Railway to Folkestone, every exertion has been made to promote the establishment of a regular line of steamers from Boulogne to Folkestone, and, by so doing, not only promote expedition in travelling from London to Paris, but prove, by the fact of the daily intercourse, that no seaport in France possesses such conveniences and advantages for travellers to and from London to Paris as does the port of Boulogne. The subject has been taken up by the town, its spirited mayor, and enlightened Chamber of Commerce. The Commercial Company offered, from the 1st of August, either in conjunction with the General Steam Navigation Company, or by itself, to place two boats, of the same power as those on the London station, to ply regularly between Boulogne and Folkestone, on condition that a sum of £1000 be guaranteed to them to cover any losses that might be sustained during the first year. This reasonable demand and offer of service were accepted, a subscription entered into in the room, when more than a fourth of the sum was subscribed. Such then is the state of the communications between London and Paris viâ Boulogne and Folkestone. The traveller can leave Boulogne at 9 in the morning, and feel certain of being at London Bridge at 2 o'clock.

THE LARGEST BELL EVER CAST IN ENGLAND.

This immense bell has just been shipped for Montreal, it being intended for the new Catholic Cathedral, where it is to be placed in a tower by itself, and to be used as a "bourdon," or alarum-bell. It is to be named "Maria," the cathedral being dedicated to the virgin.

It is the most extraordinary work of the kind ever executed in England, and was cast at the foundry of Messrs. Mears and Company, of Whitechapel. Some idea may be formed of the vast size of this bell, from its having required ten tons of fused metal to form the cast; and the time occupied in running the fused metal from the furnace into the mould was fifteen minutes. The diameter of the bell at the mouth is 7 feet 3 inches; it height is 7 feet; and its thickness at the sound bow is 6½ inches. Its weight is 7 tons 11 cwt. 2qrs. 4lbs.; its sound is very powerful and melodious. The weight of the clapper is upwards of 3 cwt. The bell will be rung by means of two wheels, one on each side of the stock or bearer, which, with its iron-work and fittings, weighs about 2 tons 10 cwt. There will be four ropes used in the ringing, a man pulling at each side of the wheels. The bell itself is heavier than the great Tom of Lincoln by 32 cwt.; it bears some bas-reliefs of the cardinal virtues, which are finely cast. On one side is the following legend: "Negotiamini dum venio omnis spiritis laudet Dominum. Anno Domini, 1843. Fundatæ Marianapolis, 20°. Greg. P.P. 16. Pontificatus, 12°. Regin. Victoriæ Britanniarum 6°." On the other side is inscribed, "Ex plurimo Æreorum Artificium, Agricolarumque, Marianapolitamensium Dono;" intimating that it has been paid for from a fund subscribed by the merchants, artificers, and agriculturists of Montreal. Its cost, including that of the works, is upwards of £1200. On the rim is the maker's name, "Thomas Mears, Fecit, Londini, 1843."

There has also been a peal of ten bells already sent out, to be placed in the sister-tower of the cathedral at Montreal, a Gothic structure, recently erected at the cost of £80,000. The shipment of the huge bell on board the Lady Seaton, bound for Montreal, and lying in the Brandy-quay, London Docks, was a labour of great difficulty; and a part of the deck of the vessel was of necessity, cut away to admit the bell into the hold of the vessel.

CHAPTER XX.

THE PRISONERS AT VERDUN.

THE war still raged, and with such varied success that the prospect of its close appeared more remote than ever, while Charles, as Sir Arthur had apprehended, was in consequence wretched.

He had been now nearly twelve months a prisoner; and although he saw many around him who had been prisoners for twelve years comparatively happy, the hope that had been given to his ambition, the thought of his professional prospects having now stagnated, and his belief he had of its being highly probable that he might be kept there for the remainder of twenty years longer, conquered to render him miserable; while it was evident that no naturally fine constitution was long by perpetual anxiety undermined!

He might have escaped boldly as others had done, but his spirit appeared to be utterly broken. He might have escaped meanly as others were known to do—by bribing, by bribing a Frenchman to imprison him for debt, and then having given up his parole, paying the debt, and on hearing the prison gates shut in his face—but he could not in that way satisfy his conscience, and could not sacrifice his honour.

Under these afflicting circumstances the amiable Lucrece, who was indeed the very angel he in his letters had described, was necessary in her efforts to cheer him. She would appeal to him as a husband, as a father, as a man, in tones to which the climate had imparted depth and tenderness, and with an earnest intensity of feeling which went to her very soul; she would implore him to look at the bright prospects she invariably painted, and with manly brauness to bear up against the calamity with which they had been assailed, but all her efforts failed. She could not rouse him.

Had he known how long he had to remain, nay, had he even known that he should be kept there for life—he might have become reconciled, but this was a state of suspense which he could not with fortitude endure.

He, of course, could not know how long he should be kept there a prisoner: it might be for two years, it might be for twenty, or it might be for life; all was uncertain, and that very uncertainty tortured him the more as he felt that the best, the most valuable, part of his professional life was being wasted.

Nor was Frederick much more happy. It is true that, having perfectly recovered from his wound, he was in excellent health; and it is said that health and happiness—and with those we were reunited to be gay, but the thought of Alice—of whose name he was cognizant with whom he constantly corresponded—made her loved image more dearly than he ever loved before, conceived it to be possible for a man to love—was to him a perpetual source of self-reproach.

"Don't you think, Charles," said he on one occasion, "the thing answer been tried—but don't you think that if I were to pledge my honour as an officer and a gentleman, that I would remain at three months, they would allow me to go over to England?"

Charles smiled. It was seldom indeed that he did smile, but he could not help smiling at this.

"What do you think?" continued Fred, earnestly. "What is your opinion?"

"Why, my dear boy, Fred, that if the French committed so extensive a parole to be violated by any prisoners at Verdun—"

"But in this single case can't you conceive the possibility of the entertaining such an expectation?"

"I cannot indeed, they would laugh at the idea, but depend upon it, Fred, they would do nothing else, unless indeed they placed you under such slight—I can easily conceive the possibility of their doing that."

"I am I'll tell you what I'll do: I'll give up my parole, and escape in the best way I can."

"You had better not attempt it, Fred. look at the consequences of failure."

"Less at the fate of Alice! Do you not think that if I were to return she would recover?"

"I certainly do."

"And do you not think that I love her sufficiently well, Charles, to risk my life for her?"

"But in risking your life you also risk hers! seeing that her life hangs upon your own. If anything fatal were to happen to you, she would die, and it would be probably the result of any attempt of the kind whether successful or not. Your life might under the circumstances be considered as hers."

"But I'm not going to consent to be kept here for ever! I can't and shan't endure what I am to do!"

"Have patience all things will be well: have patience!"

How strange—seems to us can give excellent advice to others, and at the same time to himself! As the parties, who, after having been for three quarters of an hour in a most harassing home found that while he had been preaching his very best sermon, his very self he had been engaged in vain, exclaimed in a rage, "Confound you, Jack! you would had such a horse of Ale!" Or as the parties who, after having given something peculiar as his own cause.

Last autumn when advice had been given to Fred, he cried, "Patience! what is all very well, Charles, for you having a wife with you here—to talk of patience—were I in your situation, I would be happy with things, but as am I can't have patience! If I were only married to Alice, as if she were here with me, they might keep me a prisoner as long as they pleased. I should care for nothing then. I should wish for nothing more!"

"I have often thought," said Charles, "that you might possibly be able to expose the fallacy," at has often struck me as being possible—although I am never mentioned it before that the Doctor might, by management, be prevailed upon to make up an interpret happy."

"But how?—by what means?—by what means, my dear fellow," inquired Fred, eagerly.

"Why, by allowing Alice to come over here!"

"Do you really think he would?"

"I say that I have often thought it possible"

"How strange that it never struck me! It is possible!—probable, very, very probable."

"I cannot go quite so far as that."

"But she might come over with some female friend, and we might be married here and be happy. I'll write to her on the subject at once."

"That would spoil all!"

"Why? would there be any impropriety in it?"

"Perhaps so absolute impropriety; but I hold it to be a matter of infinite delicacy, I do not think any direct communication between you on the subject would have the desired effect."

"Charles," said Fred, with an earnest expression, "I will be guided entirely by you, having, as you know that I always have had, the highest confidence in your judgment. You have been already more than a brother to me, and I shall ever feel so to you. You are a good fellow, Charles, but that you do not require to be told. You are too long to that to pretend, and I will follow your directions in this affair."

"Nonsense! I am not at all sanguine on the subject. I think it extremely probable that the application will be unsuccessful, still, as the matter is one of importance both to her and to you—for Heaven only knows when we shall be able to remain sure—and as it is just possible that her father who loves her tenderly may be induced to consent, I hold the application to be one which ought, under the circumstances, to be made. I will consider the letter you plan would be for me to write to my uncle, communicating my views on the subject, soliciting his good offices, and requesting him strongly to make such representations to the Doctor as may be calculated to obtain his consent."

"Exactly! The very thing! It must be by far the best course to pursue. And Sir Arthur I am certain will do it!"

He will, indeed. There is nothing in his power that he would not do to promote our happiness. And the happiness of us all would be thereby promoted. Even I should feel far more happy, not only for your sake, Fred, but because poor Lucrece—between whom, now that, the most affectionate feelings exist—would be delighted."

"Will you, then, write to Sir Arthur?"

"I will, this very day. But Fred, not a word to Lucrece. Concealment, should we succeed, will not lessen her delight, while it will save her from all disappointment if we fail. Therefore, do not say a syllable to her on the subject."

Fred promised that he would not, and the letter was written that day and despatched.

Poor Alice had now become extremely dejected. Perpetual thought had enveloped her mind quietly in gloom. She had no intimation, no energy, no power to shake off that and now which sat so terribly heavily upon her. To visit her father laboured to cheer her, in vain he endeavoured to convince her that the war would soon be at an end, and poured out every consolation which he could think of to justify that reluctance, her years was dazed by the breath of despair, which neither change of scene nor society could remove.

Knowing that Sir Arthur was expecting the letter which Charles said it probable that the subject proposed might be attained, but, concerning the utmost delicacy and caution to be essential to its attainment, he determined on opening the subject gradually, and with care.

He, therefore, having consulted Caroline, whose lofty arrogance developed itself on more and more, and who began to consider herself as the sister of Lady Cleveden, ought to form an alliance with a much higher family than that of Dr. Hawtree, invited the Doctor and Alice to dine, and, notwithstanding Alice was morally as well as physically indisposed—having been recently by Caroline's account, with her for more particular than of affection—the invitation was accepted, and they arrived at the usual hour but not a word having reference to Verdun was uttered either before or during dinner, for although the subject occupied the thoughts of all, it was by all studiously avoided.

When, however, Caroline and Alice had retired, Sir Arthur expressed to Dr Hawtree that he had that morning received a long letter from Charles, and having drank for some time upon the comparatively unimportant portions of the letter, he cautiously proceeded to his task.

"I am still afraid," said he, "very much afraid that this war will last a long time yet."

The Doctor shook his head mournfully repeated, "I fear it will last long."

"So do things," continued Sir Arthur, "especially for poor Alice. I perceive that she has not yet got over it."

No, nor will she ever get over it, unless indeed the war be soon brought to a close. It would have been a happy thing had young Greville never seen her."

"It is no happy thing that he ever did, under the circumstances, it is to be regretted. Had they been married before he left, that they might not to be living together, like Charles and Lucrece, it would not have been of so much importance."

"That would have been a different thing altogether. I know it not there have cared so much about it she would not have been so deeply affected. Doubtless, however, that is a matter in which they are both to blame, for instead of their being happy in each other's society, would have been a great relief. As it is, poor girl, I don't know what I am to do with her. Her spirits appear to be utterly broken. She is from morning till night in a melancholy mood and sometimes I absolutely fear that her reason will leave her."

"It is natural to be lamented, then, that they are not married."

"I wish to Heaven they were! I, of course, have no desire to conceal my thoughts from you. I do wish they were, from my heart! But the wish is vain also!"

"Why vain?"

"If by vain," again, I apprehend, because it cannot be realised

"I do not know that. You wish they were married. Why can they not be married—"

"My dear friend," said the Doctor, "what is it you mean."

"Why—that as mercy a suggestion, possibly, may have passed you—Frederick is in France, Alice is here—he cannot come over to her, but she can go over to him.—hence it is I ask why they cannot be married."

A pause ensued, and Sir Arthur, having watched the Doctor's countenance intently, perceived not only that the idea had not occurred to him, but that he viewed it in anything but a favourable light.

"It is not, you see," resumed Sir Arthur, "it is not as if he were there alone Charles is well known to her, while she and that offensive creature Lucrece are like sisters."

"I'm aware of it," said the Doctor, thoughtfully, "I am aware of it, but—I'll think the matter over. I can scarcely bear the thought of parting with her still—I'll think of it. I'll think of it."

"It must not be said you perceive, that she was expressly to be married: her assembly oh yet might be to see Lucrece, and the marriage would follow in the regular way."

"I understand you perfectly. If I could go over with her—but—Well! I'll take an opportunity of consulting her on the subject. If I find it to be her wish, my own feelings shall be sacrificed."

"It need not be known, even to her, that her marriage over there was contemplated. She might go expressly to see Lucrece, and, between them, the affair might be arranged without any apparent premeditation. And now I may explain to you that this suggestion came from Charles, who wished me, in his letter, to ascertain if it were like that you would entertain such an arrangement which he appears to feel convinced would promote the happiness of all concerned. But here is the letter, Read it."

The Doctor did;—and its tendency was to induce the belief that if Alice were to go, the happiness of all concerned would be promoted.

"It appears that Mrs Cleveland," said he, "knows nothing of this proposal"

"Nor, I would submit, should Alice know of it. Let them both be unconscious of the matter. I question much whether if Alice knew of it she would consent. The affair can be arranged much better over there."

"Well then, let it be so. The idea of parting that with an only child is of course extremely painful, but for her sake—to save her—I set aside all considerations of self, and propose it."

While, however, they were thus deciding on the propriety of consulting the real subject, Caroline was not only explaining all to Alice, but labouring to impress upon her mind how highly necessary, the contemplated visit would be considered.

"You perceive, my dear," she observed, in conclusion, "that, although there would be no direct obligation in such a step under the circumstances, we must, for our own comfort, to a certain extent, study the wishes and feelings of others, and, if once it were known that you went over there for such a purpose, however chaste, however pure might be your motives, the remarks of the world would be horribly severe. your reputation would be assailed by ridicule on the one hand and malice on the other incessantly—Miss Hawtree cannot live without her lover. She must go to him she must ask him to marry her at once, she cannot wait, how thing! What a horrible way she must be in!—how desperately she must want a husband! These remarks, with a hundred others, would be made, and, therefore, much as I love my brother, I would not have you go for the world!"

Alice was silent and during her absence she thought, not of what the world might say, but of the speedy return of Fred in any hope less. She would not have gone under any circumstances—she still considered it a matter of duty—but the hope of seeing him in future, that the first of a proposal of the kind he—" made no sacrifice to her that there was not the slightest prospect of the war being brought to a close, that it was kept being, and continued to wage—despite the remonstrances of Caroline—chase Sir Arthur and the Doctor resumed them.

"Alice!" my dear child!" exclaimed Dr Hawtree, addressing her as tears as he entered the room, "What is it, my girl?—what is the matter?"

"Dear papa," replied Alice, "I need not conceal it here, because we are with those to whom my feelings are known, but although the fond hope which sustains I do have of—I will not leave you, dear father. I will not leave you."

The Doctor, while pressing Alice fondly to his heart, looked at Caroline with an expression of anger, when, turning to Sir Arthur, he observed, "I did not anticipate this. My dear child," he added, "we will talk of this matter by-and-by; be cheerful, Alice, all will yet be well!"

Not wishing to offend Caroline, or to do her what he supposed to be the greatest of wrongs, that he would wantonly wound the feelings of her young friend, the Doctor tenderly led Alice to a chair, and sat beside her, and endeavoured to divert their thoughts from this subject until they had partaken of coffee, when Alice bade them adieu and departed.

"My dear," said Sir Arthur, when they had left, "how came you to say, less all to that poor girl?"

"Because," said Caroline, haughtily, "I deemed it correct to explain."

"But papa, my dear, you should not have done so."

"Sir, I am, I apprehend, as competent to form a judgment on a matter of this description as you are."

"Yes, my dear, but—"

"But who, sir? I presume that I am mistress at least of my own thoughts' and that if I have it right to enter into an explanation, I am at liberty to do so!"

"No doubt, my dear, but then you have spoiled all."

"All what, sir?—what have I spoiled?"

"Why, we did not want to have it explained to her!"

"How was it possible for me to know that? You did not tell me that you wished to conceal it! What could I suppose, as having found a letter in my presence not to explain to them the purport of the letter? Did you not tell me distinctly that that was your object?"

"I believe I did, my dear you, I believe I did"

"Very well then, why do you blame me for furthering that object?"

"Nay, I do not blame you"

"You do blame me, sir, and I will not be blamed. You invited them expressly in order to lay the proposal before them, and because I presumed so for—"

"Nay, I did not say presumed"

"But presumption was implied." I can perceive what you mean before your thoughts are expressed. You mean to say that I had no right to enter into any explanation."

"All I meant was that you wished to conceal the real object until the event over"

"I perceive. You wished to deceive the girl, you wished to inveigle her into the marriage."

"No, no, my dear no!"

"Yes, yes I say yes! You meaned to send her over under false pretences! unlawful with. I must confess I tell you sir I'll not be a party to any deceit in this matter, nor will I allow my brother to be fooled. If Dr. Hawtree desires to get his daughter off, it is perhaps but natural that he should be averse to entering in practices so base, and had he said one syllable on the subject to me I have taught him so without assistance."

"I have done, my dear—"

"Done, you ought not to have commenced. You appear to think that I have no interest in this matter" but I would have you understand that in all that concerns my brother I have an interest—very deep interest—and—"

"Really, my dear, I—I—I—"

"I know, sir, not correct—but a correct—and—I—I—I

CANAL ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

With respect to the advantages which will, in all probability, accrue from the canal now about to be commenced across this isthmus, we may observe that not only the communication between Europe and the countries of America bordering on the Pacific would be much facilitated, but vessels bound for China and the countries of Eastern and Southern Asia would prefer a voyage which, besides being much shorter than that round the Cape of Good Hope, would have the advantage of a continual favourable wind (the trades). A geographical writer, in estimating the difficulties of this great work, observes, that "although there are no obstacles to the execution of such a work in the surface and soil which could not be overcome, the climate is so unhealthy, that the lives of many thousands would be sacrificed, before the work could be completed." We hope, however, that the enterprise may not be frustrated by these gloomy anticipations.

Since writing the above, we have met with the following sensible observations on this great work, addressed to the Bath and Cheltenham Gazette:—

"[illegible] to [illegible] Darien or Panama pro[illegible] ever [illegible] to the long-contemplated project of 'piercing' that neck of land which has immemorially separated the waters of the Atlantic from those of the Pacific; and it is still more important to find that an undertaking of [illegible] years a[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

SEA BATHING.—BOGNOR, SUSSEX.—This fashionable and retired Watering Place, the favourite resort of the late Princess Charlotte, and of our present Queen in her early days. The celebrated Dr. Bailey, twice in its mild and pure air, visited it for many years—the town was much indebted for the patronage he gave it. The shore has no deep cliff to endanger bathing, the rocks run far into the sea, which completely break the heavy swell of the water, and the sands form so gently an inclination, that even infants and children may at all times, without the slightest risk, enjoy that delightful requisite—Sea Bathing. There is an excellent drive and promenade along the shore, recently completed; the soil is of a gravelly nature, with watercourses in or nearly land for miles near the town; the finest trees and evergreens growing to the water's edge; the villas surrounded by luxuriant shrubberies and most productive gardens speak plainly as to the mildness of the air. Roads excellent, drives numerous, and may be enjoyed for miles on either side without a turnpike. The town is built in an irregular form, with many detached villas. The lodging-houses are kept up in a style which does great credit to the proprietors, and are let at a very reasonable rent. The hotels are spacious. There are two excellent libraries and reading-rooms, an assembly and billiard room, hot and cold baths. Horses, carriages, and pedal chairs for hire. Provisions moderate, water excellent, and the fine Southdown mutton abundantly supplied. Bognor holds out no particular inducement to the gay, who visit the seaside for amusement, but to the invalid or families who come to the coast for the benefit of their health, it possesses advantages superior to any town along the coast of Sussex.—For further information apply to the Postmaster.

WONDERFUL CURE!—The following interesting facts regard as a most extraordinary CASE OF CURE—effected solely by the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS—are respectfully submitted to public attention.

Bishop Auckland, July 27th, 1843.

MESSRS. T. ROBERTS AND CO.,—I send you the within Testimonial from Mr. John BRANSON. He certainly has most wonderfully improved in health since taking the Pills.

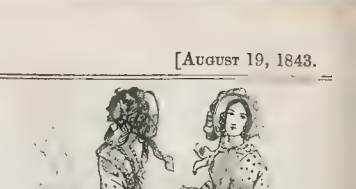
ROBERT DAVIDSON, Druggist, Bishop Auckland.

Coundon, near Bishop Auckland, July 4th, 1843.

GENTLEMEN,—It is with heartfelt gratitude to God I have to acknowledge that I was led by a kind providence to make use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS in the spring of 1842. I had been afflicted for eleven years with the scurvy, so ill that I could not make use of salt, nor anything that tasted of it; and very often was lame of my leg. I took the pills for six weeks, and I am so much restored that I sometimes fancy myself to be about twenty-one years of age, but I smile at the mistake, for my age is sixty one years. I have to inform you also of my son, he was afflicted for ten years, from the effects of the Typhus Fever; he is now wonderfully restored. I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully,

P.S. You may make use of this as you please. JOHN BRANSON.

Sold by all respectable medicine vendors in boxes at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 11s. See the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in white letters on a red ground, engraved on the Government Stamp.



THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, August 14, 1843.

Mon cher [Monsieur,—As far as fashions are concerned the month of August may be considered as one of complete stagnation: being neither summer nor autumn, it must be considered a month of transition, in which great allowances must be made for any eccentricities that may be observable. Thus nothing positive can be obtained either at our theatres, or our promenades, nor do the ateliers of our modistes and couturieres offer anything worthy of your columns. We must, however, except from this general character our toilettes de ville, not because they contain, in themselves, any changes sufficiently important to merit observation, but because a skil ul hand is never at a loss at least to re-embellish the best known models by some particular alterations of their details, either by a change or displacement of its minor accessories. This truth is one that will become apparent to any one who will take the trouble to look closely into the dresses now worn, whether they consist of a simple morning robe of fancy stuff, shaped like a redingote; the corsage, half high, fastened en blouse; the waist round, amadis sleeves; or whether an open robe of glazed pensée taffety, the corsage plain, the sleeves in a single piece, the skirts trimmed with two deep flounces, pleated à la vielle; or a summer evening robe of Indian barége, the corsage à la vierge, the sleeves short, plain, and trimmed with rich Mechlin lace. One of our first artistes has just executed several robes in rose-colored barége, which she trims with a deep flounce on biais, surmounted by a ruche of the same; the corsage is made bigh, and the coulisse the same as the sleeves. In some of the robes de chambre of this artiste, the corsage is straight, the back fan shaped, the front with edges, with large fall backs, forming bavaroises; a little falling collar is also worn. The skirt is wide open in front, lined at the edge the same as the corsage, and trimmed with cutwork embroidery, which in her toilettes de ville are in dark point de soie, embroidered upon the front of the skirt with three rows of passementerie, the first row being placed upon the middle from the point of the corsage to the bottom of the skirt, the two others to the height of the hips. The corsage which is high and pointed, is embroidered in passementerie, forming draperies, that is to say, beginning from the epaulette to the seam in the middle; sleeves à la Louis XIII. trimmed with two bouffants, finishing above the elbow, and separated from each other by an embroidery in passementerie, the ends of the sleeves being of bouillonné India muslin. This dress, although presenting nothing that is at all new, yet, taken as a tout ensemble, is extremely pretty, and, when worn by a handsome woman, very imposing.—Adieu, &c.

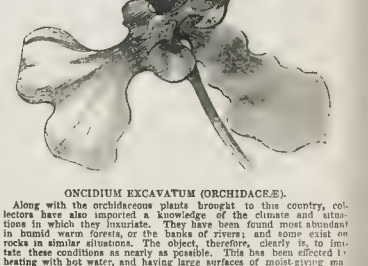
FLORICULTURE.



ONCIDIUM EXCAVATUM (ORCHIDACÆ).

Along with the orchidaceous plants brought to the country, collectors have also imported a knowledge of the climate and situations in which they luxuriate. They have been found most abundant in humid warm forests, or the banks of rivers; and some exist on rocks in similar situations. The object, therefore, clearly is to imitate these conditions as nearly as possible. This has been effected by heating with hot water, and having large surfaces of moist-giving materials, such as beds of moss, the bark, or leaves, pools of water, or even wood, or hung up in rustic baskets, or attached to branches of trees. These, treated in this manner, require frequent syringing during the growing season. In their native country, the orchidaceæ, though extremely luxuriant, require a season of rest, as well as the plants of more temperate latitudes. This period of rest is produced during excessive drought. In cultivation, therefore, it is necessary to induce a season of rest; and this is effected. To secure this end effectually, a house should be devoted to the purpose solely. Into this house the plant should be transferred when it has discharged its functions, and then be kept from moisture to any great extent, and much cooler. This requirement cannot in every case be made available, and it is therefore customary to keep the same house by evaporating or syringing sparingly during the summer, and the season of rest to our winter. As a general rule, plants in this state of repose must be supplied with less heat and moisture.

DRILL IN THE ARMY.

A melancholy incident—no other than the murder in cold blood of the adjutant of his regiment, by a soldier on parade—has drawn public attention to the subject of military drill, the oppressiveness of the present system having been pleaded by the culprit as the aggravation which urged him to commit his reckless crime, and generally alluded to by others as producing pain, vexation, and disappointment, not to say disaffection, among the British soldiery.

While expressing our abhorrence of the lawless mind and depraved disposition of the wretch who could bring himself to take revenge upon a system in the person of a gallant officer who had never done him any individual wrong, we may, without fear of being suspected of any sympathy with such an enormity, look at the evil complained of in a social aspect, with a view to see how far it is an evil, and how far the system of drill, in its present vigour and unrelaxing industry, is compatible not only with the general welfare of the army, but also with the ordinary interests of Christian humanity.

One of our warmest and proudest feelings as civilians is that of brotherly fellowship with our troops—of perfect reliance upon them as gallant and trusty protectors of national honour—as faithful champions of loyalty and the greatness of the British name—as worthy companions of their glorious kindred service—as props of the empire, kith and kin of the people, and defenders of the Crown and country in every emergency of disorder or of war. It is greatly to the common interest of the citizens that they should regard the soldiery with perfect affection, and be so regarded by them in return. We know that there are mischievous people, ay, and mischievous papers too, directing their influence towards the excitement of discontent among the troops, towards the importation of politics into the army, and the engendering of an uneasiness of temper, an impatience of proper discipline and control, and a belief that the principles upon which all armies must be regulated are principles incompatible with the true spirit of liberty and the freedom of thought among mankind. It is from such quarters as these that we continually hear, upon any political crisis, the cry of "What will you do with the army? The army is against you. The soldiers will desert you to a man." But these are only the mad shoutings of mock-patriots, who have less reliance than they should have upon the truth, the fidelity, the unswerving integrity of the British troops, who in these supereminent qualities are an example, and a bright one, to all the armies of the world.

It was only last week that Mr. Bright, in the House of Commons, threw out some of those insinuations about the tone and temper of the soldiery in which the most violent class of politicians are too prone to indulge, and which were instantly, on the part of the army, repudiated and rebuked by Sir Henry Hardinge in the finest spirit of manly indignation. The old general stood glowing and enraged that an aspersion should be even hinted against the affection of his troops, and, while he gave his loud and earnest denial to the calumny implied, poured forth eloquent protestations of the loyalty of the soldiers, of their perfect attachment to the cause of order in the state, of their ever-readiness for war, and of their moral courage to execute, everywhen and everywhere, even the most painful duties which social disturbance might render it necessary to perform. In such dilemmas of disorder—reluctantly perhaps, but always firmly, and with a spirit of humanity prompting him to spare and to forbear—the British soldier would be ready at the orders of his superior, and unalterably faithful at his post.

It is because we believe this to be the true character of the army, and because, moreover, it is a character which—separating ourselves from the disaffection-mongers—we wish most loyally to maintain, that we can afford to inquire frankly into any apparent grievance which may annoy the troops vexatiously, and proclaim ourselves, without suspicion, the soldier's as well as the citizen's friend.

We, therefore, unhesitatingly direct attention to the subject of excessive drill, and as freely express ourselves opposed to its exercise, either in Ireland or elsewhere; not because we apprehend any danger from it to the loyal spirit of the army, but because it seems opposed to three very important principles, those of policy, humanity, and common sense. We shall not enter into the military arguments for or against the practice; we shall not presume to set up our judgment against the experience of zealous officers, working for the improvement of their corps; and, although a writer in the Times has declared that not one sixth of the manœuvres which our men are taught are practicable on the field of battle, we shall not pretend to any concurrence in the statement, but direct ourselves to the question on social grounds alone.

It is clear to us, then, that at the present moment too much drill is practised upon our troops—more we mean than is required for the purposes of discipline, or than the humane indulgence which the citizen should award to the soldier will recognise as just. We do not say that too much labour is gone through—we know that the habit of exercise is most imperative, and requires to be kept in constant play—and that the soldier does not do the same amount of work in time of peace as the labouring civilian; but we assert that the frequency of drill is very much too harassing, in consequence of the annoying details of duty which are attendant upon every turning-out, which fidget and weary the more from seeming, as they really are, so perfectly unnecessary, and which disgust the soldier with their continual and plaguing repetition. It has been truly said that a long peace has induced the superior officers in the army to turn their attention to minutiæ which were never thought of during war, and, in endeavouring to improve the discipline and gainsay the accusation that soldiers eat the bread of idleness, they have invented unnecessary drills and occupations which are tiresome in their details, and worrying beyond measure to the men who practise them. The great annoyance which the soldiers complain of is that they have never a moment's repose :—

"From daylight until dark they are constantly irritated by [illegible] ordered to dress and answer their names, &c.; and their rooms are kept in such a perfect but uncomfortable state of tidiness that they can neither sit down in peace nor amuse themselves in any way. Smoking is necessarily forbidden in barrack-rooms, and as the soldier is not allowed to have a box or anything except his knapsack, which is filled by the most worthless wearing apparel, it is impossible that he can keep even a book. [illegible] other amusements have been recommended sufficiently often, but have they or will they ever be established? In fact the soldier has no refuge from annoyance except in the alehouse, nor any indulgence except in that baneful habit of drunkenness which is the cause of nearly all the crimes which are committed in the British army."

Should Father Mathew succeed in introducing his system of temperance into the army, it will be an inestimable blessing upon the men, which will, however, require to be perfected by leaving them more leisure from needless annoyance—by sweetening that leisure with the means of healthy physical exercise or mentally healthy intellectual enjoyment—by teasing it less with interruptions for discipline and drill, and set disturbing those humble comforts which, apart from that labour which is the duty of life, [illegible] others, and are a boon which humanity can hardly refuse to bestow upon those who fight the battles of their country, and ever wield the glave of victory for our national renown. Having thus recorded our impressions upon this subject, we cannot better conclude than by quoting some concurrent opinions of our own contemporary, which are entirely corroborative of our own views :—

"We think that if measures were taken to promote the comfort and happiness of the soldiers when off duty—if manly and healthy recreations, which have been already partially introduced, were more generally and liberally provided—if they had some indulgences allowed and encouraged which might draw them away, from [illegible] and boozing enjoyments—if they could be made to feel that their officers cared for their comfort and rejoiced in their happiness; then, we think, they would not only bear the strictest discipline and severest drill when on duty, but bear them with cheerfulness and good will. But such a [illegible] we have hinted at—for it would be in many regiments [illegible] depends entirely upon the skill, character, and zeal of [illegible] commanding officers; and upon these gallant men we would [illegible] by earnestly impress the duty, or at least policy and [illegible] of doing all that can be done, consistently with discipline and subordination, to gain the affections, elevate the character, and confirm the loyalty of their troops. The soldiers of [illegible] army are quick to recognise the virtues and the courage of their officers; and they are ever ready to evince their appreciation of them not less by gallantry in the field than by patience under difficulties, and by good conduct in the midst of embarrassment."

THE MURDER OF COL. STODDART AND CAPT. CONOLLY.

A correspondent connected with the East has sent a narrative, detailing the circumstances attending the murder of our two unmerited countrymen by order of the Ameer of Bokhara, to a morning paper, and from which we select the principal points :—

"NARRATIVE OF SAALEH MAHOMED, COMMONLY CALLED AKHOONDZYDEH.

"I am the son of Cazee Mahomed Hassan, of Herat, one of the principal persons of that city; we are the family whose lives Major Todd bought for 10,000 tomans from Yar Mahomed, when the former quitted Herat.

"When the Russians were advancing towards Khiva, Major Todd sent my father on a mission to that city. Afterwards Captain Abbott went to Khiva, and I met him at Merve, where I was purchasing grain. He sent me to Herat, and Major Todd ordered me to proceed and join that officer at Khiva with 1000 tomans. When I reached Khiva I learned that Mr. Abbott had gone towards Astrakan, and, moreover, that he had been killed among the Kuzzaks. I still thought it my duty to follow his steps, which I did for twenty-two marches; but last four days and nights I was perfectly alone in the desert, and found him wounded and a prisoner in a Kuzzak tent, where I delivered to him 980 ducats.

"Four months afterwards Major Todd directed me to join Captain Conolly-then on the road to Merve, proceeding to Khiva and Koghan, and deliver to him 2000 ducats. We resided seven months in Khiva; Captain Conolly then sent me to Cabul, to Sir William M'Naghten, with important despatches and letters. Captain Conolly gave me leave from the Ameer that I might join him in Bokhara, which the Khan permitted me to do, and gave me presents, saying, at the same time, that Captain Conolly had committed a great error by going to Bokhara, where he would be treated like Colonel Stoddart. The Khan had a great regard for Captain Conolly, and expressed great regret at his having left Khiva. I do not know the cause of Captain Conolly's going to that city; but I think it was owing to the intrigue of the smoker or vizier. When I reached the Bokhara frontier, the commander told me that two days before my arrival (about the middle of December, 1841) the ameer had seized and confined Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly, and that I could not proceed without further orders. He placed a guard over me. Five days afterwards orders arrived that I should be sent to Bokhara. We remained the city in two days, about sunrise, and afterwards I was carried before the Ameer. I saluted him with 'Allah-ho-akbar.' He looked at me for about a minute, but said nothing, and on his making a signal with his head I was carried off. They put me in confinement in a comfortable place, and treated me well. I was under the charge of the topeh bashi; so, too, were Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly, and Allahdad Khan, subahdar of Sepoys, who were in confinement in his harem, and were then well treated. My servants, seven in number, and the servants of Captain Conolly, thirty-three in number, were imprisoned in the Serah Chah, or Black Well.

"The Black Well is the prison for criminals. It is a circular well, 17 feet deep, and 21 feet in diameter; it has a brick roof with a hole in it, and criminals are lowered down by a rope.

"I used to communicate secretly with the gentlemen. I was very ill, and the ameer sent me a doctor. After twenty days he sent two painters, and ordered me to make a plan of Herat. A week afterwards the ameer sent for me at night. He was seated on the ground in a small room, with two servants in attendance. He forced me to sit down, as I was ill. He asked how I, the son of a Cazee, could serve the English? He then spoke of the events in Cabul, and of the insurrection there. It was the disasters in Cabul which induced the ameer to confine the two officers. Thirty days or so subsequently, about the beginning of Muharem (middle of February), two men came into my room, and stripped me of all my clothes, and shoved me out of the room; and, at the same time, Allahdad Khan appeared under charge of two other men. The ameer was looking out of a window. They took us to the top of a hill, outside the citadel, but within the city, and called for a rope. I thought they were going to kill us, but this was the Black Well; and I was greatly rejoiced to find that the rope was only wanted to lower me down by. When I found there Yoosoof, Captain Conolly's Greek, and six others of his servants. The other people, being Captain Conolly's servants, Allahdad Khan's, and mine, amounting to about fifty persons, who had either been confined in the well, with about twenty five or thirty criminals, in all eighty persons, had been previously removed from the well, where they were packed one on the top of the other. The floor was covered with human dung. I had no clothes except a cotton shirt and trousers, though it was deep winter, and I was very ill from fever and ague; but one of Captain Conolly's servants gave me a cloth coat, which saved my life. Our food was a small piece of bread in the morning, and the same at night.

"Up to this time the two gentlemen remained in the same place of confinement, in the harem of the Topeh bashi.

"We remained for two months without any change, and without any communication with Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly. The ameer then went to Koghan de Bala, a village of Reesdar-ool Emel (the name of the land having first liberated Captain Conolly's servants, who were in the well. Thus Allahdad Khan, I, and Yoosoof, were the only persons living there, besides the criminals; but our food was increased abundantly, by an allowance given by Captain Conolly, and permitted by the ameer.

"The ameer returned in less than two months, about the end of December-old-Akhir-the last day of that month was the 10th of June). Three days afterwards we three were hauled out of the well, and Allahdad Khan and I were chained together by the neck. Allahdad Khan told me to say the Kilmeh, for that they were going to put us to death. Yoosoof was chained with a Hindoo, a high-caste man, and a Sepoy who had killed his father. They took us in this way through the bazaars to the citadel, and made us halt at a place where the ameer looked at us. They took the chains from Allahdad Khan's neck and legs, and released me. Like other three prisoners out of the citadel and killed them. I saw their bodies half an hour afterwards. The Hindoo was killed first, and then Yoosoof, who told the executioner to sharpen his knife, that he might not suffer pain. He then raised his hands and eyes towards heaven, and his throat was cut. This one of the spectators told me. This happened on Friday, the 30th of Rebiee-ool Akhir (the 10th of June). Yoosoof, when in the well, like other prisoners out of the citadel and killed them. I saw their bodies half an hour afterwards. The Hindoo was killed first, and then Yoosoof, who told the executioner to sharpen his knife, that he might not suffer pain. He then raised his hands and eyes towards heaven, and his throat was cut. This one of the spectators told me. This happened on Friday, the 30th of Rebiee-ool Akhir (the 10th of June). Yoosoof, while in the well, had become a Mussulman, to escape the ill-treatment of the criminals, who would give him nothing to eat. He was not circumcised, but he said the kilmeh.

"Allahdad Khan and I were told we were at liberty to go where we pleased.

"I went to live with the ameer's visier's father, who was a merchant and [illegible] man, who [illegible] a great deal [illegible] ly in [illegible] clothing, and a Candahar merchant of my acquaintance gave me fifteen ducats.

"The next morning a secret message came from Captain Conolly, saying he had heard that I and Allahdad Khan had been killed, and that he was full of anxiety.

"On Sunday or Monday the ameer sent to Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly a message that he would free them in a few days, and told them to be of good heart. On Tuesday, at night, their quarters were entered by [illegible] men, who carried them off to separate cells. I [illegible] no know whether it was in the Black Well, or somewhere. In stripping Colonel Stoddart a lead pencil was found in the lining of his coat, and some papers in his vest. These were taken to the ameer, who [illegible] that Colonel Stoddart should be beaten with heavy sticks until he disclosed who brought the papers, and to whom he wrote. He was most violently beaten, but he revealed nothing; he was beaten perpetually for two or three days. On Friday, the 8th or 9th (the 7th) of Jemmadee-ool Evvel (12th of June), the ameer gave orders that Colonel Stoddart should be killed in the presence of Captain Conolly, so as to afford the latter the full benefit of the example of a Mahomedan. In the afternoon they were taken outside the city, to the street, which is a kind of small square. Their hands were tied across in front. Many people assembled to behold the spectacle. Their graves were dug before their eyes. Colonel Stoddart commenced reading the creed in the tyranny of the ameer. His head was then cut off with a knife.

"The chief executioner then turned to Captain Conolly and said, 'The ameer spares your life if you will become a Mussulman.' Captain Conolly answered, 'Colonel Stoddart has been a Mussulman for three years, and you have killed him. You killed Yoosoof, too. I will not be a Mussulman, and I am ready to die.' Saying which he stretched forth his neck. His head was then cut off.

"Their bodies were interred in the graves which had been dug, and I myself have seen the spot and the small tombs which mark the place.

"One of the executioners gave me the foregoing relation; and, moreover, he offered to throw me the heads, if I chose, that I might take them with me, but I refused this offer."

"TEHERAN, Nov. 23, 1842.—Besides the internal evidence of truth contained in the foregoing narrative, I wish to add that the appearance and manners of the Akhoondzydeh, who is a most intelligent and respectable young man, contribute highly in strengthening the impression in favour of his veracity. "JUSTIN SHEIL."

THE REBUILDING OF EXETER 'CHANGE.—The old adage, "Out of sight out of mind," is not true as regards this once ancient and venerable pile. The Marquis of Exeter, with a spirit worthy of his high and honourable name, is about to restore the building to its [illegible] familiar to our boyish recollections. The erection of a new and elegant arcade from the lower end of Catherine-street, in the Strand, to King street, Covent garden, is already commenced, which building will be known by the name of "Ex. ter 'Change." The architecture of the principal entrances of the proposed arcade is of the Elizabethan style, with red brick and stone; and the interior, having a curvilinear roof of glass the entire length of the building, will be fitted up with shops, exclusively appropriated to the sale of hardware, as in the ancient building. The whole will be erected at the sole cost of the noble marquis. The architect is Mr. Sydney Smirke; Messrs. Grissell and Peto the builders.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE postponed until next session his motion respecting the affairs of Scinde.—Lord WHARNCLIFFE laid upon the table the papers which had been moved for respecting the dismissal of Lord Lauderdale from the magistracy. The Duke of WELLINGTON, in moving that their lordships do resolve themselves into committee on the Chelsea Hospital Out-pensioners Bill, detailed at length the objects and nature of the measure. The bill went through committee; to be read a third time on Tuesday.—The Irish Poor-law Amendment Bill was read a third time and passed.—Several bills were forwarded a stage, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair to-day at twelve o'clock.—The Limerick Church Bill was read a third time and passed.—On the motion of Sir T. FREMANTLE, a writ was ordered to issue for the election of a member for the county of Argyll, in the room of Alexander Campbell, Esq., who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.—The SPEAKER informed the house that the securities entered into for prosecuting the petition complaining of the undue return of Mr. Bright for the city of Durham were unobjectionable.—The order of the day was read for further considering the report on the Slave Trade Suppression Bill.—Sir T. WILDE proposed a number of verbal amendments on some of the clauses.—A desultory conversation ensued. The discussion which arose related entirely to verbal and technical amendments in different clauses of the bill.—The bill was ordered to be engrossed.—Captain FITZROY, gave notice, that early next session he should bring in a bill to limit the period of persons being imprisoned for the non-payment of assessed taxes; and another bill for the repeal of the window duty.—Mr. HARVEY moved for the following return, viz.:—"Copies or extracts of any communications which may have been made to the Government upon the subject, either from Queen Pomare, the British officers or functionaries, or from the missionaries, in the Society Islands, relating to the proceedings of the French at Tahiti."—Sir R. PEEL feared it would be inconvenient to press this motion, as negotiations on the subject were now going forward with the French Government.—The motion was withdrawn.—Several bills were passed through committee.—The Lords' amendments to several bills were read and agreed to.—In reply to a question from Mr. HORTHWICK, Sir R. PEEL said he was unable to answer the question whether Espartero had resigned the regency of the country—an unfortunate nobleman merely, or as Regent of Spain; but this he would say, that he should be received with every distinction due to his high rank and great services to his country.—Mr. HUME inquired if any communication had been entered into with the four great powers, for the purpose of having [illegible] to settle the affairs of Spain?—Sir R. PEEL replied in the negative. The orders of the day were then dispensed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The royal assent was given by commission to the Customs Duties Bill; the Carlisle Churches Bill; the Wicklow Bill, West India Islands Relief Bill, Episcopal Functions Bill, Militia Pay Bill, Apprehension of Offenders (France) Bill, the Apprehension of Offenders (America) Bill, China Government Bill, Law of Evidence (Ireland) Bill, Solicitors (Ireland) Bill, Writs of Error Bill, Warrant of Attorneys Bill, Hackney and Stage Carriage Bill, Copyright of Design Bill, Coroners' Duties Bill, Theatres Regulation Bill, Turnpike Acts Bill, Conveyancing Bill, Attorneys, &c. (Scotland and Ireland) Bill, Arms (Ireland) Bill, Grand Jury Presentment (Ireland) Bill, Allotment of Rates (Dublin) Bill, Court of Exchequer (Ireland) Bill, and several private Bills.—The Foreign Jurisdiction Bill, the Chelsea Hospital Out-Pensioners Bill, the Municipal Corporations Bill, and the British Iron Company Bill, were respectively read a third time and passed.—Lord CAMPBELL, in moving that their lordships agree to the amendments made by the House of Commons on the Defamation and Libel Bill, while regretting some of these amendments, expressed in a fervent hope that the bill would still have the effect of putting a stop to certain disreputable newspapers, with how many privileged by publishing or threatening to publish libels on individuals. The old maxim of "the greater the truth the greater the libel," was now put an end to. The truth would now be admitted, and the jury could have to try only whether it was for the public good that the imputation was cast on the plaintiff. If it were proved to be wanton and malicious, the jury would find it in favour, but if it were proved to be for the public benefit, then they would find for the defendant.—The Lord CHANCELLOR spoke in favour of the bill, and the Commons' amendments were agreed to.—The Loan Societies (Ireland) Bill, and the Chelsea Out-pensioners Bill were read a third time and passed.—The Commons' amendments to the Slave Trade Suppression Bill were agreed to.—Lord TEYNHAM moved for returns relating to the operation of the poor-laws, and stated it to be his intention, together with the Government might not, amongst themselves, agree to exert their influence in procuring some extension of out-door relief; and next to suggest the propriety of her Majesty's Government appointing a board of inquiry, and next session, a select committee to inquire generally into its operation.—The returns were ordered; and their lordships adjourned to twelve o'clock on Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The amendments made by the House of Lords in the Irish Poor-law Amendment Bill, and in the Irish Municipal Corporations Bill, were respectively agreed to.—Colonel SIBTHORP presented a petition against the numerous assemblages collected by Father Mathew, Sir J. GRAHAM replied, that he had not heard of anything done by Father Mathew which had, in any manner, violated the law. The Slave Trade Suppression Bill was read a third time and passed.—The Lords' amendments to the Foreign Jurisdiction Bill were agreed to.—Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he had given the subject of the Lords' amendments to the state the modification of parishes in Scotland, according to his promise, but that he would not introduce any bill this session on the subject of the law of settlement, as a report on this last subject had been made by the commissioners upon which report the Government acted, and which he had ordered to be printed for circulation. The house adjourned to twelve o'clock on Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Her Majesty proceeded in state this afternoon along the royal line of route from Buckingham Palace to the Houses of Parliament, for the purpose of closing the session in person. The weather, which had been gloomy all the morning, cleared up at noon, and the sun shone out cheeringly upon her Majesty and her numerous and dutiful subjects who thronged the parks and streets leading to the entrance of the House of Lords commanding a view of the royal procession. Her Majesty was received at the House of Lords by the Officers of State; and, having [illegible] the House of Commons to be summoned to the [illegible] orily after the members of the Lower House, headed by the Speaker, appeared at the [illegible] Majesty was then pleased to deliver the following speech from the throne:—

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The state of public business enables me to close this protracted session, and to release you from your parliamentary duties sooner than usual.

"I thank you for the readiness and liberality with which you have voted the supplies for the current year. It will be my constant object to combine a strict regard to economy with the consideration which is due to the exigencies of the public service.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"In some districts of Wales the public peace has been interrupted by [illegible] lawless combinations and disturbances, committed with political views. I have adopted the measures which I deemed best calculated for the repression of outrage, and for the effectual punishment of the offenders.

"I have at the same time directed an inquiry to be made into the circumstances which have led to insubordination and violence in a part of the country usually distinguished [illegible] for the [illegible] power, the benevolent efforts which are made to stir up discontent and [illegible] ty subjects in Ireland, and to excite a demand for [illegible]

"It has been, and ever will be, my earnest desire to administer the government of that country in a spirit of strict justice and impartiality, and to co-operate with parliament in such modifications in the existing laws as may tend to improve the social condition and to develop the natural resources of Ireland.

"From a deep conviction that the legislative union is not less essential to the attainment of these objects than to the strength and stability of the empire, it is my firm determination, with your support, and under the blessing of Divine Providence, to maintain inviolate that great bond of connection between the two countries.

"I have forborne from requiring any additional powers for the counteraction of designs hostile to the concord and peace of my dominions [illegible] from my unwillingness to distrust the efficacy of the ordinary law, as from my re on the solemn

[illegible] tenance and [illegible] manner to discourage to the utmost of their power a system of [illegible] Irish agitation, which disturbs the industry and retards the improvement [illegible] of the country, and excites feelings of mutual distrust and animosity between different classes of my people."

The Parliament was then declared prorogued to Thursday the 19th of October by the Lord Chancellor; and the royal party returned, in the same order as they had set out, to Buckingham Palace.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, THURSDAY.

The Speaker took the chair shortly after half-past one o'clock.—Mr. E. TENNENT presented a petition from Belfast against the repeal of the union.

[illegible] Government and the Emperor has positively refused to hold any communication with the Government of Bokhara.—Mr. HUME begged to ask the head of her Majesty's Government if they had [illegible]

[illegible] the Government of this country to take care, without expressing any opinion, that British interests were not injured.—In answer to Mr. EWART, respecting the address on the part of the public to see the interesting monuments of antiquity in the Lansdown and other public buildings, Sir R. PEEL said that he had no authority in the matter, except by the strong expression of his opinion, which he had already given. The Government were willing, by the assistance of the police in order, but he found by the example of the free admission to the exhibition of the cartoons lately, and that of the [illegible]

[illegible] such practice was unnecessary.

[illegible] payment, that any [illegible] come to public monuments. [illegible] instances they were themselves the best police.—Sir A. Clifford here entered the House, and shortly minutes past two o'clock, and soon announced that her Majesty commanded the attendance of the house in the House of Lords, to hear her Majesty's Speech from the Throne. After a short absence, the Speaker having returned, and read the Speech at the table, the different members surrounding him, the house broke up.

Their Royal Highnesses consequently remained on board at Chatham until Monday morning.

SUDDEN DEPARTURE OF THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE AND THE DUKE D'AUMALE.

[illegible] Woolwich, Wednesday Morning.—Instructions were received from the Admiralty this afternoon, by Sir [illegible] to prepare for the reception of the Prince de Joinville and Aumale, who are expected to arrive here at ten o'clock [illegible] ing in the morning, and to inspect the vessels [illegible] ceive them on their arrival. Everything is in readiness [illegible] French steamers to put to sea immediately; it is stated that the departure of the French princes has been [illegible] of a somewhat unexpected arrangement. THE NATIONAL GALLERY AND THE CARTOONS.—A fine full-length portrait of Miss Sidney, the great actress, has been recently added to the collection of pictures in the National Gallery. It was painted by Sir Thomas Lawrence, and was presented to the Government for exhibition in the gallery [illegible] Birmingham. The picture is placed in the same room as that of Mr. [illegible] Kemble, as Hamlet, by the same master, and it attracts much notice, the above gallery is not now, nor has it been for some weeks past, so well [illegible] in consequence, as one of the most popular and [illegible] Exhibition in Westminster Hall. Though the door keepers do not [illegible] more exclude no person on account of dress, it has been remarked that [illegible]

[illegible] REPORT OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON SHIPWRECKS.—On [illegible] the select committee appointed by Government to inquire into the [illegible] shipwreck of British vessels, and the means of preserving the lives and property of shipwrecked persons, issued their first report. In [illegible] with those points which more especially relate to the security of British shipping, and the committee (upon which, amongst others, are the names of [illegible] Lord Ingestre, Admiral Dundas, Sir Howard Douglas, Captain Beechey, Mr. Plumridge, Captain Fitzroy, Captain Scobell, Sir. Gladstone, and Mr. Bulkley) report that the loss of British ships during the years 1841, 1842 and 1843, as compared with 1836 [illegible] so far as could be [illegible] ered at Lloyd's, has been less during the [illegible] ood, more especially as regards lives [illegible] employed on board. The committee lay considerable stress on the necessity for [illegible] competent masters, mates, and pilots, [illegible] constructing efficient lighthouses and beacons, and carefully revising the charts now in use. They recommend the utmost attention of Government to the construction of harbours of refuge, but offer no decided opinion as to the use of the floating breakwater, though they suggest that such rational works, when constructed, should possess the advantage of having powerful batteries.

RAILWAY BILLS.—By a parliamentary return just issued some interesting information is afforded respecting the number of railway bills brought into the House of Commons, with the number of Acts which have been passed since the close of the year 1839. In 1840, the number of bills was 27; in 1841, 24; in 1842, 2[illegible]; and in 1843, 31; total, 105. It appears from the return that of the [illegible] introduced in 1840, 23 became Acts of Parliament in [illegible] and in the present session, 22. The return further shows the number of plans deposited for the last three sessions of Parliament at the Private Bill office. The number was 63.

AN INDIAMAN ON SHORE IN THE RIVER.—On Tuesday, as the ship Bencoolen, of 417 tons register, Captain Stamp, from Calcutta, was coming up the river with the flood tide, in tow of a steamer, for the London docks, she went too close in shore, and grounded on the hard causeway at the Horse Ferry, nearly opposite to the Regent's Canal, and all attempts to get her off proved ineffectual. At low water the Bencoolen remained high and dry; and as she had a heavy cargo on board, and her resting place is not level, her situation may be considered one of considerable peril. Measures were taken to lighten her; and as the tides ever prevent pumping, it was [illegible] would get off at the next high tide to [illegible] A. Hornby, and sent them to their respective occupations. [illegible] Sutherland, as a passenger on board the vessel, [illegible] which was [illegible] Bencoolen belongs to R. B. Brown, Esq., the extensive shipowner, in Lower Southwell.

THE VELOCE AND THE LIZARD STEAMERS.—The Dchats gives the following account of this affair:—"It has been stated in the English journals that, in the unfortunate collision of the Veloce steamer and the Lizard, the French were altogether in the wrong. We can comprehend that the partizans of the vessel which is lost shou d seek to exculpate themselves as much as they can. We must observe, however, at the first [illegible] that there were no [illegible] threw her on the English vessel, that we can cite in reply a letter in the Toulon papers, in which it is affirmed that the French vessel displayed the lights required by the regulations, both on the forecastle and at the mast head; that no manœuvre had been made, as the captain was well convinced that the English vessel, which had been long perceived by the men on the look-out, had full space to steer clear; that it was the English vessel which made this unfortunate manœuvre which brought her against the Veloce, and that at the moment of the collision, there was no officer on the deck of the English vessel. In the midst of such contradictory statements, but which no one, however, has a right to suspect, we consider that the most prudent step to take will be to wait for the result of the inquiry, which it is the intention of the two navies to call for. We think that we may declare that we have no fear for this result, as far as the French navy is concerned. The Veloce was commanded by an officer of distinguished merit, Captain Leon du Parc, long accustomed to steamers. It is he whom in 1837 commanded the Phare, and when proceeding back to France the Duke de Nemours, after the taking of Constantine, saved, in the midst of a tempest, the English 80 gun ship the Rodney. The [illegible] [illegible] of honour from the English Admiralty, a most flattering letter from Admiral Stopford, to Captain du Parc. The remembrance of this conduct ought to have rendered certain of the English press to mitigate the disobliging terms with which the loss of the Lizard has been adorned."

PROPERTY DISCOVERED NEAR THE WRECK OF THE SOLWAY STEAMER.—The George Canning, Ann from Drogheda, arrived at Southampton on Monday in charge of Mr. Lane and Mr. Widden, late of the Solway, after a most strenuous but unsuccessful attempt to recover part of the property lost in that ship, in consequence of the continued heavy swell and prevalence of the north and north east winds, which rendered it impossible to ride at anchor near the Solway; and, although they made fast to the main vessel, often when hanging by the fogging, step up, they could not lay one enough to attempt to go down with the diving apparatus. These circumstances have, however, saved some spars and rigging and succeeded in adding hands to the British name—after the failure of [illegible] having recovered from the wreck of the French brig [illegible] which was [illegible] years since, nine miles from the wreck of the Solway, to the westward, and also [illegible] by the Siccara Islands, [illegible] guineas, for which were 80 pounders, [illegible] tons each; five long thirty-two's, and four [illegible] with chain-cables, [illegible] of battle-ship mooring [illegible] Attempts had been previously made both by the French and Spaniards to effect this recovery, but without success. The George Canning picked up in the creeps of the Channel, a figure-head of a vessel, probably of 200 or 300 tons; it has a fallen head, with a cancl on the larboard side, perfect, representing the bust of a crowned head; the starboard shield appears to have been knocked away.

ARRIVAL OF ESPARTERO, REGENT OF SPAIN.—Her Majesty's war-steamer Prometheus, Commander Frederick Lowe, arrived at Woolwich dockyard on Wednesday morning, shortly after seven o'clock, having on board General Espartero and suite. The following communication was immediately forwarded to the Captain Superintendent of the Dockyard, Sir Francis Collier, K.C.H., by Commander Lowe:—

"Her Majesty's Ship Prometheus, Woolwich, Aug. 23.

"Sir,—I have to acquaint you that I sailed from Admiral Sir C. Rowley, Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth, I left Spithead, in the steam ship under my command, on the 21st instant, having on board his excellency the Duke of Victoria, for Havre de Grace, which port I reached yesterday evening; and having taken on board his excellency, Regent of Spain, and suite, I sailed again the same tide for Woolwich, and arrived here this morning. "I have the honour to be, your very obedient servant,

"FREDERICK LOWE, Lieut.-Com.

"To Capt. Su

On receipt of the above, Sir Francis Collier immediately proceeded on board the Prometheus, and having been introduced to his excellency, Sir Francis, on the part of the Government, at once explained to the Regent that every accommodation, both to himself and his suite, would be most gladly tendered. Sir Francis expressed to his excellency that carriages for the conveyance of himself and suite to town were in readiness. His excellency, however, declined the offer, having previously arranged to embark in a small above-stairs steamer for Hungerford stairs, where the carriages of the embassy would be in attendance to receive him. His excellency added that he wished his visit to be as private as possible. His excellency, who appeared to be in remarkably good health and spirits, conversed, in the French language, for some time with Sir Francis Collier, and took occasion to express to that gallant officer, in the most [illegible] terms, his gratitude for the [illegible] received from the British authorities from the moment he placed his foot on board the Meander ship of war, the Duchess of Victoria and the Donna Maria Espartero (the Regent's daughter), also expressed their acknowledgments. Despatches were immediately forwarded to London, announcing the Regent's arrival at Woolwich. Lord Boonmead, commandant of the royal arsenal, arrived at the dockyard shortly after twelve o'clock, and went off to pay his respects to his excellency. Shortly before two o'clock, the Waterman Company's steamer (No. 9) went alongside the Prometheus, for the purpose of receiving his excellency and suite, and having taken the whole of them on board, at once proceeded to Hungerford wharf, where carriages were in waiting to convey the party to Mivart's Hotel. The following is a correct list of the persons and officers who have arrived by the Prometheus:—His Highness the Duke of Victoria, Regent of Spain; her Highness the Duchess of Victoria; Donna Emilia Espartero; his Excellency Don A. Van Halen, Count of Varcarlos; his Excellency Don Ag. Noguera, Minister of War; his Excellency Don F. Gomez de la Serna, Minister of the Interior; Don Juan Lacarte, Brigadier General; Don Fernando Batprriche, Inspector of Medicine; Don Cristobal Garcia, Military Intendant; Don Cipriano Montesano, Secretary to his Highness's Household; Don Juan Rodriguez, Secretary to the Minister of the Interior. The military officers accompanying his Excellency are—Don Pedro Falcon, Don Rafael Mendieta, Don Vicente Jarauberri, Don Jose de Lorca, Conde de Luchana, Don Blas Ona, Don Francisco Serrano, Don Lucano Mariesta, and Don Barnon Meroliano. The only servants in attendance are three maids, and one female domestic. An accurate portrait of Espartero, executed by a first rate artist, will be found in the 27th number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

FATHER MATHEW IN WESTMINSTER.—On Wednesday, in pursuance of announcement by public placards, the Rev. Theobald Mathew commenced his total abstinence labours amongst the inhabitants of the city and liberties of Westminster. [illegible] the procession was with a splendid pair of grand, the property of the Marquis of Westminster, situate on the western side of Vauxhall-bridge, and immediately opposite to the gate leading to the General Penitentiary, Millbank. Mr. Cubitt, the noble marquis's agent, having granted permission. Several attempts were made to [illegible] the [illegible] under the orders of Superintendent Lowry, prevented anything serious taking place. Notwithstanding the continued heavy rain during the afternoon, the "Apostle" and his temperance friends continued their labours with unabated ardour, and at the conclusion of the proceedings it was stated that about 1200 had taken the pledge during the day. Father Mathew visited Westminster again on Thursday.

HUNGERFORD SUSPENSION BRIDGE COMPANY.—On Thursday last a general meeting of the directors and sharers of this company was held at the [illegible] Villiers-street, Strand. At the o'clock the chair was taken by Mr. William Hawes, one of the directors who, having opened the business [illegible] Mr. Lawrence, read the report. The report set forth a statement of the payments and receipts made on account of the company from its commencement. The total amount of the receipts being £79,897 16s., which included calls on shares to the [illegible] of July, 1843, £47,495; temporary loan of bankers, £6000; loan commissioners, £20,000; dividends and sundry items, &c. The payments were for the works, law and parliamentary expenses, directors, engineers, and surveyors' salary, &c., from the commencement, £37,701 18s.; the sum paid for approaches amounted to £14,555 6s.; the balance with the banker, deducting all expenses, being £7575 10s. The engineer's report stated that the bridge would be nearly completed in about four months. The total expense of the bridge will be about £60,000. Some other business of the company having been gone into, the proceedings terminated, a vote of thanks being previously passed to the chairman.

PAUPER RIOT IN ST. GEORGE'S WORKHOUSE.—On Tuesday night 103 were admitted into the casual paupers' ward, and the noise they made was quite intolerable to the inhabitants. Early in the morning the breadroom was forced open, and nearly 20 quartern loaves broken and strewed about in filth. At eight o'clock Mr. Lockart, the relieving officer, entered, for the purpose of apprehending the ringleaders, when he was immediately assailed with water and large pieces of bread, which compelled a man to retreat. He returned with a body of police, who soon quelled the disturbance, but, from the immense body of persons, it was impossible to detect the real delinquents. Mr. Robertson, the master, waited upon Mr. Traill for his advice, the result of which was the discharge of the whole. Nearly 1,000 persons were assembled at ten o'clock in the southwark-bridge-road, many of them of the lowest description. A body of police, under Inspector Horsby, arrived, and sent them to their respective occupations.

THE FIRE IN FOSTER LANE. FUNERAL OF THE FIVE SUFFERERS.—On Wednesday morning the remains of the late Mr Newbery were removed from the residence of his brother-in law, Mr. Weeding, Mecklenburgh-square, and interred in the family vault, at St. Andrew, Holborn; the mourners were Mr. Weeding, Mr. Pigeon, secretary to Christ's Hospital, Mr. Scott (with whom the deceased spent the evening previous to the awful calamity), and another friend. Shortly after the [illegible] the funeral [illegible] at her two sisters, Elizabeth and Margaret Mc[illegible] aged by twenty-four months. The [illegible] was [illegible] between 600 and 700 persons being present, many of whom shed tears. The burial service having been read by the curate, the Rev. Mr. Kerry, the four coffins were lowered into a sixteen-feet grave.

THE LATE FIRE IN TOOLEY-STREET.—A meeting of the parishioners of St. Olave's was held on Tuesday to consider what place should be selected for the performance of divine service during the rebuilding or repair of the parish church. It was proposed that the church of one of the neighbouring parishes should be requested to assign each a portion of their churches for the accommodation [illegible] [illegible] Church, and after a long discussion it was resolved that [illegible] be [illegible] Schoolhouse be rendered available for the purpose of divine service.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—Tuesday evening, about half-past eight o'clock, a man named William Dixon, aged 56, a water-maker, residing at No. 28, Hunter-street, Old Kent-road, was running across Fleet-street, he accidentally stumbled and pitched on his head. He was instantly conveyed in an insensible state to the station-house by police constables Newman and Gardner, 327 and 333, when Mr. Hutchinson, surgeon, of Farringdon street, was sent for, who promptly attended, together with two other medical gentlemen, but they pronounced life to be extinct, the deceased having breathed his last in about three minutes after he was brought to the station.

DREADFUL DEATH OF MR. AYMER, THE VAULTER.—This unfortunate [illegible] met with a melancholy death at the Lyceum Opera on Thursday se'nnight, admiration in his peculiar department, met his death on Thursday se'nnight, at the Circus of Mr. Batty, of the Royal Amphitheatre. The performance for which Mr. Aymer was announced concluded with a double summerset, and, in throwing it, [illegible] struck against [illegible] lighting on [illegible] his neck, and death was the immediate result. Mr. Batty, on hearing the fatal intelligence, immediately quitted London for Jersey, to render every assistance on the melancholy occasion. Smith, a great champion and vaulter, met his death in a manner precisely similar, during the management of Messrs. Durrow and West, at Astley's, some seasons past.

BURGLARY AT BRIGHTON.—On Saturday night, or early on Sunday morning, another burglary was committed in Brighton, on the premises of Mr. Packham, an extensive ironmonger residing in the Western-road. The thieves effected an entrance at the back part of the premises by climbing over a high wall on to the workshops, and cutting out a square of glass, unfastening the window, and entering by the first floor. The front shop was found ransacked, and a quantity of knives and other portable articles carried off; the till was forced open, but fortunately they only obtained about 10s. in silver. The workshop was visited, and a subscription box for the Sussex County Hospital carried off, containing about £3, the contributions of the workmen for that institution. The larder was then visited, and here the depredators stopped to regale themselves after the robbery, leaving ample testimony of "doing justice" to the contents. The burglary appears to have been effected by parties well acquainted with the premises.

FIRE ON BOARD A BRIG IN THE LONDON DOCKS.—On Wednesday morning, about o'clock, police constables H 148 and 183, while on duty on the east quay of the London Docks, observed that one of the vessels on the west jetty was on fire. They instantly gave the alarm, and hastened to the spot, and found the galley of a Spanish brig (the Generose packet) on fire. They immediately aroused the crew, all of whom were then visited, and here with their assistance, and under the direction of Inspector Walker, of the Thames police, who also attended, the flames were subdued; not, however, before considerable damage was done to the vessel.

ALARMING FIRE ON THE MERSEY.—About half-past ten o'clock on the morning of Monday last the crew of a brigantine called the Emerald, Captain Knobbs, which was lying at the north end of Canning Dock, Liverpool, and was ready for sea, discovered, from the smoke that issued from the forecastle, below decks, that combustion was going on amongst the cargo in the hold. Two engines were instantly came up, and four others were soon after on the ground, with a strong body of firemen. Great exertions were made, it being the general opinion that unless the flames were speedily subdued the fire would become uncontrollable. The vessel had on board about 12 casks of oil, a quantity of soft soap, 3 tons of rags, and 600 tons of [illegible] waste, and a considerable weight of brimstone; the whole so injudiciously stowed together that there can be little doubt but that spontaneous combustion had resulted from some of the oil coming in contact, by leakage or otherwise, with the regular dunnage. After tonnage for some time in the hold, and getting a quantity of casks, &c., out, Mr. Hewitt, superintendent of the fire police, guided by the colour of the smoke, at length hit the right point upon which to pay, and in about an hour all further apprehension of the igniting of the oil was overcome. One of the policemen on duty was rendered so insensible by the suffocating smoke in the hold that, when brought on deck, he fell down and appeared to be a lifeless corpse. He afterwards so far recovered as to be able to assist in hoisting up the goods.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Wednesday morning Mr. Baker and a highly respectable jury assembled at the George, Old-street, St. Luke's, to inquire into the death of Thomas Brook, Esq., of Union place, Islington, aged 57 years, who dropped down dead while attending a meeting of the Income and Property-tax Commissioners, and under examination before them at their office in Finsbury-square. His death was occasioned by apoplexy, and the jury returned a verdict to that effect.

MANSLAUGHTER.—On Wednesday Mr. Baker concluded the inquest on the body of Matilda Harriet Bailey, who was stabbed by William Pescock, under circumstances already related in this journal. Mr. Gillett, a surgeon, who had opened the body, said he found a wound between the fifth and sixth ribs on the left side; it was three inches in depth, extending one inch into the left lobe of the lungs, and thereby causing death. The Coroner having addressed the jury, they found a verdict of "Manslaughter against PESCOCK," who was committed on the coroner's warrant.

DISCOVERY OF A SKELETON AT WINDSOR.—On Monday last some workmen, who were employed in removing the earth in the garden belonging to one of the canons of Windsor, on the north side, and in the immediate vicinity of St. George's Chapel, discovered, about twenty inches below the surface, a skeleton of a man, apparently of six feet in height, in a very fair state of preservation. Not the most remote appearance of a coffin, or of any wood of which it might have been composed, was found near the spot. The soil enclosing the garden, which has just been removed, had been erected for upwards of three centuries, and there is very little doubt that the body must have been there privately buried ever since that early period—probably so far back as the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The skull, which was otherwise quite perfect, was injured by its having been pierced by the pickaxe of the workman. The lower jaw contained but one tooth, and that was in an excellent state of preservation. The bones of the arms and arms were of an extraordinary length and thickness, nearly equal to that the man, when living, must have possessed immense strength and power. The body had been laid towards the east, and according to the mode of interment adopted in nearly all countries, in the contrary direction. The bones have been deposited by [illegible] in the [illegible] cemetery, in the new catacombs, which has just been constructed at the north-eastern end of St. George's Chapel. It may be mentioned that the ground in which the skeleton was found, notwithstanding its proximity to St. George's Chapel, is not consecrated; and therefore is therefore no doubt that the body was interred, just beneath the surface, without the form of Christian burial.

REBECCA AT WINCHESTER.—We hear that some consternation was excited on Saturday last in the mind of the toll-taker at St. Cross gate, from a paper having been affixed to the gate, announcing that Rebecca would shortly pay him a visit. The peaceful village of St. Cross is, we dare to say it, perfectly free from any danger of the sort; but, if ever a public wrong, pertaciously persisted in, justified a physical force remedy, the gate of St. Cross would be that wrong. It has been over and over again its own that its removal to the other side of the village would produce no serious diminution of tolls. The affairs of the trust are so flourishing that they have for years past been wantonly (we may almost say) spending their revenues, and yet they will not remove the abominable nuisance, nearly every other tax, the paying of a toll for passing into the city, of which they are now a component part, and to all the rates and imposts of which they are liable.—Hants Independent.

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION AT CORK.

The thirteenth meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science commenced at Cork on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 16th inst., this being the second time that these meetings have been held in the "sister island," the former meeting, which was the fifth, having been held in Dublin. The city of Cork had, prior to the late meeting at Manchester, sent but one invitation; still its applications then were so strongly and influentially supported that it was selected, notwithstanding a very powerful application from York, where thirteen years since the association took its rise, and where it is understood that the meeting for the ensuing year will be held. In the selection of officers, those for the present year have never been exceeded in efficiency or intelligence. The president is the Earl of Rosse (better known, perhaps, as Lord Oxmantown), a nobleman celebrated in the annals of science as one of the first astronomers of the day, and whose fame has recently become European from the construction of his gigantic telescope; whilst the vice-presidents are the Earl of Listowel and Viscount Adare, M.P., two noblemen highly esteemed in this vicinity; with Sir W. Hamilton, the President of the Royal Irish Academy, and Astronomer Royal; and Dr. Robinson, Dean of Armagh, equally celebrated as a mathematician and astronomer. The local secretaries are Professor Stevelly, the well-known mathematician, of Belfast; the Rev. J. Carson, the eminent statist, of Dublin; with Mr. W. Clear and Mr. W. Kelleher, two gentlemen well known in the district from their extensive scientific acquirements. The council for perfecting the local arrangements contains the names of individuals equally distinguished in scientific attainments.

It is but fair to acknowledge that the citizens of Cork have proved themselves worthy of the above preference, by the liberal scale upon which preparations were made for the reception of the association. The locale fixed for the reception of members, to be devoted to the places of meeting, and other incidental expenses, exceeded six hundred pounds. All the interesting local, mechanical, and intellectual sources of gratification were thrown open to the members. The means of intercourse with Liverpool, Bristol, Dublin, and Glasgow were increased by additional steam-packets being placed on at those ports, and whatever Cork might lack in the means of affording intellectual gratification was made up for in the hospitality of the inhabitants. To keep up the spirit of excitement which generally exists during the week in the towns where these meetings are held, the proprietor of the theatre announced the engagement of Miss Novello and her sister, Miss Sabilla Novello.

A great influx of members took place on Wednesday morning, on the arrival of the Bristol, Liverpool, Dublin, and Glasgow steamers, and the strangers were, on their arrival at the reception room, met by a committee consisting of the Mayor, Archdeacon Kyle, General Austin, Sir Thomas Deane, Sir James Pitcairn, and other leading citizens, who took it in turns to be in attendance at the room. Amongst those who arrived are—the Earl of Rosse and family; the Marquis of Northampton; Sir T. D. Acland, M.P.; Sir C. Lemon, M.P.; Mr. R. I. Murchison, President of the Geological Society, who came expressly from the Continent to attend the meeting, accompanied by Lieutenant Kochsarroff, a Russian engineer, now employed by the Russian Government in a survey of the Carpathian Mountains; Sir William Hamilton, Astronomer-Royal of Ireland; Dr. Robinson, of Armagh; the Dean of Ely; Colonel Sabine, F.R.S.; Mr. J. Griffith, President of the Royal Geological Society of Ireland; Dr. Hamel, Councillor of State, from Russia; M. Hoetuis, from Maestricht; Dr. F. Tannau, Berlin; M. Canlebrana, Bolanos, Mexico; Dr. Lauberg, Christiana; Professors Lyall, of London, Apjohn, M'Cullagh, and Lloyd, of Dublin; Professor Forbes, of London; Mr. W. H. Hughes, High Sheriff of Hampshire; Professor Kane, of Dublin; Mr. W. Snow Harris; the Bishop of Killaloe; Mr. Charles Dickens; Professor Wheatstone, &c. The visitors from Glasgow and Dublin were brought over by the Vanguard, a new iron steamer, of 330-horse power and 700 tons burthen, which made this its first voyage from Dublin to Cork in thirteen hours, being five hours less than the shortest voyage ever before made.

Before we proceed to the business of the meeting we shall present to our readers a sketch of the preparations for the reception of the distinguished visitors; with a series of illustrations, the drawings for which (with the exception of those of the Cove, the Courthouse, and the Imperial Hotel) have been executed with much taste and skill, by James Mahony, Esq., of Cork.

VIEW OF THE COVE OF CORK.

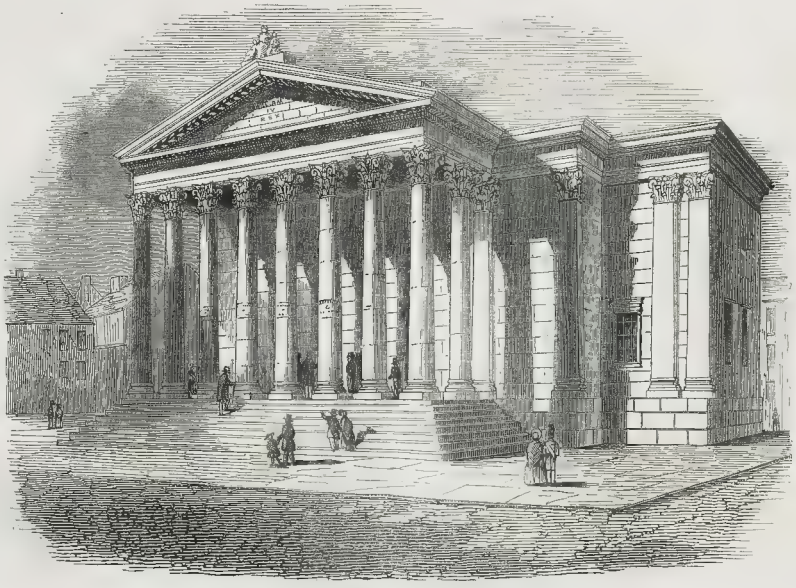
First, is a picturesque view of or harbour, which is so commodious, that it will admit the largest vessels at any time of the tide without striking sail, and has a landlocked anchorage, ten fathoms water in some places, and in seven fathoms water within a cable's length of the shore. On the days of the late meeting, the Cove presented a very animated appearance; and just previously, a series of grand fêtes were given on board several of the ships of war lying here. That on board the Tyne (the admiral's ship) was on a very grand scale, nearly three hundred of the élite of the town and neighbourhood of Cove assembled, and continued the merry dance until morning. The vessel was very tastefully fitted up, having a spacious saloon on the deck, and on the gun-deck a splendid supper was laid out. A grand display of fireworks was exhibited as soon as the company assembled, and nothing was left undone to increase the comfort and amusement of the guests. Next is a a very fine city, surpassed by few in the excellence or width of its streets, and beginning to be remarkable for the architectural beauty of its public buildings; of these, three are shown in the view, viz., the Savings' Bank, Anglesey Bridge, and the Corn Exchange.



COURT HOUSE, GREAT GEORGE-STREET.

THE COURT-HOUSE,

in Great George-street, and erected by Messrs. Pain, and is a magnificent structure. The front range of Corinthian columns projects from the building about 20 feet. The columns are 30 feet high from the approach, which is by a flight of 11 steps. The width of the portico is 72 feet, and height from the ground to the top of the group of figures on the apex of the pediment, is 66 feet. The group represents Justice between Law and Mercy. The area measures 280 feet in length, by 190 in depth. It contains two semicircular courts, in the rear of which are the public offices of the same.

THE COMMERCIAL BUILDINGS, AND IMPERIAL HOTEL.

In the former was the inquiry-room, to which members invariably made their way on their first arrival in the town. The Imperial Hotel, adjoining, is stated to extend over an English acre of ground. The principal room in this establishment is 75 feet long by 35 feet broad, and 25 feet high; a corridor communicates with another room 60 feet long by 30 feet broad; and this again with another room 56 feet long by 38 feet broad, and 22 feet high. Here were held the association promenades and soirées. In this spacious hotel, accommodation was provided by the local council for 130 guests; and Lloyd's and the Victoria Hotels were alike secured for the accommodation of the members. We now come to

THE MODEL ROOM,

(Agricultural Museum,) fitted up in the left wing of the Corn Exchange. This room was filled with articles of manufacture and machinery; in the foreground of our sketch is a Jacquard poplin loom and ingenious brocading machine for weaving in coloured flowers, with gold and silver, which was at work each day during the meeting of the British Association. Messrs. Atkinson and Co., of College Green, Dublin, the poplin manufacturers, forwarded this very curious poplin loom, with two of their most skilful weavers; and the gold tissue poplin pattern woven was the same as Messrs. Atkinson and Co. had the honour of manufacturing for her most gracious Majesty the Queen. It is a most tasteful and superb specimen of Irish manufacture. Next is formed one of the principal points of attraction. The noble saloon shown in the engraving is 75 feet square, and high in proportion, and it was refurnished and decorated for the occasion. It was newly floored, and at the further end was a dias, or raised platform, on which lecturers and members took their places. It was brilliantly lit with gas, in six large lustres, and the fittings displayed good taste and ingenuity. The Cork arms were beautifully painted over the great entrance; and the imperial crown, with the letters "V.R.," shone radiantly high above the chair. The reunions here were extremely brilliant.

Amongst the other various attractions which Cork presented on this interesting occasion were the exhibition of the Cork Art-Union, with a collection of paintings by living artists, and a few pictures by Barry and Grogan. The Cork Institution underwent a lustration for the occasion; and the fine collection of statues, the gift of George IV., to the society, was much admired. The Cork Library and the Chamber of Commerce were also prepared for the visitors. There was likewise a superb exhibition of the Horticultural Society; so that the city presented a continued round of recreation to the naturalist and the artist, the man of science and the man of pleasure.

The places of meeting appointed for the sections were very convenient, those of A, Mathematical and Physical Science; C, Geology and Physical Geography; D, Natural History; and G, Mechanical Science, being held in the Court House in the Great George-street. Section B, Chemistry and Mineralogy, at the Royal Institution, Nelson-place, Patrick-street; Section E, Medical Science, at College-buildings, Warren's-place; and Section F, Statistics, at the very appropriate place of the Chamber of Commerce.

The presidents appointed to the different sections were—A, Mathematics and Physics, Professor M'Cullagh, of Dublin; B, Chemistry and Mineralogy, Professor Apjohn, of Dublin; C, Geology and Physical Geography, Mr. Richard Griffiths; D, Natural History, Mr. E. Thomson; E, Medical Science, Sir James Pitcairn, M.D.; F, Statistics, Sir Charles Lemon; and G, Mechanical Science, Professor M'Neill, of Dublin.

We have not space to detail the preliminary arrangements of the association; but the following resolution, which was unanimously carried, gave very great satisfaction:—

That a inscribers to the local fund, being members of the British Association, shall have the privilege of obtaining tickets to admit ladies to all the meetings of the association on the following terms—subscribers of £1 to obtain one ticket for 10s., and subscribers of more, two tickets at that level. Subscribers who do not wish to avail themselves of the above privilege, to obtain tickets to admit ladies to the soirées alone, without charge, in the same ratio as above stated.

Professor Phillips suggested the propriety of allowing the privilege to extend to young men, being the sons of members of the British Association, who are contributors to the local fund, or at the recommendation of two members of the association, which was agreed to.

The business of the association commenced on Wednesday afternoon with the first meeting of the general committee, at the College-rooms, Warren's-place, the Earl of Rosse, president elect, in the chair. The meeting was very fully attended, and the proceedings were of a very interesting character.

Professor Phillips, the assistant secretary, read the minutes of the last meeting at Manchester, and also a letter from Modena to Dr. Faraday, acknowledging the invitation of the Royal Society there for a deputation to attend the present meeting.

Colonel Sabine, F.R.S., one of the general secretaries, read the report of the council. It stated that, in obedience to a resolution passed the last year at Manchester, appointing a committee to communicate with the council of the Royal Society to join them in making an application to the Government to defray the expenses of the publication of the reduction of the catalogue of stars in the "Histoire Celeste," and of the catalogue of stars in the southern hemisphere made by Lalande, which had been effected at the expense of the association; such application had been made, but refused by the Royal Society. An application had, however, been made direct to Sir Robert Peel for the grant of £1000 for the purpose, and which, after a minute inquiry as to the manner in which the funds of the society had been expended, and the circumstances under which the reductions had been made, was granted by the Lords of the Treasury, to be under the superintendence of Sir John Herschel, but with an understanding that it was not to form a precedent for future applications on any objects undertaken without the previous approbation of Government.

Dr. Robinson, of Armagh, explained at some length the circumstances under which these were first made, and the importance which would result to astronomical and nautical science by the publication of these important labours.

The first general meeting of members was held on Thursday evening, at the Corn Exchange, when the Marquis of Northampton took the chair, which he vacated to the Earl of Rosse, the President elect, who addressed the meeting in a speech which continued about an hour, and in which his lordship eloquently discoursed of the pleasures and advantages of science. A vote of thanks to the Royal Irish members was then passed for their having this year visited Cork.

The meetings of the different sections commenced on Thursday morning; but, as usual on the first day of meeting, the proceedings were neither numerous nor varied. The other days of the sectional meetings were Friday, Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday. Among the proceedings on Saturday, we notice that Dr. Robinson read the report of a committee appointed by the Mathematical section to superintend the construction of the "Captive Balloon." He said that the object of the balloon was to ascertain the temperature of the atmospheric strata at different heights. By this apparatus, they would be enabled to ascertain the density of the atmospheric air 8000 yards high. Their first experiment, which would take place in January next, would be at a height of 1000 yards.

On Saturday evening the second meeting of the General Council was held at the Royal Cork Corn Exchange, which was brilliantly lighted. The platform was occupied by several noble and distinguished members of the Association, among whom we recognised the Earl of Rosse, Lord Bessborough, the Marquis of Northampton, Lord Adare, Sir Charles Lemon, Bart., Colonel Sabine, Mr. Lyall, Professor Phillips, Colonel Sabine, Mr. Taylor, Professor Forbes, Major Beamish, Mr. C. C. Babington, &c., and among the audience were several ladies of fashion.

The meeting was called for the purpose of hearing a lecture of Professor Owen, on the Dinornis, a gigantic species of the genus Dinornis, and other bones has been recently discovered in New Zealand. The bones of the leg and toes of the dinornis differed from those of the ostrich and apteryx. They differed from the cassowary also. These were the only birds to which it was referable in some points; but it differed from them in many material respects. The genus Dinornis differed from all other birds, and he (Mr. Owen) gave it the name of dinornas, the danger-bird, from its extraordinary magnitude.

Next week we shall conclude our illustrations of this important and interesting meeting.

LONDON AND BLACKWALL RAILWAY.—The half-yearly meeting of the proprietors of this company was held on Tuesday at the London Tavern, and was well attended. The chair was taken by Mr. Hankey, who requested the secretary to read the report, from which it appeared that the number of passengers carried in the six months ending June 1842 was 1,064,015, and the amount £40,493 18s. 5d., and those in the corresponding period of 1843 were 999,683, and the amount £17 351 19s. 10d.; showing a decrease of 63,332 passengers, and £3057 19s 6d. in amount. In the receipts for wharfage there is an increase, and the goods traffic was double that of the last half year. The total revenue for the half-year was £3,037 12s. 1d., and left a balance of £3016 19s. 8d., which would be reduced by £1433 9s. 9d., for repairs of engines. The total of capital up to the 30th of June was £1,790 8s. The directors had to report that a sale of surplus property would take place in September. The committee of investigation had concurred in the recommendation of that to be for extending the steam-boat traffic, as the only means of insuring a dividend. After some discussion the report was adopted, and five of the present directors were re-elected—namely, Mr. Harvey, Mr. Hanks, Mr. Robertson, Captain Routh, and Captain Mangles; and five of the shareholders—namely, Mr. Bishop, Mr. Lee, Mr. Daniel, Mr. Ellison, and Mr. M'Naughten were elected directors, for whose services in future £1000 a year was agreed to by the meeting. Mr. Hankey, jun., Mr. Frost, and Dr. Bowring were elected auditors, when thanks were passed unanimously to the late board of directors, for which the chairs an returned thanks, and the subscription for the guarantee fund was largely promoted before the meeting separated.

"Checkmate," Liverpool, is wrong. The solution to Problem No. 31, by Edward. is correct.

"W. Walker" and "J. B. Green," are quite mistaken in supposing that their solution to No. 26 is the correct one. Although that and variations by Clericus are ingenious, yet we must again refer them to the original one given by us in No. 26 of the third mate in their solution Bishop King goes to K 5th instead of R 3rd, mate cannot be given in the number of moves stated.

"S. H. G."—Your remarks are correct. You will see we have noticed the subject above.

"G. L. Smart."—The games shall appear as early as possible.

"Futurunitur."—Thanks for the game, it shall appear early. Shall we insert the names? We are amply repaid by the good wishes of our correspondent.

We have received several letters during the week from observant and intelligent correspondents with regard to our illustrations of certain political events, which it is erroneously supposed are indicative of political predilections of a particular kind. Once for all, we beg to disabuse our readers of minds of this impression, for as well might we be considered teetotallers, because we give a sketch of Father Mathew administering the pledge, as be considered repealers by reason of a sketch of the Dublin Corn Exchange.

ERRATUM.—The altar-picture in St. Luke's Church, Chelsea, is the "Entombment," not the "Ascension," as stated in our last.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, AUGUST 26, 1843.

It is greatly to be wished that Parliament had been prorogued under more auspicious circumstances of public advantage than have in reality marked the termination of a session in which little or nothing has been done for the permanent good of the country or the alleviation of national distress. On Thursday her Majesty in person dismissed her Legislature, absolved them from their functions, and left them at liberty to turn from lawmaking to dog and gun. The speech was, as usual, a right royal speech that is to say, one of those inane effusions which Ministers of all parties are prone to put into the mouth of a Sovereign, with a perfect consciousness that, were the same words and sentences uttered by any other than regal lips, they would be listened to with a very ineffable contempt by their audience. We fear that we cannot hope from the public a much better reception for the printed oration which appears in our columns to-day.

The speech commences with a declaration that the "state of public business" enables the Sovereign to "close the protracted session." This is not true. The state of public business is neither forward nor prosperous, but the session is closed in its despite, because the members are tired of doing no good, but not because there is no good to be done.

Anon we have a congratulation on the application of some of the church revenues to the endowment of additional ministers—a good measure for the promotion of spiritual instruction, but no great subject for boast by a Legislature which admits the necessity for a general scheme of moral and religious education, but does not hit off any rational and harmonising expedient by which it may be brought about.

Her Majesty next avows her views with satisfaction what her Ministers have effected with reference to the Scotch Church, and hopes to have averted the dangers which threatened a sacred institution. Then we have the pacific assurance of the friendliness of foreign powers, and the usual burst of gratitude to the Commons for their readiness in voting the supplies. There is also a promise to combine economy with exigency, wherefrom we may conclude that if we are not to have as much economy we have exigency there will be no great profligacy in the national expenditure.

The Welsh riots, or rather riots in Wales, form a topic of the speech; but nothing is communicated respecting them that is likely to give the public any great amount of satisfaction or surprise. There is a simple intimation only that inquiry is on foot to find out what circumstances have led to insubordination and violence in a part of the country usually distinguished for good order and willing obedience to the law."

We next come naturally to the condition of Ireland, and in this paragraph of the speech there is more narrow. It is emphatic, and leaves no misconception behind as to the intentions of either the Queen or her Ministers upon the stunning topic of repeal. Her Majesty is made to say:—

"I have observed with the deepest concern the persevering efforts which are made to stir up dissension and dissatisfaction among my subjects in Ireland, and to excite them to demand a repeal of the legislative union.

"It has been and ever will be my earnest desire to administer the government of that country in a spirit of strict justice and impartiality, and to co-operate with Parliament in effecting such amendments in the existing laws as may tend to improve the social condition and to develop the natural resources of Ireland.

"From a deep conviction that the legislative union is not less essential to the attainment of those objects than to the strength and stability of the empire, it is my firm determination, with your support, and under the blessing of Divine Providence to maintain inviolate that great bond of connection between the two countries.

"I have forborne from requiring any additional powers for the counteraction of designs hostile to the concord and welfare of my dominions, as well from my unwillingness to distrust the efficacy of the ordinary law, as from my confidence in the good sense and patriotism of my people, and on the solemn declarations of Parliament in support of the legislative union.

"I feel assured that those of my faithful subjects who have influence and authority in Ireland will concur with the utmost of their power in a system of peaceful agitation which disturbs the industry and retards the improvement of that country, and excites feelings of mutual dread and animosity between different classes of my people."

Here is the expression which all England expected, and will welcome from the throne, of a strong determination to uphold intact and imperishable the legislative union of the two countries, to preserve the integrity of the constitution in this respect, and to damp the hopes and energies of the agitators from O'Connell to Connemara, &c. It contrasts oddly but strongly enough with the new system of representation for Ireland and Lord Lincoln's plays down in the Lincoln's Inn Fields of the same day, and which embodies very minute and significant arrangements for the peculiar government which he is desirous to bring about. The Tory meeting and the Queen's speech tilt at each other in full tournament style. We congratulate both countries, however, principally upon that feature of the paragraph relating to Ireland which expresses a desire to administer the government of that country in a "strict spirit of justice and impartiality, and to co-operate with Parliament (Parliament, however, must first do something tangible to co-operate with) in effecting such amendments in the existing laws as may tend to improve the social condition and to develop the natural resources of Ireland." This is what is truly wanted for Ireland; we are glad to find that Ministers have it in contemplation to do what is just. It is a pity and a disappointment, nevertheless, that this is all seem only to have arrived at that determination at the end of a session, when they can do nothing, instead of at the beginning, when, with their parliamentary majorities, they might have done anything they pleased.

There is nothing more in the speech; no word about foreign affairs, of which, perhaps, "the least said the soonest mended;" nothing of the poor-laws; nothing of any other vital question of domestic legislation. There is no proud reference to any good that Parliament has done, perhaps for the precise reason that none was discoverable.

We seriously hope, however, that we may have few more such speeches, and no more such sessions. It is lamentable to find the time of the nation frittered away for months, and all closed with the mockery of a commission [illegible] which says nothing, promises nothing, does nothing, and closes in nothingness, after all.

The Duke and Duchess of Bedford are on a visit to Barons Court, the seat of the Marquis of Abercorn, near Strabane, Ireland. This once thriving but now impoverished town fee severely the protracted absence of the noble marquis, who, when at liberty, seldom wanders beyond the precincts of his own domain, and, unless his immediate predecessor, takes little or no interest in the concerns of the town beyond the abstraction of the market tolls. It was expected, in the event of the Queen coming to Ireland, that her Majesty would have honoured this delightful locality with a visit.

Ministerial White Bait Dinner.—On Saturday the annual White Bait Dinner took place at the Crown and Sceptre, Greenwich. A fleet of boats belonging to the Watermen's Company was specially engaged for the occasion, and every arrangement was made to facilitate the landing of the noble chiefs, as they rose from the steps of the tavern. The entertainment, which was characteristic of the Crown and Sceptre reputation, gave great satisfaction, and the pleasure of the company was much enhanced by the fineness of the day.

Mr. Morier was presented to the Queen at an audience, by the Earl of Aberdeen, to take leave, on his return as her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to Switzerland.

Earl Cathcart had an audience of the Queen, and delivered to her Majesty the ensigns of the most Ancient Order of the Thistle worn by his late father.

Captain Harris, late Ambassador to the court of Shoa, in Southern Abyssinia, had an audience of her Majesty. The captain has brought to this country a male from the royal stud, and various other presents, for her Britannic Majesty. The mule was brought to the Palace, and was conveyed to the royal mews.

A subject at present much talked of in the higher circles of society is that of the precedency of the Marchioness of Douglas. According to the strict rules of precedency, the position of the noble marchioness would, of course, be below that of a princess of a sovereign family; but the decision will depend upon her Majesty, and the house of Baden being allied to all the great potentates of Europe, and to the family of Coburg, the rank of princess will probably be retained.

The Hon. Humphrey St. John Mildmay, of Berkeley-square, is about to be allied to a granddaughter of the Archbishop of York—namely, Miss Vernon. The event is fixed for the 20th of September next.

It is stated, in a letter from Rome in the Augsburg Gazette, that several Chinese who have been educated there for the priesthood of the Propaganda, have set out to preach the gospel in their native country.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE FATAL DUEL AT CAMDEN-TOWN.

Central Criminal Court, Friday. (Before Mr. Justice Williams and Mr Baron Rolfe.)—At the sitting of the Central Criminal Court yesterday morning, George Gulliver, surgeon in the Royal Horse Guards [illegible] was rendered to take their trial on an indictment charging them with being concerned in the death of David Lynar Fawcett.—The Attorney-General, Mr. Waddington, and Mr. Chambers, appeared to prosecute. Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Bodkin were the counsel for Mr. Gulliver, and Sergeant Shee and Mr. Ballantine for Mr. Cuddy.—At a few minutes after ten the judges took their seats [illegible] Duncan Trevor Grant, [illegible] Holland Leckie Du Cane Cuddy, and George Gulliver, were called for; only Mr. Cuddy and Mr. Gulliver answered, and they were immediately placed in the dock.

The Attorney-General then rose, and said, having carefully perused the depositions in the case of Mr. Gulliver, he was of opinion that the charge against him could not be sustained, and he, therefore, wished to enter a nolle prosequi as far as related to that gentleman.

Mr. Clarkson expressed his readiness to leave it to her Majesty's Attorney-General for the course he had taken, and wished to know whether it was his intention to enter a nolle prosequi on the coroner's inquisition as well as on the indictment?

The Attorney-General replied in the affirmative.

Mr. Gulliver then left the dock.

Mr. Cuddy was called upon to plead to the indictment and the [illegible] examination, to both of which he, in a firm tone of voice, pleaded "Not guilty." Both parties then went in with the family murder of the deceased David Lynar Fawcett. Mr. Cuddy is a person of gentlemanly appearance, with [illegible] rather a handsome cast, and an expression of countenance remarkably prepossessing.

The Attorney-General then rose and stated the case for the prosecution; but as the whole of the facts have been so recently before our readers, it is unnecessary to give the right honourable and learned gentleman's speech, or the evidence of those witnesses who were examined before the police magistrate and the coroner's jury. The only fresh evidence brought forward was that of Mr. Gulliver, who after his discharge was brought up as a witness on behalf of the prosecution.

Mr. Gulliver was examined by the Attorney-General. He deposed—I am an army surgeon in the Royal Horse Guards. I am acquainted with the prisoner Munro, who is a lieutenant in the same regiment. On the 1st of July last I saw him in the barrack in Regent's Park, in the hospital. He called me from my bed, and requested me to go with him. I did not go with him in his carriage. We went direct to the Breckneck Arms. We waited there about ten minutes, and then a hackney cab and a Brougham came up. I saw a person whom I believe to have been Col. Fawcett get out of the Brougham. I had known Col. Fawcett for ten or twelve years; but I am rather near-sighted, and could not swear that it was he; I afterwards met [illegible] Col. Lawcett, Lieut. Munro, Mr. Grant, and a fourth gentleman, whose name I did not know. I think the gentleman at the bar is the person, although he looks rather taller now than he did in the field. Lieutenant Munro afterwards asked me to come into the field, saying, "You can be useful." Afterwards heard the words "reads" and "are" and a shout of "[illegible]" Saw Col. Fawcett, who was lying on the ground. A gentleman, whom I suppose to have been Mr. Cuddy, was standing near him. Mr. Munro had just run up to Colonel Fawcett at the time. Something passed between Colonel Fawcett about swelling; he said he was not leveling the pistol at him. Mr. Munro said, "Oh, Fawcett, I thought you were leveling at me, and covering me," or words to that effect. I do not know whether that or was said previously to, or was an answer to Colonel Fawcett. "It's remarkable" was the gentleman whom he believed to be the prisoner with a brace of pistols. Colonel Fawcett's respiration was immediately very much embarrassed, and he appeared as if he was about to die then and there. But he afterwards revived. Mr. Munro assisted, and did everything in his power, abandoning all anxiety about [illegible] and waiting with witness until the [illegible] Benjamin Brodie arrived. [illegible] examined. Had said that all was [illegible] in a hurry, and that he had [illegible] report of the pistols before he was aware of what was taking place. [illegible] the prisoner at one of the [illegible] identified the prisoner as one of the gentlemen he had seen pass through the gate in a Brougham on the morning in question. Afterwards saw the wounded gentleman lying on the ground, and the prisoner and Mr. Gulliver leaning over him.

The medical witnesses examined were Sir Benjamin Brodie and Mr. Liston, which closed the case for the prosecution.

Sergeant Shee then rose to address the jury for the defence. He said there never was a case which, now that it was stripped of all its prejudices, was so different from that which it had been at first represented, as the present; and he also, as the Attorney-General had done, entreated them to dismiss from their minds of all which they had heard before they came into the jury box. It was altogether unreasonable to say that Mr. Cuddy had gone to the ground to aid and assist Lieut. Munro in the murder of Col. Fawcett. That was a thing that was proved, was that he was present; but there was no proof that he was thus aiding, assisting, and abetting Lieut. Munro in taking the life of the deceased. [illegible] had been [illegible] Mr. Cuddy had [illegible] the high character the prisoner had borne in the army.

Sir William Clinton was then called, and examined by Mr. Ballantine. He stated that he was a general in the British army, and the colonel of the 89th Regiment, in which the prisoner also was an officer. He (Gen. Clinton) was not present in China, but the prisoner had been; and he recognised him as the officer who was nearly the first of those who escaladed the walls of the great city in China, and received a serious wound; notwithstanding which, he continued to act with the greatest bravery.

The Attorney-General objected to the reception of evidence beyond that of general humanity.

Sir Wm. Clinton then, in answer to Mr. Ballantine, confined himself to saying that, independently of his conduct in the field of battle, Mr. Cuddy was a person of quiet habits, and had always borne an excellent character.

Mr. Justice Williams then proceeded to sum up. He told the jury that there was no doubt that all persons aiding, assisting, and abetting in a duel were inquestionably implicated in the charge of murder which might arise out of the transaction, and that the only question further was purely and entirely whether the evidence did or did not satisfy them that the prisoner at the bar was present at the death of Colonel Fawcett, and were there "aiding, assisting, and abetting" on the occasion. The Learned Judge then read the principal portion of the evidence, and commented upon such portions of it as he wished to call to the more particular attention of the jury.

The jury, after deliberating in the box for about a quarter of an hour, applied to the court to know if the prisoner was charged with wilful murder?

Mr. Justice Williams.—The first count charges that one Alexander Munro was guilty of the crime of wilful murder, and it charges the prisoner that he was wilfully present aiding and abetting the said Munro, the said fe ony to commit. That is the first count to which I believe I exclusively called your attention, and that alone I should recommend you to consider, and no other.

A Juror.—We are all agreed that he was present; but I wish to ask is there any evidence to show that the prisoner handled the pistols or assisted in any manner?

Mr. Justice Williams.—I will read the evidence of Mr. Gulliver to you again. The learned judge then read the evidence of Mr. Gulliver to the jury, who then retired to consider of their verdict.

The jury returned into court after an absence of nearly three hours, and returned a verdict of "Not guilty." The announcement of the verdict was received with applause, which was instantly checked by the officer of the court.

Lieutenant Cuddy was then ordered to be discharged.

On Thursday, after the prorogation of Parliament, her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Countess of Dunmore, Lady in Waiting, left town in a carriage and four for Windsor Castle. A party of Dragoons escorted the Royal party from Buckingham Palace to the terminus of the Great Western Railway at Paddington, where a special train had been ordered to convey the illustrious party to the Slough Station. Her Majesty arrived at Windsor Castle at half-past five o'clock.

The Duke of Wellington, as Lord Lieutenant of Hants, is expected to receive the Queen at Southampton, where her Majesty will probably embark, on Monday, on board the new yacht, the Victoria and Albert, and the Royal squadron will comprise some ships of the line, which are to be joined, off Cowes, by several of the vessels belonging to members of the Royal Yacht Club.

Prince de Joinville and le Duc d'Aumale, after inspecting the Dockyard and Royal Arsenal at Woolwich on Thursday, and partaking of an elegant déjeûner at Lord Bloomfield's residence, embarked on board the French war steamer, Pluton, and proceeded down the river under a last salute from the field battery in the dockyard, and taken up and continued by the field battery at the Royal Arsenal, and answered by the guns on board the French squadron.

General Espartero.—Immediately after the arrival of the Spanish Regent and the Duchess of Victory at Mivart's, on Wednesday afternoon, Colonel Wylde, Equerry to his Royal Highness Prince Albert, had a lengthened interview with his Excellency, and subsequently the whole of the members of the staff who accompanied the Regent to this country. The Regent and the whole of the noble ennea and gentlemen dined together, covers being laid for twenty-five. Throughout Thursday the hotel was literally besieged with visitors of all ranks. The Duke of Wellington was among the early calls upon his Excellency, and the Noble and Gallant Duke subscribed his name as follows, in the visitors' book:—"Field-Marshal the Duke of Wellington, et Capitan-General Duque de Ciudad Rodorigo." The Earl of Aberdeen and the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel also visited the Regent, as also the Earl of Carnarvon, Viscount Hanson, Earl of Lincoln, Lord Campbell, Lord and Lady Bloomfield, Count Goldde de Lausuer, Colonel Gurwood, Mr. F. Huth, Col. A de Kauson y Carcobal, Gen. Miller, Lieut.-Col. A. H. Colquhoun, Colonel A. Wright, M. A. Lopez Vidaurria, M. Adolfo Heros, Mr. Moore, Mr. Godsmith, Lieutenant-General Sir A. Woodford, Captain Lord [illegible] Navy, Colonel [illegible] Fox, Colonel Sir Peter [illegible] Colonel [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Beresford, Sir Edward [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Mr.

hill of Tara, and addressed his countrymen. He has all the raw materials of sovereignty within his reach. There is shortly to be some new 'step;' is that to be the very small 'step' of putting a crown on?—of substituting his name for that of Victoria—of being anointed by one of his clergy, being crowned next time he mounts Tara, and exercising those sovereign rights which he so carefully preserves? The Irish, who come and go at his bidding just as Mr. Wildman's bees did, would as soon call him king as kiss a pretty girl, take the pledge, murder a land-agent, kick up a faction fight, or any other daily sally. He seems, indeed, to be tolerably safe, for the day, from the one thing that would sweep away all his influence—real redress of the worst Irish grievances."

BALLOON ASCENT AT BRIGHTON.

Mr. Green, jun., the son of the celebrated aëronaut, has lately been experimenting with his "Aloion balloon," with a view of crossing the British Channel, and landing, as occasion might serve, on some part of the Continent. His first experimental trip for this purpose was unsuccessful; although, from the favourable state of the wind, previous to his entering the car, with his adventurous companion, Mr. Bradley, he expressed the greatest confidence that he should be able to effect the object he had in view. He ascended at eleven o'clock in the morning from Stepney, and the balloon crossed the Thames, and proceeded towards the Sussex coast; but the wind suddenly shifting, the aëronauts were compelled to descend at three o'clock in the afternoon, at the town of Cuckfield, on the Brighton road, 37 miles from London, and about 16 from the coast. They had a delightful voyage of four hours and a half, and, nothing daunted by their failure, or contrecent, they resolved to resume their attempt, and ascend from Brighton.

Accordingly Mr. Green and his compagnon de voyage, prepared for the renewal on the morning of Thursday the 17th inst., when the wind permitting, to make for the French coast; and, in order to avoid the inconvenience and danger arising from the dilation of hydrogen gas when exposed to the sun at a great altitude, measures had been devised for keeping the balloon at a short distance from the surface of the water. This contrivance consisted of a rope, 2000 feet long, pendent from the car, and having attached to it, at regular intervals, about a dozen bladders inflated with hydrogen gas, to create a resistance by their friction on the surface of the water. The balloon having been filled at the works of the Brighton and Hove General Gas Company at Hove, by half-past eight o'clock, the voyagers took their seats in the car, and the balloon, at a height of about thirty feet, was conducted by means of a rope to the sea beach, where the bladders were made fast to the rope from the car. The wind at this time was hardly perceptible, but its direction was southward; and the balloon, when detached from the earth, glided out to sea, at a speed not exceeding two miles an hour, the bladders and rope (120 feet long) answering their purpose effectively, and keeping the car about 90 or 100 feet from the water. A round of cheers followed from those assembled on the spot, which the aeronauts responded to by bowing. Scarcely, however, had the start been made, when the wind gradually veered to the north-east, and the balloon took a direction which must have brought it to the Isle of Wight. A few minutes more, and a further change made it doubtful whether the balloon would not leave the sea before reaching Worthing. The wind still continued rapidly changing till it settled in the south-west, the consequence of which was, that after being in the air somewhat less than three-quarters of an hour, the balloon, having traversed the air in a horse-shoe-like course, hovered over the Hove Coast Guard station, a short half mile from the spot from which it had started. Here the voyagers alighted, and the balloon having been re-conveyed to the Hove gas works, some additions were made to the cargo, and the wind an hour afterwards being nearly south, the balloon again started in the direction of London. Both ascents were viewed by thousands of spectators, who thronged the line of cliff from one extremity of the town to the other. The balloon was inflated with 27,000 cubic feet of carburetted hydrogen gas, which had been diminished in density nearly one-half by being decarbonized, or deprived of its illuminating properties. Some idea may be formed of the great ascending power which the balloon (a small one, containing 24,000 cubic feet), possessed when they left the shore, by stating that the disposable ballast amounted to six cwt.

BALLOON ASCENT AT BRIGHTON.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

This distinguished author and diplomatist, who is at present the American ambassador at Madrid, has just succeeded to a large property bequeathed to him by one of the Society of Friends, in the United States, personally unknown to Mr. Irving, who will, consequently, shortly relinquish his office, and return to his native country. Mr. Irving was born in the state of New York, in the year 1782. His first work published in this country was "The Sketch-Book by Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.," the result of an early visit to "the land of wonders," as he facetiously terms our favoured isle. Indeed, all his works, with the exception of his earliest efforts, have been the consequence of his love of travel; and he describes himself to have "surveyed most of the terrestrial angles of the globe." In person, Mr. Irving is of middle height, his features have a pleasing regularity, and are lit up at every corner with that delightful humour which flows in a rich vein throughout his writings, and forms their most attractive charm. He very much inherits Goldsmith's turn of mind, and particularly reminds us of his style.

"It has been well observed of Mr. Irving, that "there never was a writer whose popularity was more matter of feeling, or more intimate, than Washington Irving, perhaps because he appealed at once to our simplest and kindliest emotions. His affections are those of 'hearth and home;' the pictures he delights to draw are those of natural loveliness, tinted with human sympathies; and—a too unusual thing with the writers of our time—he looks upon God's works, and sees that they are good. With him the wine of life is not always on the lees. An exquisite vein of poetry runs through every page: who does not remember 'the shark, glancing like a spectre through the blue seas!'"

A Cabinet council was held at twelve o'clock on Wednesday at the Foreign office. Sir R. Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, and Lord Stanley arrived in town to attend the council. The other ministers present were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, Sir J. Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Haddington Sir H Hardinge, and Sir E. Knatchbull. The council sat two hours.]

VIEW OF THE FIRE FROM THE RIVER.

THE GREAT FIRE NEAR LONDON BRIDGE.

In the postscript to the latest edition of last week's journal, we briefly described this destructive conflagration, and promised our readers some memorials of the calamity, probably the most rapid in its devastation that has occurred in the metropolis since the burning of the Royal Exchange in 1838. The origin of the fire has not yet been precisely ascertained; but it is stated to have broken out at Topping's Wharf, situated on the east side of London Bridge, adjoining Fenning's Wharf, which, it will be recollected, was destroyed by a similar calamity in 1838.

The fire was discovered at about five minutes before two o'clock on the premises extending to the water's edge, and abutted on the sand factory and telegraph station. Topping's Wharf occupied an immense area of ground, and was considered to have been one of the principal ware and store houses along that side of the river Thames. Within a few minutes after the alarm had been given the fire had gained a most awful ascendancy.

At the time that the fire broke out there were several coasting-vessels lying alongside, some coaled and ready to sail at day-break; and it was with some difficulty that the crews could be made sensible of the imminent danger in which they and their vessels were placed. Many of them, however, managed to haul their craft into the centre of the river, beyond the reach of the fire; but four were aground, and, it being low water, consequently immoveable. These were the Fleece, schooner, Mr. Croft, master, of Exeter, laden with a general cargo; the schooner Cornwall, of Truro, Mr. Worth, master; the Theisa, of Weymouth; and a brig trading-vessel. The crews mounted the rigging, and for a length of time prevented, by great exertion, the ships from taking fire; but the flames rapidly increasing soon forced them to quit their situations, the heat being so oppressive that their lives were in jeopardy. Shortly afterwards the large floating engine, belonging to the brigade from the Southwark-bridge station, arrived alongside the burning premises, and, being already manned by 120 hired auxiliaries, not a moment was lost in bringing her to anchor, and also into operation. Active measures were then resorted to by those in charge of this stupendous machine to save the vessels, and while they were so engaged the tide had fortunately flowed sufficiently to enable three of them to be towed away, although their rigging was partially in flames. The one, however, which was lying next the wharf could not be hauled off, and the result was, that in spite of the exertions of the firemen, crew, and Thames police, the flames gradually increased until she was completely burnt to the water's edge. Before this period, however, it was discovered that both upper and lower Topping's Wharf, the property of Messrs. Scovell, were likewise in flames, and from their confined situation it was apparent that there was no chance of saving them from destruction. These premises almost surrounded Messrs. Ward's warehouses, and communicated by a narrow passage.

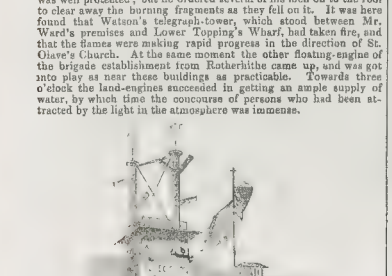
The conflagration now became terrific. Loud explosions were heard to proceed from the cellars under Ward's warehouse, which subsequently proved to have been occasioned by the barrels of oil and turpentine bursting. Mr. Braidwood, finding that the fire was likely to cross Tooley-street from Topping's Wharf to the extensive warehouses of Messrs. Cox, Brothers, and Co., Messrs. Rusk and Co., and Mr. Lloyd, wholesale merchants on the opposite side, directed the branch of the floating-engine to be brought into the road, and its power directed against the above-named buildings, the land-engines being still unprovided with a good supply of water, an evil which is only felt at this particular part of the metropolis, and to which alone is attributed the destruction caused by the fire which occurred at Fenning's Wharf in the year 1835. At about half-past two o'clock the Lord Mayor arrived on the spot, a special messenger having been sent to him at the Mansion-house. He immediately held a consultation with Mr. Braidwood upon the propriety of having the hose of several engines conveyed on to the roof of Fenning's Wharf, to prevent the fire extending in that direction. The wind was in a contrary quarter, and a strong party-wall divided the premises. The latter gentleman, however, considered it unnecessary, as the wharf was well protected; but he ordered several of his men on to the roof to clear away the burning fragments as they fell on it. It was here found that Watson's telegraph-tower, which stood between Mr. Ward's premises and Lower Topping's Wharf, had taken fire, and that the flames were making rapid progress in the direction of St. Olave's Church. At the same moment the other floating-engine of the brigade establishment from Rotherhithe came up, and was got into play as near these buildings as practicable. Towards three o'clock the land-engines succeeded in getting an ample supply of water, by which time the concourse of persons who had been attracted by the light in the atmosphere was immense.



THE TELEGRAPH, AND CHURCH OF ST. OLAVE, BEFORE THE FIRE.

The telegraph tower was an object of great attention during the progress of the fire, owing to its peculiar construction and great elevation above all the surrounding premises. It was formerly used as a shot factory, but recently it had been purchased by Messrs. Watson, of Cornhill, who had used it as a telegraph station for the communication of intelligence from the Downs and other parts of the coast. For nearly an hour, though it was situate in the very centre of danger, singular to state, it withstood the ravages of the fire. At last, however, about half-past two o'clock, dense volumes of smoke were seen issuing from all the windows from the basement to the summit. In an instant almost the whole of the building burst into a vivid mass of flame, which shot above the burning wharf and premises to a considerable height. The appearance of the conflagration at this moment became one of surpassing brilliancy. The morning being perfectly clear, the reflection was seen to a considerable distance, every one of the public buildings on the banks of the Thames being lighted up, and, viewing the conflagration from Blackfriars or Waterloo bridge, it seemed as if the whole range of wharfs along shore at Horsleydown and Rotherhithe was in flames. About half past three o'clock the whole of the tower fell with a tremendous crash to the ground, sending forth a most terrific cloud of dust and burning fragments.

At about four o'clock the tower of St. Olave's Church was exposed to the full violence of the conflagration. The firemen, who were cheered on by the Lord Mayor and several of the most influential inhabitants of the Borough, exerted themselves most strenuously to prevent its receiving any injury. The fire, however, raged on with terrific fury, and in the course of five minutes it had gained the tower, and forced the brigademen from their stations on the roof. This, as may be readily supposed, increased the consternation in the neighbourhood to a most painful extent, and loud cries were heard from different parts of the multitude, "For God's sake, save the church, save the church." Alas! it was beyond human power to do so, for within a quarter of an hour the roof and the ceiling were in ruins, and the beautiful peal of bells fell from the belfry, the greater part of them having been melted by the intense body of fire which surrounded them while they were hanging. The conflagration was not finally arrested until near seven o'clock.

It has been stated, though not intentionally, that Fenning's Wharf was not at any period of the fire in danger. This is far from being correct; in fact, it is most extraordinary, considering the awful extent of the fire, the confined situation of the destroyed property, and the difficulties which the firemen encountered from the want of a sufficient supply of water to work the engines, that it escaped destruction. Mr. Braidwood, the superintendent of the London Fire Brigade, states that he thought he might have saved the church; but at that trying moment, being a public servant, it was a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence with him. If he had attempted to have brought his whole force to save the church, the warehouses and Fenning's Wharf must have been destroyed; he therefore abandoned the church, which is insured for £6000, for the purpose of saving premises worth at least between £300,000 and £400,000. There were, however, several engines playing on it up to the very last moment, and, under all circumstances, he and his men did all they could to save it from destruction.

In order to give some idea of the extent of the conflagration at its height, it must be mentioned that there were at one period buildings closely packed together, covering full half an acre of ground, in one solid mass of fire. Topping's Wharf consisted of no fewer than five buildings, extending in length nearly 250 feet, and 120 in depth. They contained, besides a large quantity of oil and turpentine, about 1000 quarters of corn, 300 casks of arsenic, between 130 and 150 tons of paper, 100 casks of raisins, and packages of goods of every description; also, hides, tallow, sugar, tea, and other merchandise; in fact, the warehouses were overloaded with property. The warehouses of Messrs. Ward, the oil-merchants and drysalters, had also a heavy stock, tons of oil and turpentine being deposited in the stores. The telegraph, which stood at the foot of St. Olave's, was built by Messrs. Cubitt, and had been recently repaired, in the year 1838; it was of a quadrangular form, and built entirely with wood, covered with slates. On the top were placed ten tons of iron, for the working of the telegraph, and its arms and supporters were composed of cast iron. Some idea may, consequently, be formed of the tremendous crash with which it fell, and the destruction it did to the ground.

The property destroyed and damaged is insured, and the amount of insurances is stated to be as follows:—

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OLD COURT TUESDAY.

(Before Mr. Baron Rolfe and Mr. Justice Williams.)

BURGLARY.—James Haggett, aged 23, and James Haggett, aged 23, labourer; and William Jones, aged 23, labourer; were indicted for feloniously entering the dwelling-house of Alphonso Mackintosh, and stealing three spoons, value 6*s*., and a quantity of cigars, value £3, his property. Mr. Church having stated the case, called Alphonso Mackintosh, who said, I reside at the Old Black Lion Inn, Lambeth. On the 14th of August I retired to bed about two o'clock. The house was then safe. Soon after I was in bed I was alarmed by a policeman calling me by name. I opened the window, and I saw a policeman, who told me that thieves were in the house. I immediately called the watchman, who went down stairs, and, in the dark, I seized a man, who said, "You have been robbed, Sir, and I am trying to find the thief." At the same time I received a violent blow on the shoulder; I immediately seized one of the prisoners by the throat, when I received another blow on the forehead. I put my leg between the legs of the person with a third of, and threw him down the stairs; I followed him, and held him until I got assistance. The prisoner struggled very hard, and I found that I had hold of Haggett. I then went to the bar, and found the floor covered with various articles ready to be taken away. After the examination of other witnesses, the Learned Judge summed up, and the jury found all the prisoners guilty. Sentence—Transportation for life.

NEW COURT.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Bullock.)

Matthew Ledger, aged 43, accountant, was indicted for embezzling and stealing the sums of £26 10*s*., £55, and £60, of the governors of St. Thomas's Hospital, his employers. There were several counts in the indictment, in which the dates of the alleged defalcations were varied. The prisoner pleaded guilty. Mr. Clarkson, on his behalf, made no application, setting forth ill health, with other circumstances, in mitigation of punishment. Mr. Bodkin, who appeared for the prosecution, made no opposition; on the contrary, he submitted that it was the duty of the Court to extend its mercy as far as possible. Judgment was deferred.

(Before Mr. Justice Williams and Baron Rolfe.)

WEDNESDAY.—LEGAL TRACTS.—Sir Stevenson Arabin, in the case of the Duke of Brunswick v. Barnard Gregory, Mr. Bodkin applied to the court to disallow the application of defendant to be permitted to traverse. The learned counsel went into the history of the various transactions connected with the finding of the bills against the defendant—his application to have the proceedings removed by certiorari—and his keeping out of the way until he was finally captured at Southend on the 12th instant. He (Mr. Bodkin) contended that the statute provided that twenty one days' notice was sufficient, and that it was palpable the requisites were sufficiently complied with, the defendant having had more than twenty-one days' notice in the present instance, the bills having been found against him on the 10th July.

Mr. Wild followed on the same side.—Mr. Prendergast, for the defendant, contended that the statute in no degree prevented the defendant from traversing.—Mr. Justice Williams said that his learned brother, Rose, concurred with him in thinking that there could be no doubt upon the construction of the statute. The intention was merely to prevent the defendant from being taken by surprise. In the present case the defendant, Mr. Gregory, had had quite sufficient notice of what was going forward against him, and he therefore should be prevented to take his trial at the present session.—Mr. Bodkin asked his lordship to appoint the time for the trial.—Mr. Justice Williams declined to do so. Mr. Cook, the clerk of the court, then informed the defendant that he should surrender to take his trial at the present session.—Mr. Gregory entered into recognizances.

CHARGE OF CUTTING AND WOUNDING WITH INTENT TO MURDER.—James Aberdine, aged 25, was placed at the bar, charged with cutting and wounding Elizabeth Aberdine, his natural daughter, with intent to murder her. In either counts of the indictment he was charged with the intent to do some grievous bodily harm. No counsel was engaged either for the prosecution or for the prisoner. It will be recollected that the prisoner was discovered standing in his own room, with a chopper, or axe, in his hand, and he appeared to be trying to chop his face with it. Blood was flowing from his face. Together with the chopper, there was also a knife, with a great wound on her face. The other child was also wounded. He had three cuts on the side of his head. Some time before this transaction the prisoner was found in a water-butt, with his head in the water and his feet up. There was water enough in it to drown him. Some of the neighbours pulled him out. The jury, after a short consultation, returned a verdict of guilty, but that the prisoner was not in a sound state of mind at the time.—The prisoner was then removed from the bar, with directions that he be detained in custody during her Majesty's pleasure.

CUTTING AND WOUNDING.—George Hazard, aged 47, gardener, was placed at the bar, charged with feloniously cutting and wounding John Hazard, with intent to do him some grievous bodily harm. There was no counsel for the prosecution. The prisoner was defended by Mr. Sherry. The particulars of this case have recently appeared in the police reports. The prosecutor, who was son of the prisoner, called at his father's house, and questioned him about some improper conversations which he had heard were applied by the prisoner to his (prosecutor's) wife. The prisoner desired him to go away. It appeared that much ill-feeling existed on both sides, and the language used by all parties was very disgusting and violent. The prisoner snatched up a razor or cross hook, and threatened to cut his son's head off if he did not leave the house at once. The evidence for the prosecution was to the effect that the father chopped at the son, who, in putting up his arm to ward off the blow, received a gash which severed all the muscles and veins of the fore arm, cutting quite to the bone. For the prisoner the version was that the son had knocked his mother's (the prisoner's wife's) head down, and that he was pummelling her when his father, and that he held the hook between them to save her, when the son accidentally cut himself.—The jury returned a verdict of guilty, with a strong recommendation to mercy.—The prisoner received his sentence again, and desired that his son had frequently before beaten both himself and his (prosecutor's) mother.—Mr. Justice Williams said that the use of those dangerous weapons must be prevented, if possible, and he should therefore feel it his duty to visit the present instance, however, the punishment, in consequence of the recommendation of the jury, would be comparatively slight. It was that he should be imprisoned, and hard labour, for eight calendar months.

EXTRAORDINARY PROCEEDING.—In the course of the day the grand jury returned a true bill for felony against Pedro de Zuleta, a merchant of the city of London, and two others. There was also an indictment against the same parties for a misdemeanor. When the Recorder took his seat upon the bench, Mr. Clarkson addressed his lordship, and said he had to make an application of a peculiar character. Two bills had been found against Mr. Zuleta, a highly respectable merchant of the city of London, for conspiring, with two other persons, named Jennings and Bernardos, to equip a ship for the purpose of trading in slaves. The proceedings had been entirely ex parte before the grand jury, and no application had been made to a magistrate. The first intimation of Mr. Zuleta had of the fact was his being taken into custody, and he knew nothing of the nature of the charge, but from what was entered upon the police-sheet. His application was, that the defendant should be admitted to bail.—Sir G. Stephen, who, it appears, is the solicitor for the prosecution, stated that the charge against Mr. Zuleta was founded upon an act of the 5th Geo. IV., which declared the offence imputed to the prisoner to amount to felony, and subjected the party convicted of the offence to be transported for 14 years.—The proceedings had been entirely ex parte before the grand jury, and no application had been made to a magistrate. His application was, that the defendant should be admitted to bail in the sum of £3000.—The Recorder said he thought the amount of recognizances was quite sufficient.—Mr. Clarkson: The defendant will enter into his own recognizance in £3000, and find sureties in £1000 each.—It was then arranged that the amount of bail should be put in upon the indictment for felony, and with regard to the indictment for misdemeanor, he should enter into his own recognizance in £100, and find two sureties in £50 each.—The indictment was then read. It charged the defendant and the other persons with having feloniously equipped and employed a certain vessel called the Augusta, for the purpose of trading in slaves. In other counts the same parties were charged with equipping the vessel for the purchase of slaves, and with equipping her for the purpose of purchasing persons to be dealt with as slaves.—Mr. Zuleta pleaded not guilty to both indictments. The requisite sureties were soon afterwards entered into, and Mr. Zuleta was then discharged from custody.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.—George Foster, a [illegible] (and two daughters), were charged before Mr. Twyford with [illegible] yards of broad cloth, value £7, the property of Messrs. [illegible], carrying on business in the Strand. It appeared from the evidence that, on the 15th August, at an early hour in the morning, the prosecutor missed the broad cloth from his shop, and that, on the evening of the same day he saw the prisoners, George and Diana Foster, standing at his area railing, when the prisoner, Alice Foster (who was in his employ as servant of a lady) came out of the back-door, and handed the roll of cloth to the prisoners, who went away as soon as possible. The prisoners were afterwards taken into custody in the neighbourhood of Maiden-lane; and upon their examination were fully committed for trial.

Amelia Foster, another daughter of the male prisoner, was afterwards taken into custody at the door of the house, and similar charges were brought against her sisters, on a charge of stealing books and other articles, the property of Mr. George Austen, of Lincoln's Inn-fields.

CLERKENWELL.—Four fashionably dressed young men, said to be connected with the law, named John Williams, Charles Stuart, James Lawyers, and Alfred Angues, were charged with knocking at several doors and disturbing the inhabitants of Spencer-street, Hatton garden. Sergeant Archer, 8 G, Wa ler, 113 G, Wi de, 182, and other officers gave evidence to substantiate the case. The prisoners said they had been drinking free ly, and could not remember what took place. Mr. Greenwood fined Stuart £1 10*s*., or three weeks; Williams and Lawyers £1, or two weeks; and Angues 10*s*. or six days. He reprobated their conduct in severe terms. The prisoners eventually paid the penalties and were liberated.

QUEEN SQUARE.—A young woman named Mary Murray, was charged with stealing clothes from several children, under the following circumstances:—It appeared from the evidence that at the end of the week the prisoner was in the habit of meeting children carrying bundles of clothes for their parents to get mang ed, and representing she was the daughter of the woman by whom they were to be mangled, she succeeded, by giving them halfpence, to get the articles into her possession. There were about one hundred children attended in the course of the day, by whom the prisoner was identified as having robbed them.—Mr. Twyford ordered three cases to be completed, and the prisoner having declared her innocence, she was subsequently committed for trial on each charge.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRIGHTON.—THE PALACE.—The Lord Chamberlain arrived on Monday evening at the York Hotel from London, and immediately sent for Mr. Saunders, from whom his lordship soon learned that the palace was quite ready for the reception of her Majesty and the royal family. On Wednesday morning, at eight o'clock, his lordship went over the palace, and at eleven o'clock took his departure by railway train for London. According to report arrangements the Prince of Wales, Princess Royal, and Princess Alice, will arrive at the palace next Monday; and on the same day, we understand, it is her Majesty's intention to proceed to Southampton, and embark on board the Victoria and Albert yacht, and go at once to Cowes, from whence the Lord Chamberlain returned, after making the necessary arrangements for the reception of the Queen; but everything will depend on the weather.

The venerable Earl Grey, accompanied by the Countess and Lady Georgiana, left Berkeley square on Tuesday for Howick Hall, Northumberland. Sir Stephen Hammick, his lordship's surgeon, attended the noble earl to the north.

LEICESTERSHIRE.—The village of Gaddesby, in this county, has become the scene of a most foul murder, respecting which we are enabled to give the following particulars: Since Wednesday last a young man, named James Garner, the son of poor but respectable parents, living at Frisby-on-the-Wreake, in this county, had been missing. Some search was made at the time, but proving ineffectual, and a report having been spread that he had deserted for a soldier, the excitement caused by his disappearance was about dying away, when an Irishman, who was contracting with Mr. Moore, the occupier of the farm on which Gaddesby Hall is situate, for a quantity of manure, discovered, nearly close to the hedge, a human head, and, at a short distance from it, a headless trunk, lying with one leg partly in the ditch, and a butcher's knife not far from the left side. The body, on being moved from its position, immediately fell to pieces, by reason of the decomposition. An alarm being given, it was soon ascertained to be the corpse of the missing youth, and as soon that he had been cruelly, fiendly murdered; but not for robbery, for some silver and his watch were found in his pockets. An inquest was held at a public-house in the village, before Mr. Clarke, Coroner, Merton Mansfield, Esq. (son of Lord Sandwich), late adjutant to the village school-room; the principal evidence on which occasion was that of the relations of the deceased, as to the identification of the body, and of the general officers, as to the state in which the body was found. After which the inquest was adjourned to last Wednesday, in order that further inquiries might be made; and Mr. Messenger, the surgeon Thomas Hayward, and a labouring man named Timson, were ordered into custody. The public excitement was of course raised to the highest pitch. The skull of the deceased was produced, and created a great sensation in the court. There was one large orifice at the back. Another material witness, whose evidence was circumstantial and not very material, the inquest was adjourned until Monday.

BANK FAILURE.—At the sale of the estates of Messrs. Clarke, Mitchell, Phillips, and Mitchell, bankers of Leicester, at the Three Crowns Hotel in that town, on Wednesday last, the Enderby property was bought by the brother of R. Mitchell, Esq., one of the bankrupts, for the sum of £2[illegible]. The SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Saturday last, the Atmospheric Railway took place, and the deepest interest prevailed as to the result. It was completely successful. The treasurer and secretary of the Croydon Company, the engineers and scientific persons, and a deputation of witnessing the proceedings.

STATE OF WALES.—SWANSEA.—A special board of guardians was held here to day, in consequence of a letter having been received from the Poor law Commissioners upon the distressed state of the country, in relation to the strike of the colliers. The board was fully attended, every guardian in the union having been summoned. A desultory conversation ensued, in which it was stated that the coppermen were determined to act in concert with the colliers, and that they had given notice to draw out £1500 from the Savings-bank—that they were about to break up their benefit clubs, in which they had £20,000, and divide the money to their members—that they intended to continue on strike for [illegible] months, one-half of the colliers in the neighbourhood must shortly be discharged. Resolutions were then entered into, that stones should be procured in order to check the colliers who became dangerous, and that work upon the roads it was also arranged as to the erection of additional beds in the union house, and the meeting broke up.

DEATH OF A SEAMAN.—CAPT. A. W. Robertson, a veteran sailor, who had braved the ocean for full half a century, in expectedly came into a fortune just week, by the death of an uncle, amounting to £75,000. This fortunate man had lately sailed as cook on the AGS, 20-gun brig, a wonderful, which vessel was built by Mr. Wood, of Wapping, and launched in the year 1807, and when asked what he should do with such an immense fortune, he replied, "I have about forty relatives, all of whom will be glad to get some of it, and I shall take it to a snug cottage for myself, in which I may comfortably spend the remainder of my days."

ZEELAND.—CAPTURE OF WHALES.—Three were 283 whales driven ashore at a place called Hinwesse, near Brouwershaven station in the district of Voe Delfing, on the 10th. The blubber sold readily at £9 5*s* per ton. The purchasers are land at work getting it manufactured into oil. When the fishermen fall in with a shoal of finny monsters they row as near as they can, they commence to make a thundering noise, by striking sticks or oars on the gunwales of their boats. By this means they turn these monsters of the deep, and drive them into narrow seas, where they run ashore, and where the fishermen sight and dra. out death to them.—John o'Groat Journal.

TURNOUT AT STOCKPORT.—On Saturday last the whole of the power loom weavers, about 700 in number, employed by Mr. Thomas Stewart, Farnworth Mills, Stockport, turned out for an advance of wages, they alleging that their employer is paying a lower rate of wages than other part es for a similar description of work. The servants of the establishment, and also the police-force for examination. It is to be hoped, by severely punishing them, that all fighting for the future will cease, and, as hitherto, the greatest unanimity has prevailed between them.

PLAYING WITH EDGED TOOLS.—A private in the Life Guards, named Shields, stationed at Windsor, was within a hair's breadth of losing his life on Friday last between the military and civilians, which has resulted in the most desperate affray between them, which, it is feared, if not put a stop to, will not only end in murder, but considerable damage to property. Several rioters have been taken into custody, and the affair is not yet at an end. A policeman was prevented by the assembled crowd from taking the body to the dead-house. The body was, however, conveyed to the dead-house through a back way, and a coroner's inquest was held on it on Monday, when a verdict of wilful murder was returned against a number of persons, who are now in custody.

DEPLORABLE AFFRAY BETWEEN THE MILITARY AND THE CIVILIANS AT WOOLWICH.—For some nights past the town has been thrown into considerable state of excitement from the series of hostilities that has been carried on between the military and civilians, which has resulted in the most desperate affray between them, which, it is feared, if not put a stop to, will not only end in murder, but considerable damage to property. Several rioters have been taken into custody, and the affair is not yet at an end. A policeman was prevented by the assembled crowd from taking the body to the dead-house. PORTSMOUTH, Monday.—The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will visit this port on Monday next on official business, and to attend her Majesty on her embarkation on board the Royal yacht at this or any adjacent port. It will be recollected that their Lordships' last excursion was to Plymouth in one of the Admiralty steamers. The Victoria and Albert Royal yacht, Captain Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, will leave the shore to-morrow afternoon, with Admiral Sir George Cockburn on board. It is not expected that she will arrive here before Tuesday, as it is understood to be her pleasure and Admiral's intention to have a short cruise in her, in order to test her capabilities both in steaming and sailing with the wind at every point, so that she may be enabled to make an official report of any alterations to her Majesty. The Sir Vincent, 104, Captain Rowley, is the flag of Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, she not yet gone out to Spithead, in consequence of the neap tides. She is all ready, and will go out on Wednesday, or as soon as there is sufficient water to enable her to do so. To this our present quotations of the [illegible] market refer. "Serve him right," was the commentary; "why didn't he buy one, and not pay for it?" Answer from your tailor. Let no one suppose this is à propos to a horse being bought at Doncaster.

The only event of any importance just now on the tapis of the turf is the great St. Leger, as they call it. For this, Cotherstone, the winner of the Derby, is backed at odds. In 1834 Perfume, the winner of the Derby, was backed for it at odds, and lost. In 1837 Epirus, who couldn't lose it, fell down, "to show the rogues they lied." Coronation winner of the Derby, in 1840, was safe to win the Leger: so then did odds on him and [illegible] which occur within two days of each other the St. Leger and the 200 sovs. Sweepstakes, or the Cup day of the Doncaster week—with nineteen subscribers. Why do not more so say they have only two thousand pounds, but why have our reasons for limiting our observations to the pair. These are Cotherstone and Napier—the best three-year-olds of the season that have been out. The former is backed to win the Leger, with odds on him; in defiance of the risk which attaches to the decoy repetilla, we warn our readers to eschew the example of such betting. We may have some foundation for this advice; at all events, it may be relied on. Before the day arrives the bettors of odds on Cotherstone will have good reason to tremble for their temerity. Tattersall's business upon the Leger was a nominal indication of how outsiders stand to the Derby and long figures: till after Newmarket the Derby will be "heavy" in the market.

WEDNESDAY.

The list in appearance contrasted rather favourably with the first day, and, coupled with the inviting state of the weather in the morning, had a visible influence on the attendance; the stands were a tolerably filled, there was a tolerable display of fashion, and humours of all kinds, albeit infinitely below par, was more encouraging. The sport, we are compelled to admit, and not confine what we had better parted: The Two-year-old Stakes ended in a walk over, the Gentlemen's Race was a failure, and the "Heats" were so unequivocally in favour of the Flatcatcher as to deprive the race of any kind of interest. The weather, as we have stated, was propitious in the early part of the day, and it continued so until after the Two Magna Carta Stakes was decided. From that time until the close of the day the rain was unceasing. The races came off as follows:—

The Surrey and Middlesex Stakes of 25 sovs each, 12 ft. Two miles and a dis. (30 subs. 11 of whom declared)

Duke of Richmond's Elysium, 3 yrs, 8st .. .. (Abdale) 1

ROYAL REGATTA.

The annual regatta, under the patronage of her Majesty and Prince Albert, took place at Torquay, on Monday, the 21st instant, with more than ordinary splendour. The noble bay presented a scene for nautical sports altogether unrivalled. Landlocked on three sides, the water is almost always smooth, and of sufficient draught for large yachts to the very heart of the cliffs; whilst the picturesque heights around Torquay command an uninterrupted panorama of the moving scene. Its central position between the Eastern and Western Tower Clubs as always rendered Torbay a favourite rendezvous and a neutral ground for contest between the two squadrons.

On the 19th notice was received that the commodore, with twenty of the largest yachts, would leave Cowes on that day, but much anxiety was felt, lest the sudden shift of wind to the westward about Selsey Bill should baffle their progress, and that no blue ensigns would have to provide sport for the rest on that day. About noon, however, the leading vessels were descried from the Leeboard, and a spirited passage in a very few hours was made. Each encountering a thunder-storm between the Needles and St. Alban's Head, and having had rounded with a most severe gravity in their teeth through the greater part of their course, by nightfall the commodore and his white squadron had safely anchored the bay.

On the morning of the regatta there were not less than forty yachts assembled, and the merriment but of prizes, including the splendid challenge-cup of one hundred sovereigns, promised a holiday's sport. Nothing could exceed the brilliancy of the scene.

> "All glorious bright Phœbus illumin'd Torbay"
> "Whilst not a cloud o'ercast the sunny scene,
> And not a breeze disturb'd the deep serene."

At the hour of starting the sea-breeze succeeded the sweet calm of the summer morning, and freshened during the running into a full gale topsail breeze.

The Challenge Cup was won by the Comet cutter, 50 tons, beating the Gulnare by 1 min. 45 sec., and Ocella. The fortnight entered away her main boom in starting.

The [illegible] was not run for a [illegible] number of vessels not having entered in [illegible]

The [illegible] [illegible] the Pauline and the [illegible] nothing could, in point of fact, be the contest between the two smaller boats, after sailing, at the onset, thirty-five minutes, they came in, at the second round, literally neck and neck, the Pauline having by half a boat's length.

Rowing matches was a hard-contested match between about fifteen of the Torquay fishing boats constituted the day's sport.

The Royal Dockyard Yarborough, and a party of forty-six of the Yacht Club dined together at Messrs's Family Hotel, and attended the ball at Messrs Royal Hotel, where the élite of the county fashion did keep up the festivities until a late hour.

On the following morning the gallant squadron started, against a heavy head-wind, for Plymouth.

REGATTA AND CATTERHAM REGATTA.—This regatta came off on Tuesday last, when, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, a large company of spectators from Henley and Reading assembled to witness the revival of a species of amusement which has long been in abeyance in that neighbourhood, and which, from the spirited exertions made on the present occasion, [illegible] The [illegible] places and a variety of the sports were highly creditable to the promoters of the manly and invigorating pastime. Want of space prevents our giving more than the results of two principal events, but we must not omit to mention that the names of the competitors comprise many of the most skilful boatmen of the neighbourhood.

CRICKET.—MARYLEBONE C. MIDLAND COUNTIES.—[illegible] match commenced on Barker's Cricket ground at Leicester on Monday. At twelve o'clock the time appointed for the play to commence, the umpires tossed for choice of innings, which was in favour of the Midland Counties Club, who, contrary to usual custom, took the bat, putting in J. Nicholas, Esq., and Parker. On the part of the Marylebone, Lillywhite and Hillyer were appointed to bowl. H. O. Nethercote, Esq., keeping wicket. We have only room for the score of this capital match, which ended on Wednesday:—

COWES REGATTA.

In continuing our account of the festivities of the last week at this queen of aquatic ports, we commence with "her Majesty's Cup day," as it is termed, or more commonly known as "The Regatta." Thursday the 17th instant was the day fixed for the yachts of the Royal Yacht Squadron to sail for a cup, value £100, which is given annually by her Most Gracious Majesty, as the patroness of this noble institution, to be sailed for; and, in order to give greater éclat to the occasion, a subscription was got up by the inhabitants of the town, who formed themselves into a committee, with a determination of making that day one continued scene of festivity and amusement. In addition to the fund raised by the town, her Most Gracious Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert contributed £30 in two donations, which was spent in music, boat-racing, &c., for the additional recreation and amusement of the numerous visitors that flocked from all parts to be eye-witnesses of the gorgeous spectacle; and it is not saying too much when we assert that it was one of the most splendid sights ever witnessed at this or any other port. Nothing was wanting to envelop the scene, both ashore and afloat, save that of a refreshing breeze to wait out the hunting of every hue and shape which surmounted models of naval architecture, which, for symmetry, beauty, and elegance, have never been surpassed, if equalled. The morning was all sunshine, calm as a zephyr, and therefore the spectators were seen in all directions wending their way to the Parade. Vehicles of every class, from the "coroneted chariot" to the humble "jaunting car," all filled with gaily-dressed personages, were pouring in from all parts of the island; while steamers and sailing-vessels from the neighbouring ports of Southampton, Portsmouth, Lymington, &c., furnished their quota. The Royal Yacht Squadron House, the Castle, and neighbouring villas and their sloping lawns, were crowded with the rank and beauty of the land. Here was to be seen the hardy veteran, looking joyous with the thoughts of the sports about to be celebrated; and there was the forest of masts which betokened that he was not likely to be disappointed. Only one element (wind) was wanting to perfect such a day; and although in the offing a calm prevailed, still there was no lack of airs on shore. The band of the Royal Marines, by permission of Colonel Jones, was stationed within the castle railings, and played many selections from the celebrated operas of the day. Eleven o'clock was the appointed hour for the following yachts to start for her Majesty's cup, viz.:—

Intrepid cutter, 85 tons,	Earl of Tyrconnel, flag,	Red with white rose.
Hebe " 66 "	R. Stephenson, Esq., "	Yellow and blue cross.
Charm " 73 "	M. J. Higgins, Esq., "	Black.

but all who were anxiously waiting beneath the scorching rays of a summer's sun in expectation of seeing the start, were for a while in doubt whether the match would be decided or not. The sun had scarcely reached her meridian altitude, when a breeze on the horizon was observed slowly advancing from the south-eastern quarter, and which shortly began to ripple the surface of the water, when a gun from the Royal Kestrel announced the glad tidings of "prepare." At noon precisely the signal gun for starting was fired, when the yachts simultaneously wore away, and having luffed to a fine south-east breeze, stood off in the tide to the eastward, accompanied by the Ruby steamer; the Charm was the northernmost vessel, and the Intrepid, being next the Castle, was the weathermost, and kept the lead; these two yachts and the Eudora kept their reach, on the starboard tack, for about a quarter of an hour, and then tacked to the southward, while the Hebe continued on for a quarter of an hour longer, in the hope of finding the breeze freshen to leeward, but in which she was mistaken, and lost ground; and the Pelle Bank she shifted her jib, and afterwards regained her position. From this time the yachts worked to the eastward, "tack for tack," until they reached the Edgar, which was rounded in the following order:—

	h.	m.	s.
Intrepid	2	5	0
Eudora	2	10	0
Hebe	2	15	30
Charm	2	17	30

They then proceeded for the Royal George Buoy, which they left on the "larboard hand," and having hoisted their jib-topsails, kept away under the north shore, for the Buoys of the Brambles, which, with the Lepe Buoy, they had to round ere they returned to the goal. The wind at three p.m. died away to a calm, and the match was then uninteresting, the vessels being left entirely to the influence of the tide. Off Stubbleton we left the Intrepid about a quarter of a mile ahead of the Eudora, and this vessel ahead of the Hebe half a mile, and the Charm three quarters of a mile astern of her. The yachts, between six and seven o'clock, came in as follows: Eudora, first; and Intrepid: the latter vessel, which from the wind had had the lead after rounding the Lepe Buoy first, was drifted to the westward considerably, and the leewardmost yacht became the nearest home, and first caught the breeze, which again sprung up, and won the match by about a minute and a half. The Charm did not go the whole distance. Having followed the yachts, we returned to the thousands of spectators whom we had left behind, and who we found had been kept amused by rowing and sailing matches and duck hunts, without intermission, throughout the day. Independent of the band of the Castle, various other musical bands of lesser importance were stationed on the Parade, on board the starting vessel, and in various parts of the town. Having given a minute account of the regatta by day, we cannot omit to furnish our readers with an account of the fireworks, which terminated the amusements.

Never, we much have the pleasure of visiting the place; the day, at night they were trebled. Thousands were present to witness the exhibitions of fireworks. Long before the appointed time every avenue was filled, and every building was literally covered, all anxiously expecting the signal from the noble commodore. At nine precisely the gun fired, and in an instant all was fairy work. The splendid yachts the Kestrel, Brilliant, Fairy, Circassian, and others, were illuminated. Portfires and lights of every hue at once environed the scene. This is indescribable, but, if any idea can be given of the grandeur which here presented itself, it must be by the pencil of a Turner. Blazes of light and indescribable masses of shade composed the picture. All was indistinct: the figures on shore and afloat appeared only as living masses of shade. After the first exhibition afloat, the shore in like manner became illumined. Each of the yachts were every instant discharged. This, together with the firing of cannon and the responding by the yachts, gave a tout ensemble which could only remind us of a place besieged. The cheering of the populace only showed how much they were gratified. After several exhibitions of this kind from his lordship's yacht the Kestrel, the cheers broke out simultaneously both ashore and afloat. This shows that gratitude was not wanting to him who was the "lion of the day." After about fifteen successive discharges of various pieces of pyrotechnic art the whole concluded by a flight of rockets, such, perhaps, as have never been witnessed in this port. Three cheers for the Queen, three for the Prince, and three for the Earl of Yarborough, concluded the entertainments. In a short time all was still. In the place of a multitude might be seen a solitary sentinel, and in lieu of fictitious blaze and splendour the waning moon had risen in her watery bed and was admiring the whole scene.

On Friday the annual ball was held at the R.Y.S. House, at which 396 personages were present, among whom might be mentioned the Marchioness of Sligo, the Countesses Listowell, Belmore, Delawarr; Ladies Somerville, Pakenham, &c. &c.

A Subscription Cup of £50 was given on Friday, open to yachts of any Royal Yacht Club not exceeding 35 tons. Course, from Cowes Roads twice round the West Bury of the Middle, and all the Buoys of the Brambles, and Lepe Buoy, and return to Cowes. The following yachts started, viz.:

No.	Tons.	Owner.
1 Gnome.....	23	of London, Captain Mecson.
2 Enigma ...	25	Ipswich, W. Read, Esq.
3 Champion ..	25	London, H. Gunstone, Esq.
4 Blue Belle ..	25	London, A. Fountaine, Esq.
5 Black Bess..	20	Dublin, G. M. Corsellis, Esq.
6 Satan.....	21	London, H. Gibson, Esq.
7 Amethyst ..	23	Southampton, L. Snedden, Esq.
8 Zadora.....	32	Southampton, Chas. Bromley, Esq.
9 Jane.....	16	Bristol, W. Pardit, Esq.
10 Cruiser	25	London, W. Pc[illegible] Esq.
11 Phantom ..	20	London, A. O. Wilkinson, Esq.

The whole of the yachts went off in beautiful order with the aid of the flood and a fine breeze from S.E. On passing Cowes Castle, in coming round, the Zadora was first, 1h. 57m. 30s.; closely followed by the Champion, 1h. 58m. 40s.; Blue Belle, 1h. 59s. 20s.; Phantom, 2h.; Gnome, 2h. 3m. 15s.; Amethyst, 2h. 7m. 45s.; Enigma, 2h. 8m. 5s.; Black Bess, 2h. 8m. 20s.; Sabrina and Cruiser together, 2h. 17m. 40s.; and last, the Jane, 2h. 35m. 16s. Eventually the yachts on the second round came in as follows:—

	h.	m.	sec.
Champion.....	5	7	30
Phantom	5	26	20
Zadora	5	27	30

and the others close after. It was a well contested race, and at the latter part of it there was an easterly wind.

ROYAL ARTILLERY COMPANY—SHOOTING FOR THE GOLD MEDAL.

RIFLE PRACTICE AT WORMWOOD SCRUBS.

The periodical meetings of the Artillery Company are distinguished equally for their order "at all points" on the parade, and for their good fellowship at their well-supplied board.

SHOOTING WITHOUT THE REST.

In addition to its six companies of Infantry, the association comprises four others, viz., those of Artillery, Grenadiers, Light Infantry, and Yagers; and for the due exercise of the corps occasional field-days are appointed in the Artillery Ground; as well a day sometimes in the summer season, for ball-practice, in the vicinity of the metropolis. The last-named division met at Wormwood Scrubs on the 16th instant. The annals of the Honourable Artillery Company of the city of London bear ample witness to its importance as a military association of citizens, whose public services have been sanctioned and recognised by our best historical authorities from its earliest formation, and whose steady firmness in the maintenance of national independence and civil order, and the just and natural rights of the social and established union of the state, has ever placed it, in the time of public danger, foremost in the post of honour. In those records of the society are enrolled the names of many of our monarchs, the heirs-apparent to the Crown, the first of our nobility, and those who have ennobled themselves by probity and valour; these have sought to enrol themselves in all periods of our history, and to contribute their exertions, in conjunction with its numerous other members, "practising the grace and utility of the military art," and serving in the upright cause of public peace.

SHOOTING WITH THE REST.

The term Artillery, which formerly meant the weapons of the archer (and it is so used in the Old Testament, 1 Samuel xx., v. 40), was universally adopted so long as archery continued to furnish arms for the military art. In the charter of Henry VIII. it is seen to include "hand-gonnes," and we recognise its progressive employment until fire-arms and bayonets became universal.

In a continuation of Stowe we read that "the art of shooting in great ordnance is taught in a field, inclosed with a brick wall, without Bishopsgate, called the Artillery Garden." This ancient ground of the company, which had been a campus martius from the time of the Romans, was given up for a new location on their present territory, about the close of the reign of James I., at which time the master of the members was about 6000.

As the Artillery Company advanced in numbers and respectability, it was considered as an auxiliary to the established military force of the City, in aid of the eleven regiments of trained bands, who also practised in the Artillery Ground; but subsequent periods of neglect rendered the trained bands contemptible in discipline and use, till they were transformed by the interposition of Parliament, about fifty years ago, into a militia; "by which," says Hasmore (the historian of the association), "they have acquired respect and honour."

SHOOTING SITTING, WITH REST.

OFFICER OF R. A. COMP.

The Artillery Company, in the meanwhile, has continued, from its earliest days, a distinct and independent corps, well-officered and well disciplined, and preserving, by steady firmness and good conduct, not only its own principle, but the well-affected order of its fellow-citizens."

The captaincy-general and colonelcy of the company, which had been conferred upon the late George IV. when Prince of Wales, in 1766, were, on his death, in 1830, given to his late Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex. His successor is not yet named. The commissions are in the gift of the Crown. The Armoury House, within the spacious ground, and which is observable by all who pass along the City-road, on the town side, within a short distance of Finsbury-square, was built from a plan of Mr. Stibbs, and finished in 1735.

As auxiliary to the other military force of the metropolis, and in aid of the civil power, the efficient co-operation of the Honourable Artillery Company has been required, and its exertions respected and acknowledged from the earliest period of its establishment to the present day; and its exercise has been enlarged, suspended, and renewed, by the voluntary resolution of its members, as the existing circumstances of the time have required or relaxed their exertions. Thus, by long-tried valour, and steady attachment to its country's cause, this company has often proved the bulwark of domestic protection, and verified the superscription of its ensign—"Arma pacis fulcra"—that "arms are the maintenance of peace."

We also append a representation of the first-class medal bestowed on the late occasion for superiority in rifle-shooting, and which was won by Mr. Banner, a veteran of the company, he having belonged to it for upwards of fifty years.

LECTURESHIP OF ST. JOHN'S, SOUTHWARK.—On Tuesday a special meeting of the parishioners and inhabitants of St. John's, Southwark, was held in the Vestry-hall, Fair-street, Southwark, Mr. Rosier, the senior churchwarden, in the chair, when the Rev. J. C. Saunders was elected to fill the office of Sunday evening lecturer, in the room of the Rev. John Davis, who had resigned, and to whom the thanks of the vestry and of the parishioners were awarded, for the manner in which he had fulfilled the duties of his office for a period of ten years.

THE GOLD MEDAL.

THE LONDON AND BRIGHTON RAILWAY.—The reduction in the fares has had a most beneficial effect at Brighton. On Saturday the last train brought down three hundred and seventy passengers from London, and on Sunday upwards of one thousand passengers were carried to and fro on the line. The General Steam Navigation Company are also reaping great advantages, generally carrying nearly one hundred passengers each trip. On Saturday night the Company's vessel, the Dart, Captain Cheeseman, left the chain-pier with seventy-five passengers, amongst them several labourers engaged for the railway works now going on in France.

BOULOGNE RACES.

As the report of these races appeared only in a portion of the impression of our journal of last week, we subjoin it, with a picturesque representation of the course: it lies at about six miles' distance from the town, close upon the seashore, and the ground is accordingly very sandy. The first day's races took place on Monday, and the following are the results:—The Prix du Comte de Paris, 1000f., was won by Count d' Hédouville's Karagheuse, beating Mr. Carter's Dona Isabella, and three others.—The Hack Stakes, gentlemen riders, were won by Mr. Parker's bay gelding, beating Mr. Pogson's Bucelle.—Prix du Pas de Calais, 500f., was won by Mr. Pogson's Job, beating Mr. Parker's bay gelding.—Prix du Ministre du Commerce, 2000f., was won by Mr. Poutalès's Maria, beating Count d' Hédouville's Rhénoplattie, and two others. This was an interesting race, particularly as one of the conditions imposed by the Minister of Commerce was, that the distance (24 miles) be run in 5 minutes 20 seconds. The first heat was run in 5 minutes, the second heat 5 minutes 4 seconds.—The Steam Packet Stakes, 1000f., were won by Mr. Maude's Miserere, beating Mr. Carter's Curé de Tilley.

THE FIRE IN FETTER LANE.

In the late edition of our journal of last week we gave a few particulars of this lamentable catastrophe, which, though of small extent compared with the conflagration in Tooley-street, is the more to be deplored on account of the loss of life occasioned by it.

It appears that the fire broke out at about half-past three o'clock on Saturday morning on the premises of Mr. William Newberry, an operative chemist, No. 65, on the west side of Fetter-lane, nearly opposite the White Horse Inn. The premises in question, although not of extensive frontage, were of considerable depth, and abutted on Bartlett's-passage, leading from Fetter-lane to Bartlett's buildings. The lower part was filled with chemical apparatus and combustibles, while the upper part was rented by a Mr. and Mrs. Rose. Mr. Newberry came home at a late hour, and shortly after his arrival a tremendous explosion, which seemed to shake the foundation of the adjoining houses, was heard, and the house was discovered in flames, the shop front blown to atoms, and Mr. Newberry lying on the ground insensible. A shriek was next heard from the apartments above, and a person with a wooden leg was seen endeavouring to climb out of the third-floor window, failing to do which, he precipitated himself headlong into the street. It was thought that the fall had killed him, for he exhibited no signs of life, and he and his unfortunate landlord were removed on shutters to the hospital, but the latter expired in great agony shortly after his admission, and the former, who proved to be Mr. Rose, has since died. The sisters of Mrs. Rose, two maiden ladies of the name of M'Crendle, had slept at the house that night, it being their intention in the morning to start on a visit to Aberdeen, and before any assistance could be rendered them they had perished.

Considerable delay occurred in the arrival of the engines, in consequence of the brigade being required at the other fires, and the adjoining houses were thereby placed in imminent peril; but, after a little exertion, all alarm for their safety subsided, the immense power of the combustible matter not having left a body of fire likely to be of any duration, but merely a heap of smouldering ruins. By the continuous application of the hose, the heat of the burning fragments became less intolerable, and the first effort of the firemen now was to search among the dying embers for the remains of the unfortunate ladies. In a short time, a cry of horror arose among the crowd, on the blackened corpse of Mrs. Rose being seen in a shell, which was being conveyed by the brigade and police out of the building to the undertaker's in Bartlett's-passage, where the bodies of her two sisters were afterwards conveyed as soon as they were extricated from the ruins. The house presents a mere wreck, and the explosion must have been terrific, for the back part of the structure, facing Bartlett's-buildings, is completely blown away, and it is supposed by those who were acquainted with the house, that the fire must have been occasioned by the combustion of a large quantity of detonating powder, but whether spontaneous or not, of course cannot be ascertained.

An inquest was held on the sufferers on Saturday, and the following verdict returned:—"That the deceaseds' deaths were occasioned by an accidental explosion; but they begged to add their deep regret that gross negligence in the mode of keeping the ladders belonging to the parish might have contributed to the loss of one or more of the deceaseds' lives."

CHAPTER XXI.

THE JEWELS.

F course, after what had occurred at Sir Arthur's, Alice could not be induced to leave her father. That she loved Fred. fondly was a fact which she had not the slightest wish to conceal; but Caroline had caused her to repudiate utterly the idea of taking the step proposed. Dr. Hawtree therefore wrote a kind letter to Fred., assuring him that the esteem in which he held him was higher than ever, and endeavouring to induce the conviction that, as in England there were far more favourable accounts of the progress of the British army than in France, the termination of the war was not so remote as he had imagined.

At this period, Caroline again took her aunt Lady Grange, into favour—having proved that she was perfectly correct in stating that Sir Arthur was jealous, and feeling persuaded that her object had been to put her on her guard against giving him even the semblance of a cause, and, as it generally happens in cases of renewed friendship, they became more communicative than ever.

"My dear," said Lady Grange, one morning—mutual confidence having been completely restored—"I am going to treat you without a conscience—my usurious old friend, Archman —you recollect him?"

"Oh, yes," returned Caroline, blushing.

"I want my jewels for the evening, and I happened to be excessively fortunate last night —I won nine consecutive doubles, my dear! Will you accompany me?"

"Oh, with pleasure! By-the-by, I want to see him myself!"

"You want to see him?"

"Why, the fact is, I do not mind telling you, of course. I some time since wanted a little money for a certain purpose, and remembering that I had frequently been with you to Archman's, I took him my best suite of brilliants."

"Oh, I am not at all curious, my dear. Most of us occasionally require these little accommodations, and Archman is certainly a very safe person. Shall we go in your carriage.

"Oh, yes, we had better, it being at the door."

They accordingly entered the chariot, and Lady Grange felt determined to discover, if possible, the purpose for which Caroline had pledged those brilliants. She perfectly well knew that Sir Arthur was exceedingly liberal—that his supply of money to Caroline had always fully equalled her demand—and hence, seeing that Caroline never played heavily, she was utterly at a loss to conceive why these bracelets had been pledged. On the other hand Caroline was highly pleased with this opportunity of indirectly ascertaining beyond all doubt whether the three hundred pounds had been received by Darnley. He had never said a syllable on the subject to her—of course she had never hinted the matter to him—and although she felt sure that the money had been sent, she thought it possible, just possible that he had left the Fleet with Sir Arthur before it arrived.

When, therefore, they had been shown into Archman's drawing-room, as usual—having left the carriage at some distance from the house—and the pearls of Lady Grange had been duly restored to her, Caroline observed, "I presume that that money was received, Mr. Archman?"

"Oh, yes," replied Archman, "I have the cheque duly backed as a voucher, which I will show you."

"Oh, that is perfectly unnecessary."

"It is here," repeated Archman, turning over the cheques he had received from his bankers, and having found the one in question, he handed it to Caroline.

In an instant, with the eye of a hyæna, Lady Grange saw "Vincent Darnley" written on the back. She, however, appeared to be deeply engaged in looking her case of pearls, and Caroline having expressed herself satisfied, returned the cheque to Archman, without the most distant suspicion of the secret having been discovered.

They then left the house, and having re-entered the carriage, Lady Grange observed, "You know my brilliants?—of course yours are infinitely more valuable, but I wonder what sum he would lend me upon them in case I found it necessary to place them on his hands?"

"Why really I cannot tell. I wanted three hundred, which he let me have immediately."

"Oh, then he would advance two hundred upon mine."

"No doubt of it! Yes, I should say that he would."

Not another word was said upon the subject. Lady Grange now knew quite sufficient for her purpose; but in order that her design might not be frustrated by precipitation, she suffered a week to elapse before she took that step, by which she felt sure her object would be accomplished.

In the mean time Sir Arthur was exceedingly unhappy. Caroline's tyranny had become intolerable. She appeared to do all in her power to make him wretched, while expostulation on his part was altogether out of the question. She would not suffer him to speak, she would fly at him like a tigress if he dared to utter a word of reproof and although he still passionately loved her, he could not but feel that her affection for him had vanished. Often would he reflect upon this when alone, with feelings of agony: often would reflection drive him almost mad. Her violence increased daily. He did all in his power to delight her; her pleasure was his study; he was in everything her slave, yet had she absolutely hated him he could not have been more haughtily contemned. Those tender endearments which were at first so effectual, were now fondly lavished upon her in vain. Kindness had lost its virtue affection its power; she appreciated neither his devotion nor his love, but requiring absolute, supreme, the most abject submission to her will, and would have it!—the lightest word from him would engender a storm.

None can therefore feel surprised that a man like Sir Arthur—fascinated on the one hand and sensitive in the extreme on the other—should have been wretched; nor will there be under the circumstances, the slightest difficulty in conceiving what his feelings were when on the midst of this wretchedness, he received the following note.

"SIR ARTHUR CLIVE, BART.,

"You appear to have disregarded my previous warning, and the proverbial blindness of love in consequence was never more apparent; but I so highly respect you, that I will not see your fond nature abused without making another effort to induce you to open your eyes to the real character of your wife.

"This on my part is a mere matter of gratitude, and I will be grateful in spite of your manifest disadvantage to have so important a service rendered.

"Go to Archman's, in Long Acre—he is a silversmith; tell him that you have called to redeem the diamonds of Lady Cleveland, and that you wish to see the cheque for three hundred pounds, as a proof that that sum which he advanced upon them was received by Vincent Darnley. I leave you to draw your own inferences from the facts, but believe me to be, Sir Arthur Cleveland, A FRIEND."

"Now let me be calm—calm," he exclaimed, having read this note with vehement emotion. "If possible, let me be calm. Such a letter I prove that it be either treasonable or true. Here is a clue!—a direct, a positive clue; there is no ambiguity here. As in plain, straightforward, and I do prove it to be the truth, as could wish, he at an end for ever."

Now he clapped his hand, and thrusting it to his pocket with the note, he left the house. Instantly a hackney-coach, preceded hastily to Archman's as directed but on his arrival he was informed that he had gone as it appear to be perfectly tranquil. In this he partly succeeded, and on his arrival he entered the shop with apparent self-possession, and inquired for Mr. Archman in a firm but subdued tone.

Mr. Archman immediately came forward, and Sir Arthur having intimated to him that he wished to be private, was shown with great politeness into the drawing-room, and requested to take a seat.

"I have been commissioned," said Sir Arthur, "to redeem the diamonds of Lady Cleveland."

"Lady Cleveland," echoed Archman, "Will you oblige me with your name?"

"My name is Cleve and. Here is my card."

"Oh—I beg pardon—exactly—Sir Arthur—very good."

"The sum advanced I believe was three hundred pounds?"

"Three hundred—exactly—yes, that was the sum."

"Then now much do repairs of me?"

"Sixty pounds was the sum agreed upon if redeemed within six months."

"Sixty! Very well; then I'll write you a cheque for three hundred and sixty, and perhaps you will direct one of your servants to get it cashed while I remain."

"Oh that is quite unnecessary."

"I'd rather have it so."

"As you please, Sir Arthur, just as you please."

The cheque was written, and when Archman had despatched a young man to the banker's, he drew forth the brilliants, and then produced the note.

"You gave a cheque, I believe, for the three hundred pounds," said Sir Arthur, "payable to Darnley?"

"I am, I did so."

"As a sort of acknowledgment on his part I may as well have it. I suppose it is perfectly useless to you?"

"Oh, quite so, now the transaction is at an end. I'll give it you with pleasure. I have it in my chest here, I know," he added, and everyone, I be handed it over to Sir Arthur.

At was now clear. Sir Arthur saw that it had been made payable to Darnley, and that Darnley had endorsed it: and while he was dwelling upon his own dishonour and Caroline's shame, Archman, who had always to business, produced a brilliant case of sapphires, the beauty of which he, of course, very highly extolled, with the view of tempting Sir Arthur to make a purchase. And there was a time when that temptation would not have been resisted, but that time was past. Still Archman persevered, and continued to descant on their surpassing splendour and inestimable value, &c., for young some returned from the banker's, when Sir Arthur put the cheque with Caroline's brilliants into his pocket, took care of Mr. Archman, and re-entered the coach.

At first he felt that he had now but one course to pursue—that course being at once to accuse her of having been faithless, and then to cast her off; but on reflection it occurred to him that as she had no proof of her shame! And in the case of what is the judgment wrong—was her circumstantial. He therefore resolved to act with great caution, but nevertheless firmly believed that when the diamonds were produced she would at once confess herself!

On reaching home, fully prepared for a scene, he accordingly proceeded alone to the front drawing-room where—as it the thing had been designed expressly for the occasion—he found Caroline and Darnley together.

"For here!" he exclaimed, as Darnley rose with his hand extended, "Stand off! I once called you a villain! I have now, beyond all doubt, proved you to be one!"

"I deny it, Sir Arthur Cleveland—I deny it!" cried Darnley. "No man on earth, sir, can prove me to be a villain! I am no villain!"

"Indeed!" resumed Sir Arthur, with a look of contempt. "Indeed! Do you know this hand?" he added, producing the cheque, "as it yours, or is it not?"

"It is mine."

"I know it! There's the door. Leave instantly!—and never dare to enter the house again!"

"What is this?—what is this? what is it all about!" exclaimed Caroline.

"Silence, madam! I have something to say presently to you! Will you leave the house sir?"

"No, I will not until you have explained!"

Sir Arthur rang the bell with violence, and while Caroline and Darnley were looking at each other with an expression of amazement—continued to ring it till the servant appeared.

"Turn that fellow out!" he exclaimed, "throw him into the street"

"At your peril," cried Caroline, addressing the servant, who stood as if paralyzed, "touch him at your peril! Leave the room, sir, instantly, I desire you!"

"Infamous woman!" cried Sir Arthur, when, seizing at Darnley, he seized him by the throat and endeavoured to eject him.

Darnley, however, stood firm, and grasping the arms of his assailant, exclaimed, "Your age and infirmities protect you."

"Scoundrel," cried Sir Arthur, with desperate energy. "I require no protection from either!" and with far more strength than an old man could be supposed to possess, he struck him from his room.

Now that it never would do to be that conquered in the presence of Caroline, Darnley rallied and struggled fiercely, the old man's high blood and spirit gave him strength, and it was found to be no easy matter to subdue him.

"Why, what's all this?" exclaimed Caroline, to the servant, "why do you not part them?"

For a time, who was a powerful fellow, on the struggle continued, but his left arm between them, and striking out with the right as if he had had a bullock before him, sent Darnley flying down the stairs.

By the time the whole house had been raised; every servant in a state of alarm rushed to the spot, and as Sir Arthur the young commanded them to turn him out, they were about to do upon this, when as they knew himself up, and having had to Sir Arthur Cleveland, I were now gone, but the matter small not rest here." took up his hat and left the house.

Furnessing for desperation of Sir Arthur, Caroline for a moment seemed to have struck him. She therefore rushed with her maid to her window, and tried to conceive the cause of this terrible storm, while Sir Arthur, who then felt perfectly exhausted, sank upon a couch in the drawing room, and put on his forehead.

And that at remained for some considerable time, attended by his champion—whom Caroline now of course hated, but whom the occasion had rendered necessary to him from the couch, as was suddenly seized with pains of the most excruciating character. He soon found that he had received himself beyond his strength, that he had sustained some serious internal injury, but being determined to send for nobody, he endured it with patience, and by virtue of moving himself gradually to and fro for a short time, the pain partially left him.

Attaching no importance to it then, and believing it to be the usual effect of any violent exertion to which the frame had been subjected, the thoughts returned to the one great point, namely, Caroline's and conviction. He accordingly sent for her, and being told that she refused not only what fresh cause for jealousy had been conceived, but what had done to justify the suspicions of Sir Arthur, hastened the summons, and entered the room with an expression of the most lofty indignation.

"Now, madam," said Sir Arthur, sternly, "the time is come. Sit there."

"Well what now?"

"Do you know those diamonds?" he inquired, drawing the case from his pocket; and in an instant Caroline turned pale as death. "I perceive you do know them. you know them well. You also know that, when I gave them to you, I believed that you would be for ever faithful to me."

"I—I—" Caroline, recovering from the confusion induced by the production of the diamonds, "What can you mean by all this? I—I—"

"Is no agony bearing, madam, will not avail you now. The time is past for that. Look, look, I perceive some one more me."

"Confession and penitence! Are you mad?"

No, madam, no! I am calm and self-possessed, although stung to the heart by the part you have enacted."

"How dare you apply such an epithet to me?"

"I ask to use no more of words, madam! Though old, despised, and hated by you, I am still one that to the point. Those diamonds you pledged them. For whom did you redeem them?"

"I—I—"

"I say, I must know the money thus raised."

"I do. I am not to own to you that I pledged them for Darnley I sent him the money then raised, and now last you know the beginning and the end. I hope last you have proved what narrow grounds on which you have for indignant jealousy to resolve. But you shall know more. You shall know the motive which induced me to commit this act of folly. Darnley was in prison,—you have the cheque, I perceive, look at the date, that you had by currency assured of truth of this statement. I went to him—you know it, for you mean, watched me—he wanted this three hundred pounds."

"Was this the time?"

"It was, but mistry yourself!"

"The three hundred pounds that he required on that occasion he had from me!"

"I know not that. I only saw the cheque as you perceive."

"The pitiful scoundrel! And how long, pray, have you carried on this system of robbing me to supply him with money?"

"I treat the question with contempt."

"Is this the only sum with which you have supplied him? Answer me that!"

"With certain contempt do I treat that question."

"I know your ingenuity, madam, well, and am glad to perceive that you have just sufficient self-respect left to prefer prevarication to a falsehood; but I'll put you no longer to the torture. I see clearly that you have been supporting this profligate villain—actually supporting him!"

"Sir Arthur Cleveland," said Caroline, with consummate dignity, "you forget, sir, the character and position of her to whom you are speaking. If not, and you imagine for one moment that I was, mistaken, I beg to submit to you that your conduct to myself and to that man ever received himself yet. The pledging of these brilliants for Darnley, I freely confess to myself, under any ordinary circumstances, be justified; and knowing now that you advanced the money for his release, I am sorry that I acted as I did; here am at once, my confessional my penitence; but I can suppose that because he is a stranger to the purest principle himself, I commission was vent misconstrued, I will merely submit to you that I was unable, and determined, you do not know me! No, Sir Arthur Cleveland, then I never was, and never shall be, I hold to be less sacred than my honour!"

"I wish to Heaven I could believe it."

"It is true, Sir Arthur Cleveland—you know it to be false!—you do not wish to believe it. You wait for proof of my dishonour!—it is that for which you pant, but be assured, Sir Arthur Cleveland, you pant for in vain."

"Words, Lady Cleveland, have now no effect upon me. There was a time when—proceeding from your lips these effect was all powerful, but that time is past, Lady Cleveland. I more to look at acts! they alone can guide my judgment now."

"What, then, am I to understand?"

"That you are not to remain—"

"Of course!"

"Of your business, madam!"

"Then would I rather die than condescend to undeceive you!"

"And as I am actuated, it follows that we must part."

"It is so. I am content. Sir Arthur Cleveland, I perceive he drawn up at once! you will see with what alacrity I'll sign it. Heaven knows, my life has been one of wretchedness since jealousy took possession of your soul, and from that it will be happiness to be free. Therefore let us, without delay, part, and for ever. I will send for my father on the instant, for I feel that I have already endured too much. But, base as you conceive me to be," she added, perceiving that Sir Arthur was about to speak, "your cruelty cannot sear up my heart: I cannot destroy the sympathy which has so long existed: I feel for you, still you are in pain! I know it! I also know that your age and infirmities—"

"Are nothing to you, madam!" Sir Arthur groaned deeply, "I perceive."

"Sir Arthur Cleveland, I—"

"It will leave me soon," said Sir Arthur, faintly, "it is but a passing pang."

"I fear not," said Caroline. "Falkland," she added, as the servant entered, "desire William to run to Dr. Hawtree, on the instant, to request his immediate attendance: be quick! You have, I fear, injured yourself seriously."

Sir Arthur leaned his face in her bosom as she stood beside him and sobbed like a child.

And that they remained—she supporting his head anxiously, and giving away his tears, while he fondly endeavoured to subdue her apprehensions—for the space of an hour, who ordered him to be immediately put to bed in his room, and sent off to London.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE AT BIRMINGHAM.

The ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the Queen's College of Medicine, at Birmingham, took place on Friday, August 18, in the presence of a numerous assemblage of the inhabitants of the town, together with a large body of students. The ceremony was opened by the Rev. C. Craven, incumbent of St. Peter's, offering up a prayer for the success of the undertaking. The Worshipful the High Bailiff, S. Kempson, Esq., deposited in the cavity of the stone a case hermetically sealed, and said, "I herein deposit copies of the royal charter of incorporation of the college about to be erected on this spot; of the Warneford prize trust deed; of the various addresses delivered by the Rev. Chancellor Law, the Rev. Vaughan Thomas, Dr. John Johnstone, Mr. Sands Cox; the prospectus of the College, with the list of professors, and the fundamental laws of the Queen's Hospital; together with coins of her most gracious Majesty the Queen Victoria, the patron; and I feel the greatest pleasure in congratulating the town that a collegiate institution of such a nature is about to be established. There are, I am aware, similar schools for the education of medical youth in the metropolis, of the greatest utility, but they are not equal to meet the demands of sickness and disease which are constantly being made upon them; and I again repeat that I rejoice at the establishment of a building necessary indeed for the exigencies of the increased population of the town and midland counties." The Principal, Dr. Johnstone, then affixed a brass plate, bearing the following inscription:—

This tablet is to commemorate the laying the foundation stone of the Queen's College, at Birmingham, on Friday, August 18, 1843.
SAMUEL WILSON WARNEFORD, LL.D., Visitor.

JAMES THOMAS LAW, M.A., Vice-Principal.
JOHN EDWARD PIERCY, Esq., Treasurer.
WILLIAM SANDS COX, F.R.S., Dean of the Faculty.
ROBERT DAWBARN and DYAS, Architects.
THOMAS PASHBY, Contractor.

The stone having been lowered, and laid by the Principal, assisted by the architect, G. Drury, Esq., with the usual formalities, the venerable doctor addressed the assembly, and observed that he would not enter into the many important points which were likely to accrue to the inhabitants of the town, the midland counties, and the country at large, from the establishment of that college, which had now received the royal charter of incorporation of our most amiable Queen Victoria, and the support of Adelaide, the excellent Queen Dowager; and that the noble patronage of the building necessary indeed for the exigencies of the increased population of the town and midland counties." LITERATURE.

THE ERRORS OF EMIGRANTS, &c. By GEORGE FLOWER, of Illinois Grove, Shoe-lane.

The author of this shilling pamphlet is an intelligent and, what is better, an evidently honest-minded Englishman, who some twenty years since quitted his fatherland for the forest and the prairie of North America. He is, therefore, admirably qualified to warn such as desire to follow in his footsteps against the "errors of" previous "emigrants," and to afford them much wholesome, practical advice. His work, indeed, is an emphatically useful one. The accompanying sketch of the extent and resources of the new states of the American Union, and the description of the progress and present aspect of the English settlement in Illinois, is highly in[illegible]

THE ORCHESTRATE TO HIS ART.—Rossini either never loved a woman as he does by which he has amassed considerable wealth, thinking them "base degrees by which he did ascend," or he is out of his mind, for, by a late account from Paris, we regret to learn that, such is his present abhorrence of music, that he has even banished his pianoforte from his presence. But of our readers are not acquainted with the many brilliant operas he has produced—probably a list of his more serious compositions may not prove uninteresting. 1. "Ciro in Babilonia." An oratorio composed in 1812. 2. "Ferraras, for the Lent season, and performed for the benefit of the Teatro Communale.—2. "Grand Mass." Composed at Bologna in 1819.—3. A WATCH, AS A GIFT, from its particular properties, is the best expression of the truth and constancy of friendship: it is always with the owner, and always doing him service.—J. JONES, 338, Strand, opposite Somerset House, Watchmaker to the Admiralty, has on sale a great variety of Watches, suitable for all classes. The elegant gold horizontal watches, at £7 each, are suitable for ladies and gentlemen.—Read Jones's Sketch of Watch Work, sent free for a 2d. stamp.

REMOVAL and SALE.—WATCHES by WEBSTER and SON, Clockmaker Makers to the Lords of the Admiralty, established 128 years, 3, Birchin-lane, W. and has re REMOVE to more commodious premises, 74, Cornhill, immediately the repairs are completed, during which period they will SELL OFF their present extensive STOCK at a very considerable reduction in price, consisting of every description of superior Chronometers and Watches. They have also on sale a very large selection of the finest second hand Watches, by the most eminent makers, examined and warranted, at half their original cost. Also the commended duplex Watches, on the principle of their Chronometers, to which Government awarded the prize three years in succession. Their detached lever Watches are of the first quality, and with their competition in performance and elegance with any manufactured, and the prices equally reduced. A splendid selection of foreign Watches, with the horizontal and lever escapements, of very superior manufacture, examined under their personal attention, and at prices which, for the quality, have never been offered to the public. Such an opportunity may never again occur for so large a collection submitted for inspection. Post letters will meet with immediate attention.—WEBSTER and SON, 3, Birchin-lane.

CHILDREN and INVALIDS.—Of high value in the preservation and restoration of health. CHILDREN'S CARRIAGES of a very superior elegant, and compact make, and so perfectly secure and easy that children may be trusted with impunity to the most careless hands. In use from the palace to the cottage. Invalids' Wheel Chairs of all sorts, and Spinal Carriages; also, Self-moving Chairs for house or garden.—On sale or hire at INGRAM'S General Furnishing Warehouse, 29, City road, Finsbury-square.

SEA BATHING.—BOGNOR, SUSSEX.—This fashionable retired Watering Place, the favourite resort of the late Princess Charlotte, and of our present Queen in her early days. The celebrated Dr. Bailey, owing to its mild and pure air, visited it for many years—the town was much indebted for the patronage he gave it. The shore has no deep cliff to endanger life; the rocks run out for many miles into the sea, which gently breaks on the finest sandy beach, and the sands descend by a gently an inclined plane that invalids and children may at all times, without the slightest risk, enjoy that delightful requisite—Sea Bathing. There is an excellent drive and promenade along the shore, recently completed; the soil is of a gravelly nature; no open watercourses in or marshy land for miles near the town; the finest trees and evergreens growing to the water's edge; the villas surrounded by luxuriant shrubberies and most productive gardens speak plainly as to the mildness of the air. Roads excellent, drives numerous, and may be enjoyed for miles on either side without a turnpike. The town is built in an irregular form, with many detached villas. The lodging-houses are kept up in a style which does great credit to the proprietors, and are let at a very reasonable rent. The hotels are spacious. There are two excellent libraries and reading rooms, an assembly and billiard room, hot and cold baths. Horses, carriages, and donkey chairs for hire. Provisions moderate, water excellent, and the fine Portsmouth mutton abundantly supplied. Bognor holds out no particular inducement to the gay, who visit the seaside for amusement, but to the invalid or families who come to the coast for the benefit of their health, it presents many advantages superior to any town along the coast of Sussex.—For further information apply to the Postmaster.

WONDERFUL CURE!—The following interesting facts regarding a most extraordinary CASE OF CURE effected solely by the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS—are respectfully submitted to public attention.

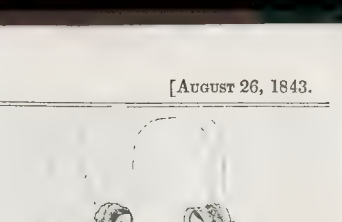
MESSRS. T. ROBERTS AND CO. I send you the wi[illegible] 5th, July 27th, 1843
Brunson. He certainly has most wonderfully improved in [illegible] since he began taking the PILLS. ROBERT DANIELSON, Druggist, Bishop Auckland.

Counden, near Bishop Auckland, July 4th, 1843

GENTLEMEN,—It is with heartfelt gratitude in God I have to [illegible] I was by a kind providence to make use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS in the spring of 1842. I had been afflicted for eleven years with the scurvy, so all that I could not make use of salt, nor anything that I used of it; and very often was lame of my leg. I took the pills for six weeks and I am so much restored that I sometimes fancy myself to be about twenty one years of age, but I smile at the mistake, for my age is sixty one years. I have to inform you also of my son, he was afflicted for ten years, from the effects of the Typhus Fever; he is also wonderfully restored. I am, gentlemen, yours respectfully,

P.S. You may make use of this as you please. JOHN BRANSON.

Sold by all respectable medicine venders in boxes at 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and 11s. See the words "PARR'S LIFE PILLS" are in white letters on a red ground, engraved on the Government Stamp.



THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, August 20, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—If the month of August finish as it has begun, and if the fine weather of autumn indemnify us for the cold and rainy temperature which we have had constantly to support throughout the whole of the summer, our bulletins will become less sterile, and the months of autumn will furnish sufficient interesting details to captivate the attention of our fair readers. In the meanwhile it may not, perhaps, be unmeaning to them if we recount our late visits to the ateliers of some of our fashionable artistes, where we have been for the purpose of gathering, if possible, some slight inkling of forthcoming fashions. Amongst the inventions of Lucy Hocquet, we observed nothing more striking or more coquettially simple than her negligée capotes in glazed gros de Naples, trimmed with a ruche of ribbons, from the centre of which is detached a little ruche of tulle to match, unless it be her hats of plaited crêpe, trimmed with small marabouts, and with foliage. Her great rival, Leclère, on the other hand, preserves in her hats and capotes a moderately horizontal form, which protects rather than hides the face of the wearer; her capotes—an plaited gros de Naples, trimmed with coquelicots and sprigs of barley or of wheat; and those with their passe of paille de riz, trimmed with garlands of varied flowers—or with glazed ribbons of rose colour or blue, accompanied with a small tuft of field flowers placed upon the side of them—are exceedingly pretty things. Amongst the compositions of another most distinguished artiste, we must notice several hats in crêpe, trimmed with ruches of Brussels tulle, and some others in sulphur-coloured poult de soie, with a biais in tulle, of which we propose shortly to send you a drawing. For out-door dresses, mantelets de bonne femme and others in India muslin, bordered with a festooned trimming, are much worn, as are also some very coquettish Aragonese manties in tulle lace, surrounded with a ribbon, which is permitted to be seen between another fall of lace. In our public promenades we observe still many light stuffs worn, principally transparent organdis and satin stripe barèges, and which we have remarked under two different forms. In the first of these the skirt was trimmed with a single flounce; the sleeves, demi-long, to the elbow; the corsage frilled, and open en cœur. In the second the skirt was single; the corsage plain, laced, and moderately open at the neck, and fitted with a fallback, forming a berthe, surrounded with a double mantilone basin; the sleeves short, plain, and terminated by a biais. Of redingottes, the forms most used have the corsages called Josephine, half high behind, and opening en cœur, whence they are carried down in front almost to the waist. The corsages à la Lucrèce, which very much resemble those à la vierge, still remain in great favour. The first comprehends under this name corsages formed with two coulisses at the top and at the bottom of the waist; and the others the corsages with narrow epaulettes, and in which care has been taken to make the bottom with strong stuffs, and with plaits distributed amongst the light ones. Black lace mantillas are now much worn; and the mugdalen cape has superseded the cardinal. Black lace flowers are also very fashionable. I have seen little else that can be called novelty and shall therefore bid you farewell.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO FRANCE.

The public were in a great measure taken by surprise by the sudden announcement a few days past of her Majesty's intention to pay a visit to the King of the French. Two of the sons of Louis Philippe had suddenly arrived at our court, and as suddenly departed from its scenes of regal hospitality; and both the English and French press were busy with the conjecture that they preferred to sacrifice the agrémens of Windsor or Buckingham Palace, and to depart, somewhat brusquement, from the graceful presence of Victoria, to the chances of a rencontre with Spain's formidable Regent, with whose fallen fortunes they could not endure that we should sympathise, or that we should pay anything like impartial and hospitable courtesy to Espartero, the enemy of France. In a word, it was rife upon the lips of the million that the ex-Regent had scared away the sons of the King; when, presto! a morning paper, famous for the general accuracy of its intelligence, declared that the object of the princely visit had been to invite the Queen of England to the Château d'Eu, and that the object of the rapid departure was to inform Louis Philippe that the Queen of England had accepted the invitation, and would soon be upon the heels of those royal messengers in France!

It was a startling announcement, and the nation gaped wide. The speculations of the learned waxed many, and were mysteriously inquisitive amid the general amaze. Was it not contrary to the principles of the English constitution that her Majesty should leave her dominions without the consent of her Parliament? and, on the other hand, was not her Parliament prorogued? Had she even applied for the permission of her Privy Council? Could she go? Rumours were afloat that the Duke of Wellington and others high in office had strongly, but respectfully, protested against the step. Was it, then, an act of prerogative—a little bit of pretty wilful absolutism—a characteristic womanly determination—a royal Sic volo, sic jubeo, stet pro ratione voluntas? To these speculations the French press sent back its echoes; but they were of gravity most important. France would welcome the English sovereign, but only as a part of the duty of politeness, and a matter of gallantry to a lady and homage to a Queen—not in a cordial national spirit, not with a "grasp of the hand," only with a "bend of the knee." The little designing Victoria, with her shrewd sense and her sweet winning presence, was coming to bamboozle the well-experienced old diplomat of the revolution of July. She was "coming with a hoop, and coming with a call," not to "wage bloody war," the young Bellona of the West, but to coax France out of a commercial treaty, and so improve the advantages of her own empire that the tail of the British lion should wag with delight! This was the delicious vagary of the French press responsive to the notes of admiration of the English public when it was reported that the Queen was going to France.

Let us try to look at the matter—for it is interesting, and may become important—in its true light. It seems, then, to us to be a very natural, a very undesigning, and a very unpolitical affair, save in so far as it is always political to promote the bonds of personal as well as national amity between the sovereigns of two such countries as England and France. But the story of the royal visit seems plain and unvarnished as that of Othello to the reverend seigneurs. It was known that her Majesty contemplated a marine excursion so soon as her Parliament should be prorogued—that she purposed sitting for a while upon her "throne of waters"—that for a time she would be England's sailor-queen, and win with a joyous gaiety all the fascinating prestige of such an association with the national feelings of her subjects. Should such a yacht—such a trim, fair, swift, and comely craft as the Victoria and Albert, her pet beauty of a yacht—be built for nothing? No! It should never be a mere puppet upon the waters. She would freight it with a freight of royalty, and float over it upon the billows

> "The flag that braved a thousand years
> The battle and the breeze."

Well, this being known, the courteous King of France sends—by messengers of no less consideration than his own sons—an invitation to his royal cousin of England to touch the hospitable shores of France. While cruising in her English waters, will she not receive the French monarch on board her beautiful vessel off Dieppe, and there shall he not persuade her to land and be permitted to escort her with all honour to his royal pleasure-box—his fair and poetical retreat—the picturesque Château d'Eu. Frankly and pleasurably her Majesty accepts the invitation. She is gone, and she is right. God save the Queen!

Now, for ourselves we rejoice in the frank and kindly spirit of this harmless and propitious visit; and we would have the two nations think of it as the two sovereigns do, not politically, but as the courteous interchange of a mark of private friendship, pleasurable and honourable to both. It is a nice incident—an episode of royal adventure—without precedent for centuries. The last meeting of the two monarchs of France and England was upon the memorable plains of Cambray, amid the gorgeous festivities of the Field of the Cloth of Gold. But, when Francis winced under the hearty grasp of young Bluff Harry, it was more like the hand-shaking of pugilists before battle than the honest linking of the fair chain of peace. Two years afterwards they fought like lions, and the field of battle succeeded the Field of the Golden Cloth. Not thus the meeting between Louis Philippe and Victoria.

The scenes and times are changed, and civilization has set its seal upon their altered aspect. The visit of our Queen to France—the result of an impulse—an invitation gracefully given, and frankly accepted — is one of the best adventures of a long peace. Arising out of a chance excursion upon her native seas, it assumes the colour of a friendly call upon a neighbour whom she knows and respects, and with whom she would be upon the best terms of good understanding. She is hospitably received, and with marks of honour; and the new personal amity which thus grows up between guest and entertainer increases the anxiety of each to preserve their friendly relations. As they are sovereigns, so does the spirit in which they act communicate itself to their subjects, and, in effect, the people of each country get a new impetus towards good feeling, which materially advances the cause of the general improvement and tranquillity of both. The two potentates, too, will meet with feelings of mingled affection and respect, much calculated to enhance the national amicability. Louis Philippe, now a wise and powerful monarch, will hardly fail to remember with fond association the time when, fled from the strife and blood of unholy revolution, he bent to the fiat of God, and with prudence, dignity, and virtue pursued an honourable calling under British shelter—[illegible] and welcomed among our subjects, [illegible] at then dreaming of the high responsibilities which now set the seal of anxiety upon his brow. The young Sovereign who will stand before him in her native grace and loveliness was not then born, but she has since sprung into the queendom of that people amongst whom he was taught to soften the sorrows of exile which he may now look back upon as glorious, because I conduct made it good. The sight of her, and of his own royal children in her presence, will awaken a tenderness of recollection akin to love; and, on the other hand, in the bosom of [illegible] young Victoria the feeling of respect must be strong. Naval, and Spanish; and strange emotions must fill her gentle heart, and flash through the aged frame of the kingly Louis, when, hand in hand, they make as it were the grasp of empires, and feel that, could the hearts of their people be so linked in love and harmony, they two could control the destinies of the world!

GREAT MEETING ON MYNYDD SELEN MOUNTAIN, CARMARTHENSHIRE.

By aid of one of our artists, who is now on a tour in South Wales, we shall be enabled to present to our readers a series of engravings of what are but too truly formed the "disturbed districts" of this very interesting country. We commence with a view of the great meeting, which took place on Friday, the 25th ult., on Mynydd Selen, in a mountainous district, about twelve miles from the town of Carmarthen, and six from Llanelly. The meeting was attended by from 3000 to 4000 men, chiefly operative colliers, farmers, and cadaers; many of the last class combining both the occupations of sellers of coal and cultivators of the soil. The assembling of the vast concourse was an interesting scene: at an early hour, dark groups of swarthy colliers were seen in the distance. Soon were observed on the heights descending the mountain, while others were slowly making their way upward, with bended form and outstretched step. But these broken masses of human beings, occupying such different positions, were all seen directing their footsteps to Mynydd Selen, as to a common centre. Nothing could be more picturesque than the spectacle thus presented to the eye of an observer.

At one o'clock there could not have been far short of three thousand persons assembled; and shortly after that hour the business of meeting began, the numbers momentarily augmenting. Its object was stated in the public notice to be, to take into consideration the dreadfully depressed and progressive deterioration of the people in the neighbourhood, with a view to remedial steps—to specify the particular grievances which they most hardly felt—to make known their wants and wishes in a legitimate and peaceful manner, as provided by the glorious principles of the British constitution, and also to "pronounce" against the present ministerial policy, and to petition the Throne for a dissolution of Parliament.

Amongst the persons present were the following gentlemen:—William Chambers, jun., of Llanelly; Dr. Thomas, Llanelly; William Chambers, James Buckley, Mr. Rees, Kilymaeullwyd; Mr. Rice, Mr. Rees, Llanelly; Rev. Mr. Rees, Llanon; Rev. Mr. Rees, Bryngwenia; Mr. J. Williams, Danybank; Dr. Thomas, Mr. Thomas Williams, Penygenglyn; Mr. William Gard, Mr. T. J. Rees, Maesthanin; Mr. L. Thomas, Verwig; Rev. Mr. Richards, Pontyberem; and Mr. Gravell, Bankyfelin.

William Chambers, Esq., jun., having taken the chair, briefly addressed the meeting.

Mr. Hugh Williams then rose and explained the petition which it was his object to move the adoption of. He repudiated all party views. He did not care who was in office. What the country wanted was good government—a paternal government—a government powerful enough to protect the people from petty tyranny, such as had driven the hitherto peaceable population of South Wales into a state of incipient insurrection against the turnpike jobbers, the county "crabs," and the Poor-law officers. Mr. Williams concluded by reading a petition to the Queen, and moving its adoption. The petition was described as that of the freeholders, farmers, and other inhabitants of the parishes of Llanelly, Llanon, Llangendeirne, Llangunnor, and Llanddarog. It sets forth the [illegible] grievance, and it prays for a consolidation of the several trusts; the Poor-law's operation, according to the view of the opponents of the measure, operating as if the whole commutation is referred to as most onerous, unequal, and unjust. The next point is "the present distressed state of the country" in connection with the "increased amount of the county stock," magisterial costs and fines, and rent follows, with an assurance of the petitioners' loyalty and fidelity to her Majesty's sacred person and to the constitution.

The petition having been read, Mr. Hugh Williams moved that it be adopted by the meeting; Mr. Stephen Evans, of Cilcare, a farmer, seconded it. Mr. Rees, of Llanelly, a magistrate, spoke against its immediate adoption. A person of the same name acted with him, as we understood, contending that it was not consistent with reason for Welshmen to adopt an English petition. On this point there was a great deal of desultory conversation carried on, [illegible] and, or rather translated from Mr. Williams's discourse in Welsh; and an amendment followed, [illegible] that the petition contained errors and was too long; and that instead of adopting the petition before the meeting to her Majesty, a committee be formed to draw up another and a [illegible] amendment not having been seconded, a farmer, [illegible] rose and spoke in Welsh with great force and animation [illegible] original motion. The effect this untaught [illegible] ver produced was electrifying, and [illegible] by the declaring cheers of the meeting the amendment was negatived, and the petition was [illegible] only two dissentients, in a meeting composed of thousands.

The Chairman having declared the amendment lost and the original motion carried, he read a series of resolutions relating more particularly to the [illegible] similar to the town of Carmarthen, [illegible] Chambers in making a speech which was received with repeated cheers. This series of resolutions was [illegible] stated

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE CHELSEA OUT-PENSIONERS.—According to the bill passed in the late session of Parliament for the raising not 10,000 of the most effective of the Chelsea out-pensioners, a notice has been sent from the War-office requiring a pensioner to state in three days from the time they are now employed, and whether they are ready to go on full pay. The number of soldiers receiving pensions from 9d., 8d., to 1s. per day is upwards of 9,000. The present number of in-door pensioners at Chelsea College is 459. The youngest is 38, and the oldest vary from 60 to 80, and two of these veterans have obtained the great age of 101 years. The number of deaths has seldom been greater than usual, averaging from two to three a week. They are all well clothed, fed, and lodged in the college, and are allowed 1d. a day [illegible] ance, which is called "Her Majesty's Bounty."

PORTSMOUTH, Tuesday.—Her Majesty's ship Favourite, from Lisbon, has signalised outward [illegible] ar, expected in the Sound this afternoon. The Apollo, government troop-ship, [illegible] sailed this morning with invalids from China; she sights and the Scilly and Tuscar [illegible] the Western Islands ten days since. The brig Mary and Harriet, Shannon, master, [illegible] on Sunday evening with timber for Morey's dockyard, reports having parted company in a fleet of men-of-war, consisting of eight sail, and a schooner, ten days previously, off Cape Finisterre.

The Regina, Neapolitan first-class frigate, arrived in the Sound on Monday afternoon, from the North.

The Apollo, troop-ship, Commander Frederick, which arrived yesterday from China, brought home Major Greenwood, C.B., and five rank and file of the Royal Artillery, invalided; Lieut.-Gen. H. Spencer, and 30 privates Royal Artillery; Lieut. W. H. Baddeley, 44th Regiment, invalided; Lieutenants Wilson, Woodridge, Dempster, and Whipple, R.N., of the Agincourt, and Major Hamilton, Captains Pearce, Markeley, and Ray, and Lieutenants Waite, Harvey, Forrest, Wynn, and Lennox, of the North Mayo Militia, invalided. A number of marines and seamen from the ships on the station came home in the troop-ship, and Lieutenant Swanston, of the Second navy.

The Erebus, Captain J. C. Ross, and the Terror, Captain Crozier, the surveying vessels which have been engaged in Antarctic exploration, were spoken by the Apollo off the Western Islands, on the 16th ult., all well. They may, therefore, be hourly expected at this port.

The Belvidere troop-ship, Capt. J. Kingcombe, sailed in company with the Apollo from [illegible] h of April. She was bound to the Isle of France, with provisions for the troops stationed there. She touched thence proceed to the Cape for the same purpose, and if her cargo was not exhausted there, would continue to Rio Janeiro.

The Dido, 18, Commander Hon. H. Keppel, was at Singapore when the Apollo left.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

HULL, Aug. 28.—The Woodhouse, from Quebec, was in contact last night; the Woodhouse sustained considerable damage, and unfortunately her pilot, Mr. Violet for Hexham got on board the Hero, and died yesterday, but got off on the flood with loss of fisher's fleet, &c., and has put into Hull.

LEITH, Aug. 27.—The Jeune Baptiste, from Marseilles, was at anchor off Cape Blanc, coast of Africa, previous to the 18th ult., with mast, rigging, and rudder damaged.

KEY WEST, July 8.—The Margaret, from Cuba to Halifax, has been brought in here by wreckers having been on the Florida Reef.

from the top of the Bar-gate a splendid flag floated nobly to the wind. Triumphal arches of laurel and flowers were erected across several parts of the road; all the shops were shut, but the windows of every house were filled with gazers, who cheered the royal visitors incessantly. The marine band who accompanied the procession played the "Coburg March" and the "Prince of Wales's March," and thus the carriages and the procession moved on to the pier. The second scene chosen by our artist is about the middle of High-street, looking towards the Bar. We have received several other sketches of her Majesty's excursion, but too late to do justice to in this week's journal.

The royal cortège having arrived close to the yacht, her Majesty and Prince Albert sughted from the carriage and embarked at a quarter past 11. The royal standard was immediately hoisted, and was saluted by all the men-of-war steamers, and also by those belonging to the West India and Peninsular mail companies. Crowds of people lined the shore, the platform, the quays, and the pier, all anxious to witness the embarkation of the Queen and the starting of the royal yacht. It was, however, nearly three-quarters of an hour after the Queen had gone on board before the yacht left the pier, and although it was raining heavily all the time, the multitude still maintained their position. Shortly after twelve o'clock the moorings were cast off, and the vessel got under weigh, and proceeded down the Southampton water amidst the cheers of the thousands who had assembled to witness her Majesty's departure. The steam squadron manned their yards as she passed, and the admiral dipped his flag, which was flying on board the Fearless.

The whole of the steamers then got under weigh, and followed in the wake of the royal yacht. A number of the Royal Yacht Squadron which were lying off also made sail. From nearly an hour before her Majesty's arrival the rain never ceased, and it continued equally unfavourable during the progress of the yacht down the Southampton water, and the atmosphere was so thick and misty that the land on either side could scarcely be discerned. In addition to the men-of-war steamers which accompanied the royal yacht from Southampton, there were three merchant steamers, full of company. The Queen's yacht went only at half speed for some time after she left the pier, by which they were able to keep up with her, but as soon as she put a little more steam on they all dropped astern, with the exception of a new iron steamer, the South Western, which is considered the fastest boat that sails from Southampton, which contrived to keep in her wake, although at a little distance. Our artist was on board this vessel, and was accordingly enabled to make several advantageous sketches. All the others, including even the men-of-war steamers, could not keep up with the yacht, and were left more than two miles astern in little more than half an hour. After passing Calshot Castle the yacht directed her course to Cowes. The Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay; the Modeste, 18; and the Grecian, 16, were lying in Cowes Roads; and as soon as the royal standard was descried at the mast-head of the yacht, they each fired a royal salute, and manned their yards. The battery at Cowes Castle also fired, and one was fired from the Royal Yacht Squadron Club-house. There was a very numerous attendance of yachts. The commodore of the squadron, the Earl of Yarborough, had returned with Prince which went with him to the westward. From Cowes the royal yacht steered towards the Motherbank and Ryde, and again went at less than half speed, in order to enable the steamers astern to come up with her, and to give the immense fleet of sailing yachts, which were now trying to keep her company, the opportunity of doing so. It was a beautiful sight, but would have been even more splendid had the weather been fine. The commodore's yacht, the Kestrel, kept alongside the royal yacht for some time, but at length dropped astern. After passing Ryde, the yacht proceeded towards Spithead, and passed round the St. Vincent, 120, who fired a royal salute and manned her yards. This scene now was very imposing; there are few sights more magnificent than a first-rate line-of-battle ship with her yards manned. All the sailors were dressed in blue jackets and white trousers, and the officers in their full uniform, on board the St. Vincent and on board the whole of the squadron. Her Majesty, after leaving Spithead, returned to Ryde, where the royal yacht was brought to an anchor, and her Majesty and Prince Albert landed in the admiral's barge at the Ryde Pier, and proceeded to the town.

The royal party left the yacht in the Admiral's barge, and as soon as her Majesty stepped into the boat the royal standard was hauled down in the yacht, and hoisted on board the barge. The crews of the war steamers manned their yards, and the company in the South Western, Ariadne, and Monarch merchant steamers loudly cheered her Majesty and the Prince on their progress to the shore, which they courteously and condescendingly acknowledged. The rain at the time had given over, but the weather was rather squally, and there was a heavy swell. This, however, her Majesty who is an excellent sailor, did not appear in the least to mind, but stepped into the boat with as much indifference as though the sea had been as smooth as a looking-glass. The steps of the pier, where her Majesty and the Prince were to land, were covered with crimson cloth, and every preparation made for the proper reception of the royal party that could be effected during the short interval from the time it became known her Majesty would land there.

THE PASSAGE OF THE BAR, SOUTHAMPTON.

The landing of her Majesty at Ryde presented a very gay and animated scene. The pier, which extends a very considerable distance from the shore, was thronged with ladies and gentlemen, among whom were some of the first rank and fashion. A small battery fired a royal salute, and the assembled throng welcomed her Majesty and her royal Consort to the shores of this beautiful island with cheers. At a short distance from the shore, the war steamers were lying at single anchor, with their yards manned by their gallant crews, all dressed with a uniformity that had a very pretty effect; while in the distance, at Spithead, there rode one of the country's proudest and most magnificent objects, a first-rate English man-of-war, with her three tiers of heavy guns. Innumerable yachts of all sizes and descriptions, and of various rigs, some of them rigged as schooners, with square sails, others, fore-and aft schooners, yawls, cutters, &c., and all beautiful of their kind, were thickly scattered about in all directions as far as the eye could reach. The scene altogether was very splendid and interesting, and one that has seldom if ever been surpassed in these waters. The royal party, after landing, walked along the pier to the town, the parties on the pier forming a line on either side, to enable her Majesty to pass. The royal pair graciously acknowledged the enthusiastic but respectful greetings of the persons assembled on the pier, and by whom they had to pass. Her Majesty and the Prince then proceeded in a carriage to the residence of Lord Harcourt, whom they honoured by visiting. After staying there a short time the royal party returned on board the yacht, which immediately got under way, and returned with the rest of the squadron to Cowes Roads, and anchored there. Her Majesty dined and slept on board the yacht, and early on Tuesday morning, accompanied by the Prince, went on board the Earl of Yarborough's yacht (the Kestrel). They were received on board by the noble earl, and conducted by him over the vessel. The Queen and Prince Albert afterwards landed at West Cowes, where the carriage of the Earl of De la Warr was in waiting to receive her Majesty, to convey her and the Prince to Norris Castle, where her Majesty formerly resided when Princess Victoria. Upon landing, a salute was fired from Cowes Castle, and another from the Royal Yacht Squadron Club-house; and the yards of the Modeste were manned. The Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay, which was also at anchor off Cowes, having left the previous night, and gone in company with the St. Vincent, 120, Captain Rowley, to the Downs, to meet the Camperdown, 104, whence the whole of them will sail down Channel together. As soon as her Majesty returned on board the royal yacht from Norris Castle, the vessel immediately got under way and went to the eastward, round St. Helen's and on to the back of the island. She was accompanied by the Cyclops, Prometheus, Lightning, and other steamers, and also by Commodore the Earl of Yarborough, in the Kestrel, and a numerous fleet of yachts. The royal yacht only went at a quarter speed, to enable the sailing vessels to keep up with her, which, however, they could not do, and when off St. Helen's, they fired a salute, and the Victoria and Albert proceeded on towards Ventnor, the Royal Yacht Squadron following in the best way they could. Her Majesty is in excellent spirits, and appears to be much gratified with her excursion. Both the Queen and Prince Albert have expressed themselves highly satisfied with the yacht and her accommodations. She has proved herself an admirable seaboat, and does credit to her constructor. The weather on Tuesday, although not very clear, was fine, compared to that of Monday.

Captain Hall, the commander of the royal yacht, has (we are sorry to learn) been left behind sick with the ague and fever, which most officers having served in China are subject to on their return to England; in consequence of this, Captain Horatio Austin, of the Cyclops, has been appointed steam captain of the Victoria and Albert, and Lieutenant Schomberg is doing duty pro tem., as Captain of the Cyclops.

Commander Sheringham, of the Fearless, had the honour of steering her Majesty from the pier of Southampton to the yacht on her embarkation, the Victoria drawing too much water to allow her to go alongside. The Fearless has returned to Portsmouth Harbour.

On Tuesday the Queen, and H.R.H. Prince Albert, and suite, safely anchored in Portland Road, the royal yacht, the Victoria and Albert, bearing the royal standard, floating gaily in the breeze, with four other steamers gallantly riding at anchor, close in under Portland. A very dense fog prevented the immediate knowledge of the arrival of the royal party, but as soon as it was known the greatest bustle and animation prevailed in every direction; flags were hoisted at every public place, and the whole shipping in the harbour and bay, as well as Portland Roads, assumed the gayest attire. Royal salutes were fired from H.M.S. Cutter Adelaide, and from the Nothe, at which point, and on the range of hills towards the Old Castle, thousands of persons were collected to witness the approach of the royal party. Her Majesty did not land either at Weymouth or Portland. There was to be a grand display of fireworks in the evening, and it was expected the royal cortège would leave for the westward the following morning early. Every preparation to receive her Majesty had been made by Captain Manning at Portland Castle, if circumstances had permitted her Majesty's landing at Portland. A. W. Horsford, Esq., the worshipful the Mayor of Weymouth, went in his barge to pay his dutiful respects to her Majesty; and the roadstead and bay were covered with yachts, &c., till the close of the evening.

On Wednesday morning, at a quarter before eight, a signal was made for weighing anchor, when they proceeded round Portland for Plymouth, at which time another royal salute was fired, and the colours waving in all directions.

At five o'clock in the afternoon the royal yacht hove in sight of the Mew Stone at Plymouth, and was immediately saluted by the Formidable, Caledonia, Incanatant, the Neapolitan frigate Regina, the guns in Plymouth citadel, and those on Mount Wise. On her nearing the eastern end of the Breakwater, a second salute was fired from all quarters, and the yards of the men-of-war, including the Neapolitan frigate, were manned. The sky was almost cloudless, and, there being no wind, the water was perfectly calm, the cheerful aspect of nature appearing in complete unison with the joyful feelings of the thousands of loyal subjects who lined the shores of this noble harbour. The royal yacht proceeded at a reduced speed to Barn Pool, and there anchored. On nearing Mutt Bay, her Majesty was seen on deck with Prince Albert, who seemed to be directing her attention to the crowds of people hastily following the course of the yacht.

The steamers Prometheus, Tartarus, Cyclops, Ariel, and others entered the harbour successively, about an hour afterwards. The calm hindered the arrival of the sailing vessels composing the remainder of the royal convoy.

Admiral Superintendent Sir Samuel Pym, the General of the Forces, the heads of the other Government departments, and the captain of the Neapolitan frigate, went on board immediately. Lord Haddington and the other Lords of the Admiralty (who arrived by land in the afternoon) also went on board, having, it is said, made arrangements for the reception of Prince Albert at the dockyard on Thursday morning at ten o'clock. All the naval officers received instructions to be on board the Caledonia, in the Sound, at the same hour, when it was expected that her Majesty would hold a levee.

Nothing is known with respect to future movements, but the royal yacht was to be supplied with coal next morning.

It is understood that her Majesty and the Prince will visit both Devonport and Plymouth this afternoon. All the shops are closed, and the inhabitants are keeping the day a perfect holiday.

THE ROYAL PROCESSION, HIGH-STREET, SOUTHAMPTON.

CELEBRATION OF PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT.

Hail! welcome, royal day!
Which, like the annual May,
Gladdens the young heart-flow'rs
Of the most regal bow'rs
That ever Queen hath graced—
A Queen by VIRTUE placed Upon a throne to be Her land's idolatry—
A Queen, who, while she reigns
O'er all her wide domains
A sovereign of mighty pow'r,
Hath yet her calm domestic hour
To fondle her sweet babes, and be
The playmate of their infancy,
With him, beloved Consort! who
Can love, and bless, and kiss them too,
With all the truth and unaffected joy
That even Royalty cannot destroy!

A birthday in a village-green
Has ever something happy been!
MIRTH, pilgrim else through all the year,
Returns that day to grace the cheer:
Music and dance the night prologu—
Or, in the pauses of the song,
A grandsire tells some merry tale
That interrupts the circling ale,
And at its close obtains a laugh,
Which makes all thirst more ale to quaff!—
Such are a birthday's revelries
In nooks that splendour seldom sees!

Homely (and what more happy word Hath human list'ning ever heard?)
Homely these pleasures—and could we Bestow their pure simplicity
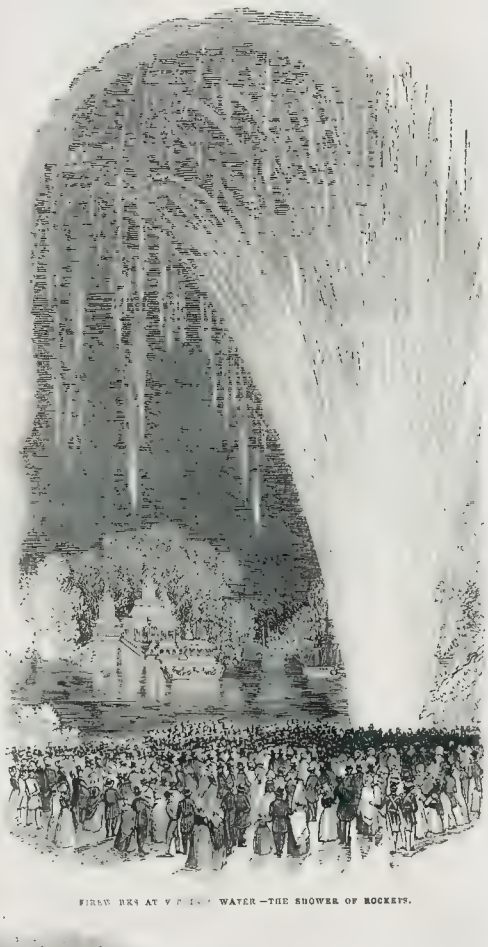
On regal tow'rs as cottage homes,
Where Death alike impartial comes
(As fearless FLACCUS once proclaim'd),
The gift we're sure would not be blam'd!

But hold! 'tis known, this happy day,
On fair Virginia's waters,
There's held a festive roundelay—
The Pride of England's daughters,
Fond as Rose of Nightingale,
ALBERT'S NATAL MORN DOTH HAIL
With delight as pure, I wot,
As ever bless'd the rustic cot,
Where only, as some sages tell,
We're sure to find CONTENTMENT dwell!



FIRE WORKS AT WINDSOR WATER—THE SHOWER OF ROCKETS.

FIRING THE PARK GUNS ON PRINCE ALBERT'S BIRTHDAY, AS SEEN FROM THE TOP OF THE YORK COLUMN

Invidious falsehood! She doth love
To 'bide within a lordly grove,
As well as in the shepherd's bow'r!
This day and hour,
'Mid Windsor's poet-consecrated trees
Her fondest fancy it doth please
The choicest blessings in her gift to share,
Between the world's most royal—happiest pair!

W.

On Saturday, the 24th anniversary of the birth of his Royal Highness Prince Albert was celebrated at Windsor Castle and Virginia Water, in magnificent style. From an early hour in the morning, the ancient bells of the chapel of St. George, and the modern peal of the church of St. John, rang merrily at intervals until late in the evening. Shortly before seven o'clock, the band of the 1st Life Guards arrived at the Castle, and stationed themselves in the Home Park, beneath the window of the chamber of his Royal Highness in the Augusta tower, and serenaded the Prince for upwards of an hour. Amongst the music performed by the band were two compositions arranged expressly for this auspicious occasion: one by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and the other by Herr A. Kohl, organist to the Prince.

Her Majesty and the Prince left the castle at an early hour, accompanied by the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, and proceeded through the slopes to Adelaide-lodge, where the Duchess of Kent had shortly before arrived from Frogmore-lodge, to offer her congratulations to the Prince. "Birthday gifts, rich and rare," from the Queen and her Majesty's illustrious parent, were displayed upon a side table, and affectionately presented to his Royal Highness. The royal party, after partaking of breakfast at the lodge, returned to the castle in pony phaetons and pairs.

At Virginia Water, the picturesque retreat upon the south western verge of the Great Park, extensive preparations had been made for a magnificent banquet and fête to celebrate the day, at the Fishing Temple. Similar preparations were also made at Belvidere on Shrubs Hill, a triangular building, having a tower at each angle, about half a mile distant from and directly opposite the Fishing Temple, and encompassed by a fine plantation of trees. It has a battery of 21 pieces of brass ordnance, which were used in the campaigns of William, Duke of Cumberland, now just a century since. At one o'clock in the day, a royal salute was fired from these cannon.

Soon after seven o'clock, the Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the distinguished visitors and members of the household, who had been invited to the banquet, arrived at the temple in open carriages. At this time, on the bank of the lake opposite the temple, there were not less than 10,000 persons, who had been attracted to the spot for many miles round, as well as from the metropolis. On the Queen and Prince Albert appearing at the balcony of the temple, thousands of loyal voices burst into hearty congratulation. The band of the 1st Life Guards, which was stationed in the state barge on the lake, and the band of the Coldstream Guards, which was arranged on the lawn in front of the temple, performed the national anthem. The lawn was brilliantly and tastefully illuminated, and the bushes and shrubs were lighted and festooned with variegated lamps. These lamps, brilliantly reflecting upon the numerous fountains, which were in full play, gave a most fairy-like effect to the scene.

The royal banquet took place precisely at eight o'clock. The following is a list of the royal and distinguished guests:—

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Countess of Dunmore (Lady in Waiting on the Queen), Lady C Dundas (in attendance upon the Duchess of Kent), the Hon. Matilda Paget and the Hon. Georgiana Liddell (Maids of Honour in Waiting), the Earl of Liverpool, the Viscountess Canning, the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, the Right Hon. Sir R. Peel, Major-General and Lady Isabella Wemyss, Lady Caroline Somers Cocks, the Rev. Lord Wriothesley Russell, the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay, Mr. G. E. Anson, Colonel Sir George Couper, Bart., the Earl of Morton (Lord in Waiting), Admiral Sir Robert Otway (Groom in Waiting), Colonel Arbuthnot (Equerry to her Majesty), Colonel Wylde (Equerry to his Royal Highness), and Captain Francis Seymour (Groom of the Bedchamber to his Royal Highness), Prince Albert sat on the left of his Majesty, and next to the Prince the Duchess of Kent. Sir R. Peel sat on the right, and next to the Queen. The Earl of Liverpool, as the Lord Steward, sat at the side of the Queen.

At the conclusion of the banquet, the first toast proposed by the Lord Steward was, "The health of his Royal Highness Prince Albert," the band of the Coldstream Guards performing the Coburg March. The next toast was "The health of the Queen," and this was succeeded by the two bands performing the national anthem. During and after the banquet they performed alternately several pieces.

A superb pyrotechnic display (superintended by Mr. Fenwick, of Kensington), commenced soon after nine o'clock, with a royal salute from a battery on the bank opposite the Fishing Temple; this was returned from the battery at Belvidere. The blinds of the banqueting-room were then thrown open, and her Majesty and the Prince and their distinguished guests proceeded into the balcony, and thence witnessed this portion of the entertainments, which principally took place upon an elevated portion of the bank just across the lake. These included several hundreds of rockets, in every variety, coloured shells and stars, large shells with tail stars and golden rains, bright stars, comets, soucl suns, royal salutes, crimson, green, and blue fires, &c. On the lake there was a variety of water-rockets, water-fountains, crimson, green, and purple fires, &c.

The Royal Adelaide frigate was illuminated with upwards of 4000 lamps; the yard-arms, masts, rigging, portholes, figure-head, and, indeed, the whole of this beautiful vessel, (from stem to stern, aloft and on deck,) presented one brilliant blaze of light. The smaller frigate, the Victorine, and a third, were also similarly illuminated. These three vessels were, during the whole of the early part of the evening, moored up the cove, and kept completely from the view of the royal party, until after the fireworks had commenced, when they sailed out in a line, the Royal Adelaide taking the lead, and tacked about, up and down the lake, opposite the temple, during the remainder of the evening, each discharging at intervals volleys of rockets, royal salutes, comets, &c.

The splendid sight upon the lake, at this period, it is impossible to describe. The air was literally in a blaze with Bengal lights, clouds of rockets, discharged simultaneously from the battery at Belvidere, the banks on either side, and the vessels on the lake; whilst, at the same time, the banks and eminences for a considerable distance around the temple, and on the opposite shore, blazed with innumerable crimson, green, silver, blue, and other fires.

Her Majesty and the Prince, with their royal and illustrious guests and suite, took their departure at a few minutes past ten o'clock, in a close travelling-carriage and four, and reached the castle shortly before eleven.

Notwithstanding the immense concourse of persons who were present, this splendid fête passed off without the slightest accident; and the public behaved with the greatest order and decorum.

At Windsor, a royal salute was fired from the town battery by the corporation gunner, at one o'clock, and in the evening the town was brilliantly illuminated.

In the metropolis, the morning was ushered in by merry peals from the bells of the royal parish churches of St. Martin-in-the-fields, St. Margaret, Westminster, and St. Mary Abbotts, Kensington, upon whose steeples the royal standard was also hoisted. At one o'clock the Park and Tower guns fired royal salutes, and the bells of most of the metropolitan churches rung during the day. In the evening his Royal Highness's tradespeople dined together in honour of the auspicious occasion, and their houses were brilliantly illuminated. Our engraving represents the firing of the guns in St. James's Park, in the walk leading from the York Column to the Parade. The sketch is taken from the gallery of the York Column, where the vibration is sensibly felt during the firing; and whence the volumes of smoke ascending through the trees have a most extraordinary effect, which our artist has endeavoured to convey to the reader.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent left her residence, Frogmore Lodge, near Windsor, on Tuesday morning, at a quarter past eight o'clock, on a visit to her Majesty the Queen Dowager, at Whitley Court, Worcestershire. Her Royal Highness was attended by Lady Charlotte Dundas and Sir George Couper, Bart. Her Royal Highness, on leaving Frogmore, proceeded to Watford, and took her departure from that station by the Birmingham Railway.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1843.

Magnificent edifices, dedicated to devotional purposes, are part of the fame and grandeur of the country to which they belong, as well as prominent manifestations of homage to the Creator. They are inanimate evidences of its enterprise, resources, genius, and perseverance. They typify, and are embodiments of its power and stability. They seem to the popular fancy a meet abode for its tutelar deities; and the superstition was not an unreasonable one which peopled the splendid domes of the "Eternal City" with guardian celestial residents, and linked the fate of the Roman Empire itself with the duration of the Colosseum. Proportionate with the glory which they reflect on a country is the disgrace of their neglect; and to allow ruin to steal upon them, or to permit in ministering to them (if the phrase be an allowable one) any inadequate or derogatory practice, proves that the nation is unworthy of possessing them—that it is incapable of that feeling which they are calculated to excite, and which generous and noble minds must certain with regard to them, and places the present in striking and damnatory contrast with the age in which they were erected.

These observations, unfortunately too applicable to ourselves, are suggested by a hope that at length the public voice will lead to some improvement in the system of management with respect to St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey. These edifices, the architectural boast of our country—and one of which presents so many associations full of noble solemnity—are fenced round by arrangements, on the part of our local dynasties, of a most unworthy character.

The officials to whom we allude seem to be guided by one fundamental error. They obviously deem it their duty to act with regard to those structures as if they were graves, the interiors of which ought, by every practicable method, to be concealed, and which only impertinent curiosity could suggest a desire to explore, rather than as glorious illustrations of the history and fame of Great Britain, which, with a laudable and natural vanity, we might wish the whole world to see. The regulations and arrangements can only be referred to some such delusion. An admission charge of twopence effectually prevents the poor man from coming with his family to behold and ponder over the contents of these stupendous buildings. The mode of admission, the circumstances attendant on the entrance, and the entrances themselves, are all characteristic of a grudging spirit, as if the object were rather to keep people out than to let them in. Surely nothing could be more desirable than that British subjects should see and reflect upon all the monuments of the greatness, and, consequently, the incentives to the admiration of their fatherland. Such sights tend to attach the subject both to his country and to its institutions.

It may be said that indiscriminate admittance would lead to the desecration of those temples by the frivolity of the idle, the thoughtless, or the scoffers. Now, there is no reason why such a result should be apprehended. We do not think so badly of even the lowest portion of the English public as to believe it, and all experience tends to establish the opposite assumption. But, even admitting that there were some grounds for this opinion, why not make a fair experiment—why not try whether any evil would arise from the free admission of the public in those places? One thing is clear, that a charge of one halfpenny would be sufficient—at least as much so as a charge of twopence—to prevent any groups of idle boys, or others whose irreverence of demeanour it might be anticipated would not consort with the solemnity of the place, from selecting it as their lounge.

On any grounds, therefore, except the fiscal ones, the present charges cannot be justified. But surely another system ought to be tried, and those attendants, who are now intent only on exacting admission fees, might more decorously be employed in maintaining order and quiet in the interior of those edifices.

We trust that the almost unanimous opinion of public journals expressed on this subject, and the strong feeling which undoubtedly prevails amongst the public, with those with whom the control lies to adopt a course, more liberal, or, we should rather say, more just towards the British subject—more creditable to themselves, and more consonant to the feeling with which such magnificent national possessions ought to be regarded.

APPALLING ACCIDENT TO LOUIS PHILIPPE AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.

On Monday last the King and the whole of the royal family of France had the narrowest escape from destruction; indeed, so narrow that it may be considered miraculous. This circumstance has for a time superseded even the interest excited by the expected arrival of Queen Victoria, an event which might have plunged France into the deepest distress, and have greatly affected the interests of the whole of Europe. It appears that the King, the Queen, the Count of Paris, the Prince and Princess of Joinville, the Duke d'Aumale, and, in fact, all the members of the royal family now at Ville d'Eu, on Monday afternoon took one of their usual drives in the neighbourhood of the chateau. The carriage occupied by the royal family was a large open one, hung round with curtains, with seats across it, and capable of carrying a great number of persons. It is called a "char-au-banc," and is not unlike the pleasure vans so common in our own metropolis. To show its great size, it need only be mentioned that the carriage contained, upon this occasion, no less than ten members of the royal family, including Louis Philippe, the Queen, and the Count of Paris. The carriage was drawn by four very spirited horses. The party, it appears, has penned, in the course of their drive, to pass through Tréport, a small fishing village situated about two miles from Ville d'Eu; and it happening to be the first time the Count of Paris visited that place, the loyal inhabitants were desirous to consider by their future sovereign especial honour on the occasion, and they accordingly saluted his Royal Highness with a feu de joie. The guns were fired just as the carriage was approaching the neighbourhood of a bridge which spans the Bresle, a small river, at the mouth of which the village of Tréport is situated, when the whole party received unexpected fears the result. The horses, startled by the noise, commenced plunging furiously. The postilions lost all command of them, and they darted forward towards the bridge, the parapet of which the leaders cleared at a bound. The third horse was dragged after its companions, and for a moment the destruction of the whole party seemed inevitable; but fortunately the postilion was enabled to acquire some command over the fourth horse, and he did not follow. Had he done so, there could be no doubt of the result. Assistance, however, was happily at hand, and the whole party were released from their perilous position; not, however, before the traces had been with great difficulty cut, and the horses left to their fate. The three horses, of course, fell into the stream below and were dreadfully injured; but both the postilions escaped.

It hardly be said that the alarm of the whole party in such fearful circumstances must have been very great. The Queen was much affected, and wept bitterly after the danger was over. The King himself acted with great presence of mind. He held the young Count of Paris in his arms, and refused to leave the carriage till every member of his family was placed in safety on terra firma.

The following description of the locality will show the imminent peril in which his Majesty and the Royal family were placed:—

The only apology for a parapet on this bridge (which is a wooden drawbridge) is the very inadequate one of two small chains on each side, such as are usually seen in drawbridges which pull up, and which, in the present instance, are more than usually slight.

It appears that the royal party had passed the first of the two drawbridges, and was approaching the second, when the salute was fired which caused the accident. Immediately on the cannon being fired the horses plunged and reared, and coming immediately upon the wooden drawbridge, their alarm was so greatly increased that they blindly darted forward. The leaders sprung over the bridge into the water, breaking the chains in their course, and dragging the third horse along with them. At this moment the danger of the Royal Family was extreme, and it is almost impossible to conceive how they escaped. The wheels of the carriage were within two inches of the edge of the bridge, and had assistance not been near, and the traces p ovidentially cut, the carriage must have followed. It is entirely owing to the presence of mind and good management of the postilion who rode the wheeler that the safe y of the Royal Family is, under Providence, to be a tributed. Had he, by mismanagement or otherwise at that moment failed in his duty, nothing could have saved them. Fortunately, however, he was able to pull up, and further mischief was prevented. The place where the accident occurred is built up on both sides with brick, so that the whole has precisely the appearance of a canal lock on a large scale; and the banks being perpendicular for a distance of about fifty yards on each side of the bridge, it is evident that, had the carriage fallen into the water, a very frightful scene of life must have ensued, and the probability is that the lives of all would have been sacrificed. It is a curious matter of speculation what effect this miserable drawbridge in the obscure village of Tréport might have had on the destinies of Europe. The whole occurrence is but an unsatisfactory comment on the stability of human affairs.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR.—His Highness the Duke of Victoria arrived at the Slough station of the Great Western Railway shortly before three o'clock on Saturday afternoon from town, and was conveyed in one of the Queen's carriages to the castle. His Highness was presented to her Majesty at an audience by the Earl of Aberdeen.

On Sunday morning the Queen and Prince Albert attended divine service within the castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated, and preached the sermon from the fifth verse of the second chapter of St. Paul's first epistle to the Philippians.

On Monday morning, at twenty-five minutes to eight o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert left the castle in one of her private riding carriages for the Eton borough station. Her Majesty's progress will be found detailed elsewhere.

BRIGHTON, Wednesday.—The Prince of Wales and his royal sisters were taken out in a barouche and four, for an airing, this morning, preceded by an outrider, at a quarter before nine.

The Queen Dowager, who, we rejoice to hear, is improving in health, takes daily drives and equestrian exercise, when the weather permits, in the beautiful grounds of Witley, and among the picturesque hills of Albury, &c.

The Duke of Wellington, accompanied by the Right Hon. C. Arbuthnot, left Apsley House on Tuesday for Walmer, where his Grace is expected to remain until the close of the autumn.

THE REGENT OF SPAIN.—The Duke de la Victoria and suite removed to his mansion in the Regent's Park on Wednesday.

APPROACHING ALLIANCE IN HIGH LIFE.—We understand that the preliminaries have been arranged for a marriage between the Earl of March, eldest son of the Duke of Richmond, and the accomplished Miss Gordon, eldest daughter of Mr. Algernon Gordon, private secretary of the Duke of Wellington, and great niece to the Duke of Portland. Lord March is in his 25th year. It is not yet definitely settled whether the ceremony will take place at Gordon Castle, the Duke of Richmond's seat in the Highlands, or in town.

The English Government has sent an order to Mr. Aston to recognise the new Government of Spain. Mr. Aston will quit Madrid immediately after having installed Mr. Jerningham, his secretary, as Charge d'Affaires.

The Duke de Palmel a transacted business at the foreign office.

DEATH OF SIR CHARLES MORGAN.—Sir Charles died at his residence, in William-street, Lowndes-square, on Monday. He was the son of the late J. Morgan, Esq.; married, first, a daughter of the late W. Hammond, Esq., of Hertfordshire; and secondly, Sidney, daughter of the late Robt. Owenson, Esq., sister of Lady Clarke, and authoress of "O'Donnell," "Florence Mac Arthy," &c. Sir Charles, who was the author of several works upon literary and philosophical subjects, was created a knight bachelor by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, 1811

GENERAL ESPARTERO, REGENT OF SPAIN.

The Earl of Clarendon, who was for a lengthened period British Minister at Madrid, had a protracted interview with General Espartero on Saturday, previous to his departure for Windsor Castle. The noble earl was escorted with the Regent nearly two hours.

On Sunday the Regent and Duchess of Victoria, and most of the officers who accompanied the Regent to this country, attended at an early mass at the Spanish Chapel, returning to breakfast. Viscount Palmerston called upon his Highness, and was engaged some length of time in conversation with him. The Regent visited the Duke of Wellington at Apsley house, and the Earl of Aberdeen, at Argyle-house. His Highness during the day received Robert Peel about one o'clock, but had not an interview, as the right hon. Baron at that period arrived in town from Windsor. The Regent subsequently visited Lord Shaley and the Earl of Clarendon. A select private party dined with the Highness and the Duchess of Victory.

On Monday General Evans had an interview with the Regent at Miv. and afterwards Mr. Moore had an audience. The Regent remained in privacy for the rest of the day. The Duchess of Victory and Donna [illegible] accompanied by Colonel Gurres, went out in an open [illegible] Lord. Viscountess Palmerston visited the Duchess [illegible] Count and Viscountess Palmerston and his Highness and the Duchess of Victory, and their nieces, Donna Emilia, to dinner on Monday evening, when a small party had the honour of meeting the noble strangers.

METROPOLIT[illegible]

REGULATIONS OF THE COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—The regulations of the College of Surgeons have just been altered in the following points:—1. Students were formerly required to bring proof "of having studied anatomy and physiology, by attendance on lectures and demonstrations, and by dissections, during three anatomical sessions or sessions, extending from October to April inclusive." The latter part of the rule now runs thus:—"During three winter sessions, or of three winter months each." 2. Each course of the practice of surgery, physic, chemistry, materia medica, and midwifery, was formerly of the obligatory length of seventy lectures; this is now left undefined. Moreover, the following circular has been sent round to medical teachers:—"Royal College of Surgeons in London, August 15, 1843. Sir,—I am directed by the president of this college to transmit to you the enclosed copy of the examination for the purpose of ascertaining the professional education of candidates for their diploma; and, at the same time, to express the opinion of the council, that the examination of candidates for diplomas at the students should be interrupted by a vacation at Christmas, or at any other period of the winter, and to state that they strongly recommend that the winter session hitherto allowed should be discontinued.—EDMUND BELFOUR, Sec."

[illegible] HAMPTON DOCK COMPANY.—[illegible] the company took place on Thursday last at the [illegible] Bouverie street, Fleet, Joseph Liggins, Esq., in the chair, the secretary read the report, which commenced by s[illegible] that the directors had continued business with a very large reduction on their authorised rates and charges, and that on only one of these had they to complain such. 2. Each owner did not received the royalist sent out [illegible] at all. Its proprietors give the proprietors power to raise new capital to the extent of £250,000. The total receipts since the commencement of the company to the 30th June, 1843, amounted to £236,788 5s. 10d., the payments [illegible] £[illegible] old, leaving a balance with the treasurer. The report having been adopted, resolutions passed and the meeting dissolved.

REVIVAL OF THE OLD "BLOOD-MONEY" [illegible] Monday, at Worship street, James Spelman, a young man, and Thomas Nichols, a grey-haired, very plausible looking old man, both of Bow, were brought up, charged with having unlawful possession of counterfeit coin. The facts disclosed, however, afforded every reason to believe that the [illegible] were innocent, and that the prisoners had been entrapped into the commission of the offence for the sake of the money paid as expenses upon a Mint prosecution. Henry Charles Barker, police sergeant, H. H., deposed that at an inn on Clerk on Saturday night he was on one part to receive evidence against a [illegible] man came in, and asked for two of the constables, named Trew and Barbeau. The witness told him they were not there, at which he seemed disappointed, and said he would call again, and that he had come to make an appointment to meet him, but had not kept it. The witness asked him what was the nature of the business, and he said he had got a chap with counterfeit coin, and went on to state that the chap was a Leicester with three counterfeit shillings in his possession, whom he said he had quite enough to obtain a conviction. He then said to witness, "You may go and [illegible] does." The witness asked him what [illegible] you must bring me to the station-house too, and then let me go again." The witness said, "What is the use of bringing you to the station if it is all correct?" and he replied, "Why, if you don't bring me to the station-house I will say that I have sold him." The witness asked him if he did not tell that it was something like entrapping a man into a mint [illegible] out he could, and "I know that when you are in a scrape, and if you don't like to do it, there's others that will." The witness then told him to wait five minutes, and went out upon a little business, but, when he returned, Spelman was gone. About a quarter of an hour afterwards he saw Spelman and Nichols brought in by two of the constables, named Mann and Jackson, who charged him with having counterfeit money (three shillings) in his possession, and said, under what they had seen and heard, the witness told them and must find that other one, and while he was taking the [illegible] brought in, and was told by witness that he also should be detained. Mann said, "I charge you now with it, and have done." Nichols replied, and declared that he was quite innocent of the charge, and had been entrapped by Spelman, who had asked him to take a walk, and had put the three shillings into his possession under the pretence of getting change. Mann, after a short time, was followed presently after by the two constables, who took him (Nichols) into custody. Police-constable Mann, 74 H, [illegible] detailed the arrest of Nichols, and, while entering the charge against Spelman, he turned round, and saw Sergeant Tenkle and other officers struggling with the prisoner to prevent his swallowing coin which they heard rumbling in his mouth. The prisoner struggled violently, and while the prisoner succeeded in swallowing it. Several other witnesses having been examined, Mr. Broughton said he had hoped that the system of entrapping people into offences by means of bait was not allowed, the bloodmoney had many years since been entirely done away with, but the statements he had had heard made him fear that something of the kind still existed. It was a matter of which he could not take cognizance, but if any of the circumstances connected with the case now in question should be thoroughly investigated. He discharged Nichols upon recognizance for his attendance at the next examination, and remanded Spelman for a week. In reference to the above proceedings our able contemporary (the Times) makes the following observations:—"It is not always that matters of this kind so well come to light when abominations of this sort are attempted with success are, we are told, by no means rare. The Mint is liberal. It is well to be doing something, and convictions for uttering and passing false coin are always satisfactory. It is, therefore, worth while for these people to run the risk of occasionally uttering a few charges when real ones are not [illegible]. Besides, nothing is easier. A poor ignorant fellow is incautiously entrapped into taking a sovereign (knowing it to be done wrong) a bad shilling or two, and before he can tell how, or when, or where he got it, he is pounced upon, tried, convicted, and sent out of the country, leaving every body else, the accusers inclusive, in fits of virtuous indignation, perfectly 'shocked' at his enormities. Of course, we are far from charging the Mint with directly or knowingly encouraging such prosecutions. All we say is, that the system of trapping and swearing is, at the assistance of these informers, or of paying them very highly, in order to secure the enforcement of the laws, is one which defends itself, and ends not in order, but in [illegible]. It is like mending the highways in summer, when the roads are fair enough.' We throw out these suggestions for the consideration of the authorities of her Majesty's Mint."

SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY.—On Wednesday the half yearly general meeting of the proprietors was held at the Nine Elms station, Vauxhall, Wm. Chaplin, Esq., chairman of the board of directors, in the chair. The report of the directors, which was brief, announced that the revenue account for the past half-year showed a net or gross increase of £1893 over the corresponding period of 1842, and that, although the aggregate expenses had be slightly increased, a considerable reduction had been effected in those branches of expenditure which were under the control of the directors.

WOOD PAVING IN THE STRAND.—Every passenger through the streets of London must have observed the continual picking up and laying down of specimens of wood pavement in our thickest thoroughfares. The nuisance has become intolerable in the Strand, particularly in that part of it that lies between Surrey-street and Arundel-street, where wood pavement has been taken up and laid down again three times unremovable, within the last few months. The whole conduct of the authorities (whoever they may be) in reference to these disgraceful obstructions, shows the most culpable and reckless indifference to the convenience of the public. Will some indignant correspondent favour us with the names of the parties at whose door the blame may be properly placed?

COUNTRY NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—This great triennial festival will take place on Tuesday, September 19th, and three following days, and promises to be unusually attractive. The great organ of the Town Hall has received numerous additions, and perhaps may be considered the finest instrument in Europe. Mrs. A. Shaw, Miss Clara Novello, Miss Rainforth, Mrs. Knyvett, Miss Maria B. Hawes, Signor Mario, Signor Fornasari, Signor Giubelei, Messrs. Manvers, Phillips, Bennett, and Machin are the principal vocalists engaged.

BRIGHTON.—MURDEROUS ASSAULT AND ROBBERY.—James Gearing, Robert Tuddenham, and Henry Tuddenham were placed at the bar for examination before Major Allen and a full bench of magistrates, on Monday last, charged with committing a violent assault and robbery on Mr. Edward Burt, of the Feathers Tavern, and Mr. Richard Cooper, the son of an extensive builder in Brighton. The officers was committed to the white hart, and the prisoners eluded detection until last week. They were fully committed to take their trial at the next assizes on the capital charge. They will have to remain in gaol until next March.

In consequence of the expected arrival of the Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice at Brighton on Tuesday, the entrance into the town was lined with spectators from an early hour in the morning, to see the royal family. At a quarter-past three the carriages were descried from the top of St. Peter's Church, and the royal standard was immediately hoisted on the summit of the church by the Old Church, and the merry peals of the bells of the Old Church immediately struck up a merry peal, and the royal standard was hoisted at the Battery, and a royal salute fired. The party occupied three carriages, and entered the town without an escort. The north entrance of the Pavilion was lined by a guard of honour of the Grenadier Guards under the command of Colonel Holme, and the high constable and his posse were in attendance to receive the Sovereign. On the royal occasions, brought a number of the royal carriages and horses in the course of the day. The following were the arrivals in the three carriages [illegible] Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, her Royal Highness the Princess Royal, her Royal Highness the Princess Alice, Lord Hardwicke, lord in waiting; Mr. Ormsby Gore, groom in waiting; the Dowager Countess of Lyttelton, the Hon. Charles Augustus Murray, and Colonel Arbuthnot, equerry in waiting to her Majesty. Dr. Pretorius also arrived at the palace in the course of the day, and the Marquis of Ormonde, who will succeed Lord Hardwicke as lord in waiting.

BUXTON.—Several persons of distinction are at present sojourning at this delightful locality; and, the weather being remarkably fine, the town has assumed a very gay appearance. The terrace and walks have been crowded with visitors.

COWFOLD, SUSSEX.—LAMENTABLE CIRCUMSTANCE [illegible] morning two youths, apprentices to Mr. Carter, grocer, of Cowfold, were, at five o'clock, with the intent of amusing themselves for a few hours, previously to commencing business for the day. [illegible] started one of them climbed a plum tree, for the purpose of [illegible] fruit, and, while seated on the branches, was desired by [illegible] to come down. He replied that he should not do so till he had gathered some more plums, upon which, his companion put a cap upon the nipple of the percussion lock, and then, pointing the gun at the other, and he would shoot him. This was not rely in jest, it being supposed the gun was not loaded. The reverse, however, turned out to be the case, for, on the boy putting the muzzle of the instrument of the barrel went through his temple, and he fell from the tree a corpse. The deceased was only seventeen years of age, and the inconsiderate cause of his death two years younger. The inquest, we understand, has produced a degree of consternation in the village never before remembered there.

DERBY.—A BRITISH JEHU.—Considerable sensation was caused in Derby on Saturday last by a voluntary discovery, on the part of the individual implicated, of an attempt to commit murder. Towards three o'clock in the morning a policeman on duty at the outskirts of the town "flashed his lantern" in the face of a youth who was approaching the force in a state of agitation. "Are you a policeman?" he immediately asked. "Yes," was the reply. "Then I wish to give myself up on charge of committing a murder," said the youth. The policeman was utterly astounded at hearing of this novelty of the proceeding, interrogated the young man at some length. The young man persevered in his statement, and the policeman then conducted him to the station, where he recapitulated the statement he had previously given, and asked the policeman to supply him with pen, ink, and paper. These having been granted, he wrote down in a clear hand, and in tolerably good English, the particulars of the act with which he charged himself, by which it appears that his name is Joseph Growcock, and that he is about seventeen years of age. He had kept a school at Leicester about the month of March last, but expiration of which period he suddenly discontinued in consequence of a charge hanging over him of having stolen some books. From Leicester he went to Nottingham, where his father, a pensioner on the Greenwich Company, resides, and with whom he remained until the night on which the deed was committed. He states that, during his stay at Nottingham, he was "frequently haunted with a fiendish desire to murder somebody," and that he had made many attempts to get to his children, into whose society, he says, he found great gratification for his extraordinary propensity. At length, on Friday morning, he had so far succeeded in his desire, as to entice a little girl into a corner of the market place, and he was just in the act of raising his arm to strike her down with a bludgeon, when he heard his father's voice a short distance from him. Growcock ran away, and proceeded towards Derby, his desire for a time overcoming him for a time. On arriving at Sandiacre, about two miles between Nottingham and Derby, he met some boys and a girl (the latter about sixteen years old), who had been gleaning. He asked the boys to give him some corn, and then, he says, his fiendish passion came over him again, and became irresistible. He entered into conversation with the girl, representing himself as a banker-over of a mill at Derby, and promised her good wages if she would accompany him. With this and other persuasives he prevailed upon the girl to accompany him, and they set off towards Derby, where they arrived in the evening, as the people were leaving the factories. His intention was to murder the first female in Derby, but a thought suddenly struck him, "that it was not a good place for such a job," and he persuaded the girl to proceed beyond Derby. On arriving in a secluded lane in the neighbourhood of Lord Harrington's seat, at Elvaston, the girl was so far off that she lay under a tree and went to sleep. Growcock laid himself down by her side, but did not compose himself to sleep, his mind, he says, being occupied with projects for putting the murder. At length, between one and two o'clock in the morning, he got up, took off one stocking, which he crammed into the poor girl's mouth one during all the while, "O man, what are you about? Don't kill me! Don't kill me!" Having succeeded in despatching his victim, he then took from his coat-pocket a small Lancet and struck her over the head repeatedly, making the blood flow profusely. He then left the body lying where it was, and, with the boots he had with his hands, jumped upon her, and left her for dead. He then returned to Derby with the intention of giving himself into custody, and concluded his statement by saying that his motive for committing the horrid deed was the desire of improving himself in his art. Latterly, however, the brain of the unfortunate gentleman became affected. He returned to England three months since, and then he contemplated that the horrid deed would be the occasion of his death. Such, however, was not the case; but, on the contrary, his disease became more confirmed. He was visited by most of our eccentric physicians, and as his last resource Sir Charles Locock was called in, and recommended that the strictest caution should be exercised in watching his movements, as he did not consider him to be safe at large. This advice was strictly attended to—he never being allowed to [illegible] himself. Since being considered necessary, Mr. Dadd took a [illegible] Kent, and reached the Ship tavern at Cobham, [illegible] Monday evening. There they had tea, and Mr. Dadd requested he might be provided for them both. At about half-past [illegible] house, as they stated, for a walk. It is needless [illegible] catastrophe that must have quickly followed. The police have scoured the country for miles, but not the slightest trace of the young man has been discovered. It is generally supposed that he has made away with himself.

IRELAND.—Mr. Howley, Queen's Counsel, and a Roman Catholic, has been appointed by the Lord Chancellor Assistant-Barrister in the room of Mr. Kinahge, now judge of the Prerogative Court.

The Kerry Examiner says—"On Saturday, the depôt of the 30th Regiment, now stationed in our barracks, commenced beating up for recruits, but we understand it was 'too too.' Various were the shrewd and sagacious remarks passed by the peasantry, under the impression that Repealers were ineligible to fill Government situations."

FOREIGN.

SPAIN.—The Madrid Espectador of the 23rd publishes an interesting despatch from Senor Mendizabal to the Regent, after the battle of Ardoz, which the latter had intercepted in the course of his flight, and which he sent under the frank cover of the Regent's resignation into the hands of the Cortes, these Cortes to be convoked as soon as possible. But this do not suit the moderados, who declared to have full power over the army and civil and political authority, deferring as they have done the convocation of the Cortes for a convenient lapse of time. The Queen has arrived at La Granja, when which she appeared to be much pleased, as well as those who had the honour to [illegible] admitted to her society. The minister Lopez, M. Cortine, and a number of others, were daily repairing to La Granja. Barcelona was trusted on the 25th ult. Only one member of the junta remained in the city. The Patulea were still in possession of the fort of Atarazanas. The junta of Saragossa retained the character of supreme, and had raised three battalions of volunteers, who were to be at its orders. M. Guizot, minister for foreign affairs, and Count de St Aulaire, the French ambassador in London, had left Paris for the Chateau d'Eu. Lord Cowley has set out for that royal residence on a special invitation from the King of the Belgians.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO MOUNT EDGECUMBE.

DEVONPORT, Thursday, Half-past One.

About half-past nine o'clock a royal salute announced that her Majesty had left the royal yacht, which, being moored in Barn Pool, was only a few yards from the private landing-place of the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe. The noble earl had caused a temporary platform to be erected, and steps leading therefrom to the water's edge, for the convenience of her Majesty's landing. Her Majesty was attended to the shore by the Lords of the Admiralty in full uniform, who then returned to the royal yacht to wait on his Royal Highness the Prince.

Her Majesty then commenced a ramble through that "fair and famed domain, where stately beech, chestnut, and towering pines, appearing to outvie each other, upstretch their lofty heads, and scorn the wintry blast." Her Majesty, up to this time (one o'clock), was not aware that the grounds she was enjoying its own beauties, and the magnificent and infinite prospect which can be viewed from its grounds

THE PRINCE'S ARRIVAL AT THE DOCKYARD.

Just before 11 another royal salute from the ships and batteries announced that his Royal Highness had left the royal yacht, and about 11 o'clock the Prince, attended by the Lords of the Admiralty and their Secretary, in full uniform, arrived at the landing stairs of the dockyard. A long time before this, an immense number of spectators had gained admittance, although, to prevent confusion, the orders were that none but the friends of the resident officers of the yard should be admitted. A guard of honour (marines), with the marine band, were drawn up at the pier, and on his landing, the Prince was received at the top of the stairs by the Rear-Admiral Sir Byam Martin, K.C.B., the superintendent, and the heads of the departments, to whom presenting arms, and the band playing the national anthem. The Prince was then conducted through the establishment, and embarked again at half-past 12. The men of the dockyard had a holiday granted them by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

It is said that her Majesty will visit the Caledonia, 120, Captain A. [illegible] in the Sound, although such, on board of which ship she will be [illegible] Majesty and the Prince will land at the dockyard at three o'clock, and after going over the establishment, will make a tour through the three towns of Devonport, Stonehouse, and Plymouth.

When the royal party will leave this port is not yet stated. It is said that she will journey to Saltram, the seat of the Earl of Morley, and to "leafy woods," on the banks of the Lara, with her presence. The royal carriages are now near the spot in the dockyard [illegible] guard of honour is now drawn up, with a [illegible]

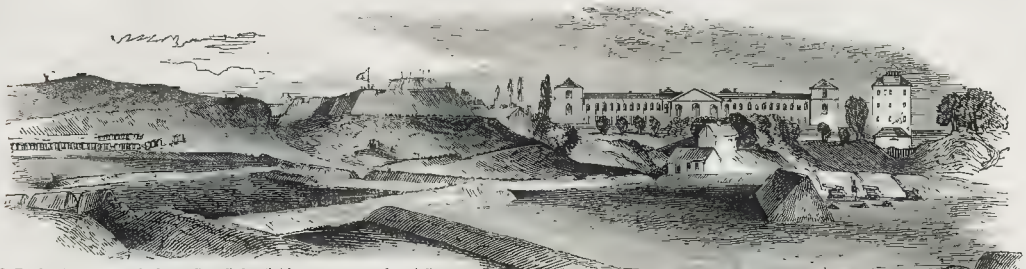
GENERAL ESPARTERO,—GUILDHALL, Yesterday (Friday).—A numerous meeting of the Common Council was [illegible] the Corporation. London was held for the purpose of considering the propriety of presenting an address to the above-mentioned illustrious person respecting his visit to this country, and referring to the proceedings in Spain, the cause of his exile. The magnificent Guildhall was most splendidly decorated, and the enlightened assembly then ensued. Sir Peter Laurie, Mr. Lawrence, and other members having moved that the question [illegible] not be put. The motion, however, was finally carried by a large majority. Much discussion ensued as to what title the hero of Reus should be used. Several members remarked that they considered Espartero the Regent of Spain; (de facto,) a though illegally deposed; others remarked that he was not entitled to be so styled, having left the country of his own free will. The Recorder considered that it would be improper to recognise a foreigner while in England in such a manner. The Lord Mayor said that, as no other Government of Spain had been recognised by Lord Palmerston, he considered that it would not be in any way improper to use the title of Regent. After some further observations it was resolved that the title Regent should be applied in the address. The Lord Mayor then left the Hall, and his intention of inviting his Highness to dine with the members of the Corporation, the assembly broke up.

ESPARTERO AT NORWICH.—At the vestrial gathering at Bunhill-row on Thursday, Father Mathew stated that already upwards of 60,000 had taken the pledge at his hands since he came to London, and when circumstances permitted him to come again to the metropolis he hoped to induce it to double that number—(hear). He had intended to remain in London another fortnight, but an imperative engagement in Dublin for the 19th of September would compel him to leave early next week. Here he will finish, and he should have the honour of visiting, at Norwich, the right rev. Bishop of that diocese. From Norwich he should proceed to Birmingham and Liverpool, and thence to Dublin.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—Yesterday (Friday) morning [illegible] before o'clock, a fire, which was not extinguished until [illegible] consumed property to the amount of many thousands of pounds was destroyed. The premises in question were occupied by Messrs. Staines, well known as the Stingo Brewery, situate in the New-road, Paddington. The premises in question were bounded on the north by the Regent's Canal, on the south by the Yorkshire Grey Tavern. Numerous other buildings abutted on the brewery, but owing to the great exertions of the firemen the conflagration was confined to the brewery, which was almost entirely destroyed.

DREADFUL MURDER AND PARRICIDE AT COBHAM PARK.—On Tuesday morning, as Mr. Abraham Lyster, a butcher of Rochester, with nephew, Mr. Robert Dadd, a young man who has been three years in the service of Mr. Lyster, was driving his pony-chaise down the park, on their road for Wrotham cattle-market, they discovered, just before entering the village of Cobham, a gentlemanly-looking man lying in the park on his face, with his arms extended, and his head in a pool of water. They stopped their gig, and Mr. C. Lyster proceeded to the spot to ascertain whether the person was asleep, as they considered it exceedingly strange that a person of so respectable an appearance should be lying in such a situation. On arriving at the body they found he was dead and covered with blood. On their turning the body over they found a deep wound in the neck, and also some extensive wounds on the left breast; in the deceased's pockets were three sovereigns and a gold watch. The two Lysters immediately gave information in the village of the murder, and the body was removed to a wheeler's shop in the neighbourhood, when it was soon recognised to be that of Mr. Robert Dadd, [illegible] of [illegible] residing in Suffolk-street, Pall-mall East, as carver and gilder. There [illegible] it is supposed, was about 50 years of age, and had come from London [illegible] private lodging. About nine o'clock in the evening the deceased, with his son, left the Ship, saying they should go for a walk. They went out, but did not return again. Every search has been made for him. A [illegible] during the same night, to within the scene of the operations at Chatham, and arrived at the Ship pub lic house, Cobham on Monday night, where they intended sleeping. The waiter, knowing Mr. Dadd, [illegible] private lodging. About nine o'clock in the evening the deceased, with his son, left the Ship, saying they should go for a walk. They went out, but did not return again. Every search has been made for him. A [illegible] during the same night, to within the scene of the operations at Chatham, and arrived at the Ship public

GRAND SIEGE OPERATIONS AT CHATHAM, ON TUESDAY LAST.



GENERAL VIEW OF THE WESTERN LINES BEFORE THE ATTACK.

On Tuesday afternoon one of the finest military displays that have ever been witnessed in this country took place at the Lines at Chatham. The day was peculiarly fine for a spectacle of this nature, being cool and dry; and there could not have been less than 40,000 persons present to witness the grand operations. Lieut.-Colonel Sir Frederic Smith, commander of the engineer department, was early on the ground, and was engaged upwards of six hours in making arrangements for the convenience of the visitors, who were stationed on the roofs of the casemates and on the esplanade. To the kindness of this skilful officer we our artist indebted for the privilege of a closer inspection of the works, as well on previous days as on Tuesday, than could be afforded to the public generally; and through this courteous aid, and the activity of our draughtsman, we are enabled to present our readers with the annexed complete series of illustrations.

The scene of operations was the extensive area occupied by the military establishment at Chatham, enclosed by a strong line of fortifications on the land side, and extending from Brompton Barracks northward to the Marshes, the river Medway, and the sea embankment, which latter position was most advantageous for spectators. One of the principal points too was St. Mary's Creek, where the operation of pontooning was most advantageously shown. It is not, however, necessary to enumerate the several departments of the establishment, as the park, the ravelin, the redoubt, bastions, demi-bastions, and parallels, as their positions will be best seen in the progressive operations of siege, for showing which the locality can scarcely be surpassed. Meanwhile the interest of the scene is very considerable, and the views are especially attractive. Great labour and expense have been employed in fortifying the important port of Chatham, which, with the exception of Portsmouth, is now the strongest in Britain; and this reflection was not disturbed by the distinctness of Sheerness and the fleet in the distance; the Medway at the foot, with 13 line-of-battle ships laid up in ordinary; and Upnor Castle, serving as an historical background, and carrying the mind's eye to the age of Elizabeth, and her foundation of the Dockyard. Just before the commencement of the operations, too, a first-rate line-of-battle ship, the Anson, was seen majestically leaving the Medway, and reminding the spectators of "Britain's best bulwarks," and combining with the great event of the day to impress them with the vastness and effectiveness of our national defences. Our present business is, however, with the land service.

The operations, it should be premised, were performed by the Royal Engineer establishment, assisted by the garrison of Chatham, pursuant to the orders of Sir Thomas Willshire, Bart., K.C.B., &c., commandant, in whose presence, on Saturday, a grand field-day took place. The troops consisted of the 58th Regiment, the 77th, and the Provisional Battalion, with the Royal Sappers and Miners. Upwards of 2000 men were in the field, and they satisfactorily went through the whole of the siege operations to be performed on Tuesday, the public day.

The principal arrangements on Tuesday were as follows:—One portion of the troops acted as the defenders, and another portion as the besiegers. Lieutenant-Colonel Wynyard, of the 58th, commanded the latter, and Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly, of the Provisional Battalion, the party of defence; and the operations of both parties were conducted by officers of the Royal Engineers, under the directions of Lieut.-Col. Sir Frederic Smith, K.H.

BATTERY NO. I. COVERING THE ADVANCE OF THE ROYAL SAPPERS AND MINERS.

To explain the appearance of the ground, which was intersected with trenches and other warlike preparations, it must be assumed that the outworks, on the left of the position covering Chatham Dockyard, had been in the possession of the besiegers, and that their trenches had reached the glacis of the interior line, when the siege was suddenly raised by the advance of a relieving army; but that by the unexpected retreat of that army, the besiegers were enabled to renew the attack.

This being the assumed position of the two parties, the troops began to occupy their respective stations at one o'clock, and at two the operations commenced with the storming of the outer line by the 58th Regiment, who, on a signal flag being hoisted from the officers' casemates, advanced from the village of Gillingham, about half a mile distant, in three columns, their advance being covered by the light company of the regiment. The first column was turned upon the left of the position at St. Mary's Creek, headed by a party of Royal Sappers and Miners, under Lieut. King, R.E., who, by bags of gunpowder, breached the stockade, thereby closing the passage between the lines and the morass. The effect of this operation was extremely fine. The stockade, which was constructed of strong planks, was shivered to atoms by the explosion, and the fragments scattered to a considerable distance.

The creek, it being nearly high water, was crossed by a bridge of infantry pontoons, carried by a party of the Provisional Battalion. In the meantime the flank of the 2nd column was headed by a party of East India Company's Sappers and Miners, under Ensign Anderson, E.I.C.E.; and the 3rd column escaladed the face and flank of the lines, headed by a party of Royal Sappers and Miners, under the command of Lieut. Fowke, R.E. The ladders for these assaults were carried by parties of the Provisional Battalion. The ramparts of the place were lined by troops, under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Kelly of the Provisional Battalion, and Major Robinson of the 2nd Queen's, who fired on the assailants from the outer line; and as soon as the skirmishers of the 58th reached the post-and-rail fence at the fort of the glacis, the firing was returned by the skirmishers. The last volley of the defenders of the outer line was fired just before the ladders were lowered into the ditch. A battery of artillery, which had been employed against the assailants, upon the sound of the bugle, ceased firing and retired to the inner line; and the defenders then also retreated, covered by their skirmishers.

The escaladers having cleared the parapet, they formed, and after firing on the retreating columns, proceeded to occupy the trenches of the former attack, being led on by Lieutenant Chesney, R.E., and the officers and Royal Sappers and Miners of the 6th Brigade, whilst the light company of the 58th Regiment pressed upon the garrison. The batteries of the attack were then opened, under the direction of Captain Browne, of the Royal Marines, and the Royal Sappers and Miners, being under cover of that fire, and of a terrific fire of musketry from the advanced trenches, completed the approaches by flying sap, the workmen being directed by Lieutenant Chesney, R.N., and the officers of the 6th Brigade. Two simultaneous sorties, directed by Captain Whitmore, R.E., and headed by the officers of the Royal Engineers and the Sappers and Miners of the 2nd Brigade, were then made on the flanks of the left attack. The guards of the trenches gave way, and the workmen overturned a few gabions. The sortie then retired, and the arch of the bridge of communication was blown up by the 1st Brigade, under Lieutenant Rich, R.E. This explosion produced a magnificent effect, and may certainly be considered as the crowning piece of the day's proceedings. The bridge was no make-belief, theatrical affair, but a most substantial piece of brickwork, and its sudden annihilation was a complete specimen of the triumph of gunpowder. The guards of the trenches then reoccupied the third parallel, and kept up a smart fire from the advanced parallels and lodgments. A storming party then took post under cover of adjoining buildings, whilst the counterscarp and escarp of the ravelin were breached by the firing of mines under the direction of Lieutenant Murray, Royal Engineers, and the 15th Brigade. Lieutenant Pearce, Royal Engineers and the 7th Brigade, then headed the assault upon the ravelin, and the sappers crowned the crater by effecting a lodgment. A flying sap was then formed by the 8th Brigade, under Lieutenant Chesney, R.E., from the advanced work to the crater of the counterscarp, where they made a communication across the ditch, safe from the fire of the enemy, by carrying a flag of truce from the garrison, and "Cease firing!" was sounded. The batteries of defence were afterwards manned by a detachment of Royal Artillery and of invalid gunners, assisted by the Provisional Battalion. The breach was made in two places, each admitting twenty-five men abreast.

The spectators, who had, up to this period, been on the casemates and esplanade, as well as those who had been on the lines and marshes, near St. Mary's Creek, then moved round to the rear of the right attack of the body of the place. Meanwhile, the guards of the trenches of the advanced parallel and of the lodgment in the ravelin maintained their ground; and a reserve of the 2nd parallel and the remainder of the besieging force was gradually drawn off to the right attack. The trenches against the north-west front became manned, and a fire of artillery opened on the escarp from the trenches and counter-batteries, and of musketry from the parallels. A fire of artillery and musketry was also kept up by the garrison; during which preparations were made for a general assault. Upon the bugle sounding thrice, "to fire," the 4th brigade of Royal Engineers rushed up with a yell of reality, and the barrier-gate was blown in; the left wing of the storming-party, which was the 58th, with ladders, headed by the 3rd Brigade of Royal Engineers, advanced to escalade the Duke of Cumberland's bastion, when at the same moment, a mine by the voltaic battery was fired under the collateral bastion, by Ensigns Walker and Hemery, E.I.C's. Engineers; the right column of assault of the 58th Regiment was headed by Lieutenant Cooke, R.E.; and the 9th Brigade stormed the breach, while the centre column passed the barrier, and "halt, and cease firing" was then sounded. The last attack was by far the most brilliant of the whole operations. The rapidity and accuracy with which the escalading party performed their duty attracted great admiration; while the broken surface of the ground, and the step escarpments of the works, gave an extremely picturesque effect to the groups of soldiers who lined them. The spectators, too, appeared to partake of "the gale of their glory," when, with the collected reserve, the officers, band, and colours, they marched up the breach, amidst loud shouts, took possession, and thus put an end to the siege.

The siege operations being closed, it was intended that a party of the Royal Engineers, assisted by the Sappers and Miners, formed into fresh brigades, should proceed to complete a pontoon bridge at St. Mary's Creek, already partly constructed, and over which the whole of the troops were to march. A submarine explosion was also to take place in the creek, to destroy a rock, which impedes the navigation of that part of the River Medway. Unfortunately, an accident prevented the accomplishment in full of either of these interesting operations. The preparations for the explosion had been completed, and the party of Sappers and Miners had begun to lay the pontoons, when the part of the bridge already completed, and which extended nearly half across the creek from the side of the marshes, was encountered by three lighters, lashed together, on the way from Chatham, down the stream; the collision compelled the party who manned the bridge to loosen the moorings, and let it swing round with the stream; and it was found impossible to replace it in its former position. At the same time, too, the galvanic arrangements for blasting the rock were so disturbed, that after an hour and a half's labour in attempting their re-arrangement, the party of the Royal Artillery abandoned the experiment.

The charges of powder were not, however, lost; for the proceedings of the day terminated with some interesting experiments, testing the strength of various-built walls, and with blowing down the fragments of the piers of the exploded brick bridge, &c.

With the above exceptions, the operations of the day were highly successful; and afforded great gratification to the professional men assembled to witness them, as well as to the general spectators. The arrangements, civil and military, were equally complete; and the whole affair, for its skilful management, well merited the large share of popular applause which it received.

On Saturday the following distinguished persons from Russia visited the Guildhall of the city of London:—The Prince de Dolgorouchy, Colonel Ade Bestraw, Major Viscount de Wessotesy, Chr. de Hardie Lunonia. The visitors were conducted by Sir Chapman Marshall, Mr. Firth, of the Town Clerk's Office, and Mr. Temple, the hall-keeper, over the building, which, however, they by no means saw to advantage, as the old and new Council Chambers are undergoing repair. They entered their names in the visitors' book, and inspected the most curious records in the Library.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, August 20, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—Though there are not, ordinarily, in the month of August serious modifications in the fashions to be noticed, there are, nevertheless, frequent changes that ought not to be passed over in silence. In the first place we should remark the general substitution of veils for falls as one of these mutations; and really it is not difficult to imagine why the fashionable world has received this innovation with such favour, when we see the exquisite delicacy and beauty of the patterns which Violard has introduced this season. Barège robes are still to be seen everywhere, and the greater part of them are made with the corsages coulissés, and off the neck. The skirts have in general but few trimmings, and some of them even are made quite without them. Still we have remarked in the Champs Elysées several furnished with six and even eight flounces, gradually diminishing in width as they rise; but as regards the fashion every one must remark that it is a fancy that is neither right nor graceful. To give you some idea of the situation in which our fashions now stand, let me mention the ensembles of some of our town toilettes. Suppose, then, a robe of shot taffety, furnished upon the front of the skirt with a double falbala in bias, wide at the bottom, finishing in a point at the corsage, and bordered on each side by a trifling of the same stuff; the corsage half high, squared upon the bosom, fitting slightly over the shoulders, with double falback in bias, wide at the bottom, finishing in a point at the corsage, and bordered on each side by a trifling of the same stuff; the corsage half high, squared upon the bosom, fitting slightly over the shoulders, with double falback in bias, wide at the bottom, finishing in a point at the corsage, and gradually widening upon the shoulders in the form of a pelerine, closed by nine buttons behind, and trimmed all round it by a ruche of the same materials. The sleeves plain, coming to the wrist in the form of the sleeve, and fruled. A mantle of lucia muslin, lined with lilac taffety, long, and rounded behind, scalloped to the height of the arms, and descending all round in rounded ends, trimmed all round by a deep lace and the round the ends, but fruled behind, and with two other pelerines of unequal length, scarcely trimmed with lace, most in front at the height of the corsage. A hat of crêpe of a Cayenne colour, ornamented with a long white plume, shaded lilac, completes one of the most handsome costumes you can imagine. One other costume that I have seen deserves mention. It is composed of a robe of grained grey poult de soie, trimmed with a deep flounce covering the half of the skirt, and crowned by a trilling à la vierge of similar material. The corsage is high, and is made with three seams, all of which are covered by trims of the same stuff. The sleeves are plain, with trims forming jockeys. With this was worn a canaan in white muslin, open en coeur to the point of the corsage, and it was trimmed all round it, as were also the openings for the arms, by a ruche in muslin, fixed upon the canaan by a little rose tudety ribbon. bows of rose-coloured ribbon with long ends are at the waist, and a bat of rose-coloured crêpe, trimmed with a long white widow plume on the outside, and with two small bracelets of roses on the inside, torm, as you may suppose, a tout ensemble which is, I can assure you, in very good taste. I do not know that in the present dearth of novelty I can furnish you with any other details worth your notice, and shall therefore close my letter. Adieu. HENRIETTE DE B.

MODES D'HOMMES.

Paris, August 20, 1843.

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS are at present in excellent taste: they are free from all exaggeration. The coats are slightly cut at the waist, forming lappels, and the laps are half cut, which gives freedom and grace to the figure. The corsages are very open, allowing the handsome waistcoat of marcella to be seen. The sleeves set easy, without being either too tight or too loose. Waistcoats are frequently seen of primrose, oil de chèvre (cashmere), with very small buttons.

FROCK COATS have the skirts short and rather full; the lappels are turned back the same as those of dress coats.

Trousers are made half-tight, and are fastened under the feet. Some are cut round without being fastened under the feet. These are worn in complete negligé, with variable colors, and striped or speckled silk stockings. Trousers, with narrow side stripes, are much worn.

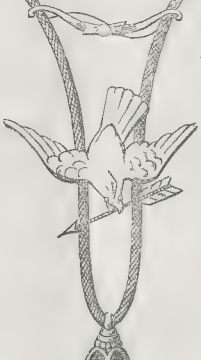
The shirt is no longer hidden by a large scarf, the cravat being now only half-long.

THE ATELIERS D'HUMANN are daily besieged by fashionables, who go to discuss what style of toilette they shall adopt for the sporting season. The period has arrived which produces the creating inventions of this fashionable tailor. Humann has already produced many novelties, and we can assure our readers that there can be nothing more elegant than the shooting dresses. The buttons are exquisitely chased, representing the heads of dogs, wolves, deer, &c.

The walking sticks, whips, cravats, and most of the articles of the chase, are imported from England by Verdier, where a large assortment may be seen.

ARCHERY FETE, AT ST. LEONARD'S-ON-SEA, NEAR HASTINGS.

On Thursday, the 17th ult., being the anniversary of the birthday of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the annual meeting of the Queen's St. Leonard's Archers took place in their beautiful grounds, which are laid out with great skill and taste, and have been much improved of late. The shooting was better than usual this year, and great interest was excited by the contest for the beautiful Royal Prize, the donation of her Majesty the Queen., who condescends to honour the society as patroness, and the successful candidate with a valuable prize. This year it consisted of an elegant gold chain, of exquisite workmanship; the bird of red enamel and diamonds, the arrow set with brilliants, and the tassel of gold and pearls, the ornaments bearing appropriate inscriptions. The shooting continued until six o'clock, when the company separated to assemble again in the ball room, at a later hour in the evening, when the prizes were announced and distributed. After the first set of quadrilles, the Hon. Mr. Justice Haliburton, who officiated for the president, Mr. Planta, addressed the company thus:—"Ladies and Gentlemen,—In consequence of the indisposition of the Right Hon. the President of the Queen's St. Leonard's Archers, Mr. Planta, I have been requested to officiate for him this evening in distributing the prizes to the several successful candidates. The first, the best, and, indeed, the prize of the day, is one presented by her most gracious majesty. I may say that I feel as one of her Majesty's subjects residing at a distant part of the empire, where her Majesty reigns not only over us, but in our hearts and affections—that on this, as on every other occasion, we should consider it both a privilege and a duty at all to do honour to our loyal Queen. With us colonists this is always done in a bumper of wine; but as the arrangements of this evening do not admit of the same application, and as I should only be more unwilling than myself, at such a time as this, to indulge in cold water, I beg leave to propose three cheers for 'The Royal Patroness of the St. Leonard's Archers, the Queen.—God bless her!" This announcement was received with great applause and long-continued cheering. The excellent judge then addressed Miss Mackay, who had won the beautiful prize, and said, on the present occasion, Miss Mackay returned thanks. The next class of prizes, Mr. Haliburton observed, were called Challenge Prizes—four in number—and emanated from the kindness of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. "I have," he said, "a peculiar pleasure in delivering these prizes. His Royal Highness the late Duke of Kent was for several years Commander-in-Chief of the forces in British North America, having his head-quarters in my native colony of Nova Scotia, where he has left a name behind him that tradition will preserve with affectionate regard long, very long, after all his contemporaries shall have passed away and been forgotten. After he resigned that command, and returned to Europe, he did not forget us, but ever afterwards continued our patron and friend. I am delighted to find that the St. Leonard's Archers are honoured with the patronage of her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent. It is a name that appeals directly to my heart, as it does to that of every Nova Scotian." After a congratulatory allusion to her Royal Highness's birthday, the learned judge proposed the name of "Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent," which was received with great enthusiasm by the company. He then delivered to Miss Mackay and Mr. Wills each a first-class Victoria Prize, and to Miss Rose Wood and Captain Norton the second-class Victoria Prizes.



THE ROYAL PRIZE.

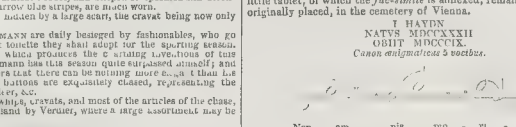
"The next prize," said Mr. Haliburton, "is the Society's Annual Prize, 'The Silver Cup,' won by one of our new members, Mr. Willis. I have witnessed, sir, this day, the great skill that have off this prize, and only regret that the 'cup is not filled,' as it ought to be, that I might have the honour and pleasure of drinking your health in it, and a similar success to your efforts on future occasions."—Mr. Willis returned thanks.—The judge then delivered to Miss Wood and Mr Willis the society's prizes; also to Mrs. Berkeley, the prize for the best gold in the scratch match; and to Mr. A. Borton, the prize for the best gold in the second match.

The Visitors' Prize was won by Mr. Tideus, a visitor. To this gentleman, Mr. Haliburton said:—"I cannot say, sir, I have great pleasure in delivering you this prize, because I regret extreme y that the society's present will fell to the lot of one of the first archers in all England. I have witnessed your extraordinary shooting this day with admiration and delight; and the only drawback to your superior skill that ingenuity could imagine, is a doubt whether you could miss the target if you were to try to do so."—Mr. Tideus returned thanks.—The learned judge then closed the ceremony with a few observations in admirable taste, concluding with his sincerest wishes for the prosperity of "the Queen's St. Leonard's Archers."

Major Jeffries then addressed the president, thanking the learned judge for the very kind and able manner in which he had officiated that evening; and the ceremony concluded by the band playing "God save the Queen," which the company joined in singing; after which the dancing was resumed with great spirit, and the company did not separate until a late hour.

ENIGMATICAL MUSICAL CANON FOR FIVE VOICES, INSCRIBED ON A TOMB OF HAYDN.

The following curious enigmatical inscription upon the tomb of Haydn has set all the musical genius of France and Germany at work to find out a solution. The difficulty of the problem has hitherto defied the learned efforts of the most celebrated harmonists to elucidate its point and meaning. Its history is as follows:—Professor Neukomm, the pupil of Haydn, in 1814, made a pilgrimage to the last resting-place of his great master, and having written the enigma in question on a small tablet of stone, caused it to be affixed to his tomb. The body of Haydn, after many years, was removed from Vienna to his native village, Rohrau, situated near to Bruck, on the Litha, in Austria, close to the Confines of Hungary. The Count of Harrach erected, at his own cost, a splendid mausoleum to the memory of the great genius and many virtues of the distinguished composer, but the little tablet, of which the fac-simile is annexed, remains where it was originally placed, in the cemetery of Vienna.



We shall give the solution in a future number.

On this subject, the composer of the canon in question has addressed the following letter to the editor of the Gazette Musicale, of Paris, of which the following is an extract:—

On my return to Vienna in 1815, I made a pilgrimage to the tomb of my deceased master, Joseph Haydn. The grave digger was the only person who knew the spot where reposed, in unmerited neglect, the remains of that same Haydn to whom, a few years before his death, they had offered at Vienna a species of apotheosis. Thus superior man, from his extraordinary genius, his virtues, and all which is useful and great, erected to himself, whilst living, the best and most durable of all monuments; and, certainly, whilst living, he could not have prepared for himself a more honourable lot than to be honoured by posterity.

But I wished that the name of Haydn should mark the small space which contained his revered ashes, and I thought it might be permitted to the pupil to honour the memory of his master by an act of final piety. I had then placed on this humble grave the most unassuming of all monuments, a plain stone slab, with this simple inscription:—

I. HAYDN.
Natvs MDCCXXXII,
Obiit MDCCCIX.
Canon enigmaticus 5 vocibus.
D. D. D.
Discipvlvs eivs Neukomm, Vindob. Redvx.
MDCCCXIV.

Some years afterwards Haydn's remains were transferred to the place where he was born, Rohrau, a small village situate near Bruck, on the Litha, in Austria, and on the frontiers of Hungary. There, the Comte de Harrach, on whose estates the town is situate, has done honour to himself by erecting a noble monument on the new resting-place of the deceased composer.

The little stone slab has remained at its place in the cemetery at Vienna, and hence many errors have originated as to Haydn's actual grave.

The Gazette Musicale of Vienna gave a sketch of this tombstone. Unfortunately the little enigmatical canon was given in it so inaccurately as to make it impossible for the learned German harmonists, who had undertaken the task (not a very easy one) of solving this enigma, to arrive at any solution. The Gazette Musicale of Milan and other journals have reproduced this canon with all the faults found in the original of the Vienna journal.

Those who have patience sufficient to occupy themselves with these sorts of subtleties in counterpoint, know that the least error in the theme, a dot even more or less, renders the solution of the problem impossible. I have, therefore, felt desirous of giving the canon, such as it is to be found on the sepulchral stone. The Gazette Musicale of Paris will publish the solution in French and foreign harmonists may be willing to forward.

THE MAGAZINES.

MART "CRUIZZLEWIT, No. IX.

The present number is devoted to "More American Experiences" of Martin and our especial favourite, Mark Tapley. The City of Eden on paper, and its reverse, "in fact," is a powerful satire on the emigration bubble: here is a specimen of the settlement:—

THE VALLEY OF EDEN.

"What do you think of our prospects?" inquired Martin, with an air that plainly said he had decided the question for himself in the affirmative.—"Uncommon bright, sir," returned Mark. "Impossible for a place to have a better name, sir, than the Valley of Eden. No man couldn't think of settling in a better place than the Valley of Eden. And I'm told," added Mark, after a pause, "as there's lots of serpents there, so we shall come out, quite complete and regular."

After further dwelling upon this agreeable piece of information with the least dismay, Mark's face grew radiant as he called it to mind: so very radiant, that a stranger might have supposed he had said a single word pertaining to the society of sea cents, and now had set them all in a state of delighted anticipation on of his favourite wallers.—"Who tell you that?" asked Martin, sternly.—"A military officer," said Mark. "Confound you for a mischievous fellow of great wanton, laughing heartily in spite of himself. "What military officer? you know they swindle up in every land."—"As thick as scarecrows in England, sir," interposed Mark, "with a sort of pride in themselves, being entirely coat and sword, as it were. Never ate, sir,"—"Don't mind me, sir; it's my way sometimes. I can't help being jolly. Why it was one of them invading conquerors at Pawkins's, as told me. 'A,' I regularly informed, he says—not exactly through his nose, but as if he'd got a stoppage in it, very high up, 'that's where you're going to the Valley of Eden.' 'I heard sometnis on it,' I told him. 'Oh!' says he, 'if you should ever happen to go to bed there—you may, you know,' he says, 'in course of time as civilisation progresses—don't forget to take a nice with you.' I looks at him tolerable hard. 'Fleas?' says I. 'And more,' says he. 'Wampires?' says I. 'And more,' says he. 'Musquitoes, perhaps?' says I. 'And more,' says he. 'What more?' says I. 'Snakes more,' says he; 'rattlesnakes. You're right to a certain extent, stranger; there are some catawamptious clawers in the small way too, as grow upon a human pretty strong; but don't mind them, they're company.' 'Is snakes,' he says,' as you object to; and whenever you wake and see one in a upright position on your bed,' he says, 'like a corkscrew with the handle off a stump on his bottom rising, cut him down, for he means mischief.'—Why didn't you tell me this before?" cried Martin, with an expression of face which set off the cheerfulness of Mark's visage to great advantage.—"I never thought on it, sir," said Mark. "Here I am at one ear, and went out at the other. But Lord love us, he was one of another company, I dare say, and only made up the story to keep us right go to his lots, as I met the opposition one."—"There's some probability in that," observed Martin. "I can honestly say that I hope so, with all my heart."—"I've not a doubt about it, sir," returned Mark, who, full of the inspiring influence of the subject upon himself, had for the moment forgotten his private grievance upon his master: "anyhow, we must live, you know, sir."—"Live!" cried Martin. "Yes, it's easy to say live; but if we should happen not to wake next time we are napping corkscrews of themselves upon our beds, it may not be so easy to do it."

The office of the Eden settlement:—

It was a small place—something like a turnpike. But a great deal of land may be got into a dice box, and why may not a whole territory be bargained for in a little office? It was laid out handsomely enough for the Edenites were "going" to build a superb establishment for the transaction of their business, and had already got so far as to mark out the site; which is a great thing to have done. The office-door was painted in the usual doorway was the agent: no doubt a tremendous fellow to get through his work, for he seemed to have no scruples, but was swinging backwards and forwards in a rocking-chair, with his feet on his legs planted high up against the door-post, and the other doubled up under him, as if he were hatching his foot.

He was a gaunt man, in a huge straw hat, and a coat of green stuff. The weather was very hot indeed, the land no cheaper, and the office door wide open; so that every time he spoke, something was seen to twitch and jerk up in his throat, like the little hammers in a harpsichord when the notes are struck. Perhaps, under the truth feebly endeavouring to leap to his lips. If so, it never rose to them.

We cannot omit quoting Martin's "le-ver" after he has purchased a location at Eden.

Up they came with a rush. Up they came until the room was full, and, through the open door, a detail, pressure of people came in, so that even a dozen more: and ever and anon the captain's voice was heard above the —"here's more below; there's more below. Now, gentlemen, you that have been introduced to Mr. Chuzzlewit, will you clear, gentlemen. Will you clear? Will you be so good as clear, gentlemen, and make a little room for more?"

Regardless of the captain's cries, they didn't clear at all, but stood there, both upright and sideling. The gentlemen connected with the Watertoast Gazette had come express to get the matter for an article on Martin. They had agreed to divide the labour. One of them took him below the waist; and over. Each stood directly in front of his subject, with his head a little on one side, intent on his department. If Martin put one boot before the other, the lower gentleman was down upon him; he rubbed a pimple on the upper part of his person with his pocket handkerchief. He opened his mouth to speak, and the same gentleman was on one knee before him, looking in at his teeth, with the nice scrutiny of a dentist. Amateurs in the physiognomical and chronological sciences prowled about him; calculating eyes and itching fingers, and sometimes one, more daring than the rest, made a mad grasp at the back of his head, and vanished in the crowd. They had him in all points of view in front, in profile, three-quarter face, and behind. Those who were not professional or scientific auditors exchanged opinions on his looks. New sights shone in upon him in respect of his nose. Contradictory reports were shrouded in the subject of his hair. And still the captain's voice was heard—so stifled by the concourse, that he seemed to speak from underneath a feather bed, exclaiming, "Gentlemen, you that have been introduced to Mr. Chuzzlewit, will you clear?"

Here we must break off; although every page of the number abounds in that exquisite flow of truthful humour, which is the well-spring of the author's success.

FRASER'S MAGAZINE

Is an excellent number, opening with a paper on the "Letters of Mary, Queen of Scots," edited by Miss Strickland; although it is written upon the old "review" plan of cramming with a clever book, and then writing an original article on the subject. "The Things we don't know" is a good title, and the curiosity excited by it is well repaid. But the paper must be quoted in the "Reminiscences of Men and Things," from which we have quote the following opening column:—

"When first I saw the Duke of Orleans, now King of the French, he was advancing with light step, and the air of a bourgeois gentilhomme, towards the little ferry-boat of Twickenham. It was a delightful summer day in the latter part of July. Father Thames looked his brightest and his best. The old green Ait was covered with happy citizens, who and visited the then rustic habitation of the fisherman, now transformed into a spacious hotel, to quaff small ale and cheese cakes; the deep shade of many fine trees, and the broad and level flowers of gem parterres, formed the landscape on which my eyes feasted with repleasure, and it mattered at that time very little to me who were my companions in the ferry boat.

"Here comes the Duke of Orleans," said the owner of the old ferry-boat; who, to be a his perfect indifference to French language and French names, called him Arlean instead of by his real appellation. "Well he's got in, well push off; so don't be in no hurry, young gentleman." The ferry was, that three young rogues, each one as roguish as myself, had been waiting full a quarter of an hour for the ferryman's departure; and an apparently wealthy merchant, looking all good-nature and smiles, had kept down our ill humour by some quiet jokes and mild remarks. As the duke approached the boat, the ferryman took off his cap, the merchant raised his beaver, and we three holiday youths sprung on our feet and smiled a good humour. The duke was not behind us in his civility; "I hoped that he had not detained us;" pointed to the surrounding scenery with evident sentiments of delight; raised his eyes, and his shoulders, and smiled, and looked quite graciously at the old man who forked along the "punt," as well as at a younger one, who helped his father. The duke was dressed in a summer and country attire. There was nothing of display or affectation in his manner; and I remember quite well that, when we landed, he gladdened the heart of the ferryman by a silver sixpence. At least the old man looked gratitude and satisfaction; for his right face was one penny, and you may be sure that "we three young rogues" made use of it.

I have thus commenced these reminiscences of Louis Philippe, the King of the French, because I have a striking anecdote to record connected with this acrid mal-rencontre. As we were all about leaving the ferry-boat to tread the verdant meads on the other side of the river, the Duke of Orleans took the precedence of landing; but, whether from a jerk of the boat, or from a slip of his foot, I cannot tell, his hat, which was in his hand, fell to the ground. The worthy citizen who had been our companion prior to the arrival of his royal highness, and who had likewise crossed the ferry, took up his hat, and presenting it to Louis Philippe, said, in a tone full and respectful voice "THOU SHALT BE KING HEREAFTER!" The duke evidently understood both the quotation and the application, and, shaking the worthy stranger most cordially by the hand, laughed heartily, walked a few steps with him, and then departed.

Next is "The Pearl of Bruges," "the quiet-coloured beauty;" pleasant enough in its way; but we think the taste for this kind of chivalry is on the wane. This is followed by the second portion of a view of the life of Addison, entitled "The Man and the Author;" doubtless, originating in Miss Aikin's recent laudable attempt to rescue the moral character of Addison from obloquy. The paper contains a curious attempt to show that Goldsmith formed his own narrative versification upon Addison much more than upon Pope; and the paper will altogether interest the literary reader. The next paper, "Men's Wives," attracted us by having often observed so great a difference in the tastes of married persons, as to puzzle us to imagine what could have led to their union; but the author does not enlighten us on this point. "Wonders and Marvels of the Session of 1843" is a droll article, such as we should not have been surprised to find in "Punch." The remaining papers will well repay perusal; and the number is altogether one of the best that we have lately seen.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Rev. Henry Caswall, M.A., author of the "History of the Mormons," late of the American Episcopa Church, having been admitted to the privileges of the English Church, under the provisions of a special act of Parliament recently passed, has been licensed by the Lord Bishop of Salisbury to the curacy of Downton, Wiltshire, on the nomination of the Rev. R. Payne. The appointment has been confirmed by his grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The Bishop of Salisbury consecrated, on Tuesday last, St. Peter's Church, Swallowcliffe. The ancient church was pulled down some time back, and the present elegant edifice erected in its stead.

The Bishop of Llandaff consecrated the new church at Llandaff, Anglesey, in the presence of Lord Boston and Hon. Misses Irby, Rev. Asseston Smith, and a large assembly of the gentry and clergy of the diocese, on Wednesday last. Lord Boston gave the site and stone for the building, and subscribed the handsome sum of £240 to cover the expense of its erection.

The Rev. Dr Tighe Gregory has been licensed to the cure of Hunstanton, near Lynn, diocese of Norwich.

His Grace the Duke of Devonshire has presented the Rev. John Cooper, B.A., of Queen's College, Cambridge, to the incumbency of Bolton Abbey, Yorkshire, vacant by the death of the Rev. Wm. Carr.

The Rev. William Higson, M.A., of St. John's College Cambridge, perpetual curate of Crosland, has been licensed to the perpetual curacy of Christ Church, Tean, in the parish of Checkley, Staffordshire.

The Rev. Alfred Pyne, B.A., of Trinity College, has been instituted by the Lord Bishop of London to the vicarage of Lee, Middlesex, on the presentation of the Hon. Wellesley Pole, Esq., M.P.

The Rev. John C. Saunders, M.A., of Magdalen College, Oxford, has been elected to the lectureship of St. John's Church, Southwark, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. John Davis.

The Rev. William R. Hippes, B.A., of Exeter College, Oxford, has been instituted to the rectory of Stow-on-the-Wold, Gloucestershire.

The Lord Bishop of Exeter has instituted the Rev. Francis Courtney to the perpetual curacy of St. Sidwell's, on the resignation of the Rev. E. H. Browne.

The Lord Bishop of Ripon has instituted the Rev. Robert Aitken to the incumbency of St. James's Church, Leeds.

The Rev. Samuel Dupre has been instituted to the vicarage of Highley, Salop, vacant by the cession of the Rev. Samuel Burrows.

The Rev. William Hawkins, M.A., has been instituted to the rectory of Thenford, Northamptonshire, vacant by the death of the Rev. Egerton Stedford, on the presentation of the Queen.

The Rev. Henry Snow, M.A., has been instituted to the vicarage of Bibury, Gloucestershire, vacant by the death of the Rev. Sackville Cresswell.

The Rev. Thomas Powell, rector of Tharcastone, has been instituted to the vicarage of Dorstone, Herefordshire, vacant by the death of the Rev. Thomas Prosser.

The Lord Bishop of Peterborough has instituted the Rev. Matthew Wilson, B.A., of St. Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, to the vicarage of Long Sutton, Lincolnshire, vacant by the death of the Rev. Calverly John Bewicke.

The Rev. James Wadby Holmes, M.A., of Corpus Hall, Cambridge, has been licensed to the perpetual curacy of Newmill, Yorkshire; patron, the vicar of Burton-Kirth.

The Rev. Joshua Waltham, B.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge, to the perpetual curacy of Out Rawcliffe, Lancashire.

The Rev. Charles Bowen, B.A., of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, has been appointed by the Lord Bishop of Winchester to the incumbency of the new church dedicated to St. Mary, in the Old Kent road.

The Rev. George Peacock, B.C.L., has been appointed to the ministry of St. Paul's Chapel, Portland Place, Marylebone, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. J. Hobart Caunter, B.D.; patron, the Queen.

The dean and chapter of Ely have presented the Rev. J. Udney Robson, B.A., of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, to the vicarage of Wrinston, Suffolk.

MEETING OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION, AT CORK.

We resume our illustrations of the proceedings of this highly important Association, as well remarked in the Literary Gazette, "the transactions have been, on the whole, of an important and scientific character, and many points of general interest have arisen out of the discussions."

On Thursday, Mr. Hunt explained to the chemical section a new photographic process, the chromatype: the paper is prepared by a very sensitive process, and an engraving, botanic specimens, or the like, being laid on the paper in a proper manner, it is exposed to the sun's rays for a period varying, with the intensity of the light, from five to fifteen minutes, in which time picture results from the exposure. It is then washed over with a tolerably strong solution of the nitrate of silver, which brings out a very intense orange coloured image, the light and shade being reversed. The only fixing required is to pour water and wash it over [illegible] pictures placed in sunshine will in a few minutes be rendered [illegible] however, is not obliterated; if the paper be laid in the sunshine for a few minutes, the images gradually come out and the picture is restored; but instead of being of an orange colour, it is now a fine blue. This variety requires no fixing. In a subsequent paper, Mr. Hunt noticed a remarkable property which had also been observed in the luminous rays, namely, that under their influence sarcinæ (mould) grow very rapidly, but not at all under the agencies of other rays; which fact appears to correspond with the experience of gardeners, who attribute great power to the moon's rays in producing this variety of plants.

Mr. Hincks described to the botanical section the singular and curious re-discovery of the Neottia gemmipara, one of the rarest plants in the world, of which two specimens were exhibited. It was first found in 1810, in Ceylon, at Berbeaven, by Mr. Drummond, and was quite lost sight of until 1841, when it was re-discovered; it found its way to Dr. Woods of Cork, who had sent it to him in London. It is a curious plant, as this is the only one of the kind in the world in which it is known to have grown. It was next incidentally mentioned in a discussion on saxifrages, that the London pride of the English gardens is incidental with the London pride of the Pyrenees.

In a paper on the application of some laws of sound to the construction of buildings, read to the mechanical section, by Mr. J. S. Russell, he mentioned the fact of about 700 new free churches being about to be erected in Scotland, for which this theory was very interesting.

One of the most striking papers read to the geological section on Thursday, was that on earthquakes, by the Professors Rogers, of Philadelphia and Virginia, in which the authors infer that, when earthquakes produce any permanent elevation or depression of the land, the tracts so affected will generally have the shape of elongated pear-like belts, as exemplified in the Ullah Band in the Delta of the Indus, the elevation of the coast of Cutch, and the local arching of the surface across the bed of a river in Chili, mentioned by Darwin. Referring to their memoir on the Appalachian chain, the authors contend that the structure of those mountains (and, by analogy, those of other countries) implies the operation of far greater and more sudden forces than the gentle secular changes observed in modern times, and they consider it impossible to avoid the conclusion, that all the more extensive revolutions of the earth's crust have involved, to a greater or less extent, the agency of vast earthquake waves. To the action of these waves, in different geological epochs, they attribute the formation of the vast masses of conglomerate and detrital deposits distributed in the various ages of strata; also the transport of the great northern drift, and the grooved and furrowed surfaces of rocks both in Scotland and England.

At the sectional proceedings of Friday, Dr. Pickells read a paper on Agrostis arcuata, one of the most virulent poisons of the Indigenous British Flora, and which grows in great abundance, particularly in York. Dr. Pickells collected nearly thirty cases of death by eating the root, the quantity in one instance not exceeding "the top of the finger;" he described the symptoms as exhibited by those cases—insensibility, convulsions, locked jaw, delirium, and insanity; and pointed out the proper mode of treating such cases. He thought that this might have been the plant used to destroy Socrates, and not the Conium maculatum of modern botany; and from the symptom of insanity, he thought that this was the plant designated as the "insane root," by the poet. This plant, Dr. Pickells stated to be equally injurious to black cattle and horses, as to man; he believed there was no direct antidote known; melted butter was given in some of the cases which recovered, and is popularly deemed a preservative against its effects.

On the same day, the premium of a piece by Dr. W. C. Taylor, "On the Irish Silk Manufacture," which was to be accompanied by specimens of the finest poplins and tabinets produced by the looms of Dublin, [illegible] unanimously awarded in the affirmative section. [illegible] of the manufacture, Dr. Taylor stated, there are at present about 280 men and 750 women employed in poplin manufacture, assisted by 130 children employed in winding the bobbins or quills for the shuttles. In Prussia and Holland, cotton is very freely introduced; and though they are there [illegible] much cheaper than the Irish, they are obviously inferior in richness and beauty, and they have not the same amount of permanence of colour and durability of material. The Irish poplins are highly esteemed abroad, and they are occasionally ordered in limited quantities for the principal continental courts, the United States of America, and the East and West Indies. There are about 240 poplin looms in Dublin, 20 velvets, and a few furniture tabarets; so that the poplin may be regarded as the only branch of the manufacture which has a lively existence in Ireland. The [illegible] of the fabric must always restrict the manufacture of poplin within what limited bounds would consider exceedingly narrow limits, particularly as it is believed impossible to apply power successfully to the looms of cotton. In a discussion which followed, it was stated that large quantities of muslins are now sent from England to be worked in Ireland, one establishment alone paying more than £90,000 annually for needlework in Ireland.

The [illegible] sections on Saturday were of considerable scientific [illegible] Professor Forbes announced Mr. J. S. Russell's "Report on the Tides of the Frith of Forth, and the East Coast of Scotland;" and the results of the observations were most important and satisfactory. Two distinct sets of tide-waves visit together the east coast of Scotland, but one of them has hitherto been entirely neglected. One proceeds from the north of Scotland and runs south; a second comes northward from the Straits of Dover. These were demonstrated on two charts: the progress of these were exhibited. The first wave is seen in the middle Frith and Forth down to the open sea; but in the upper part of the Channel, these double tides were therein distributed, and rendered more visible. These tides had opposite hours, and [illegible] least clear age and origin. The paper was of very considerable interest; and it was stated by Mr. Russell that the Admiralty had just been contracting a series of similar observations in Ireland.

A paper from the Rev. Mr. Heath "On the Inhabitants of the Navigator's and Margesas Islands" excited much attention. A short vocabulary was framed of the Samoan dialect, which was also common in that locality. A very interesting discussion ensued, when it appeared that one peculiarity in the Samoan dialect is its having a distinct language of compliment made use of to address superiors.

In the statistical section Mr. Baines read a novel and interesting paper "On Travelling by Cars." At present, an establishment of 1,800 horses, &c. which travel from eight to ten miles per hour, at the same fare for travelling being about 1½d. per mile. The number of miles over which the cars travel daily is 3800, passing through 140 stations for the change of horses. His annual consumption of hay is from 3000 to 4000 tons, and of oats from 30,000 to 40,000 barrels. None of the cars travel on Sunday, with the exception of those connected with the mail; the Irish people, with much respect to religious observances, would not travel on business on Sunday. He also finds a saving of 13 per cent. by not working the horses on Sunday, finding it much easier to work a horse until eight days one day in place of six times four, an additional six miles on Sunday. The establishment has been in existence 28 years, and employs 1300 horses.

We return to Professor Owen's interesting lecture on the Dinornis (Dinornis), (briefly mentioned in our last week's Journal), as our artist has supplied us with the annexed illustration. His first volume of the Transactions of the Zoological Society contains the information on the causes which led to the discovery here, that about three years ago [illegible] called to the [illegible] of Sir George Grey, the Governor of New Zealand. At the first inspection, however, which he made of it, Professor Owen declared that it was part of a bone that belonged to a bird, but not a bird of flight, as it wanted the air cells with which such are furnished. It was rather larger than the bone of the ostrich, and differs very much from that of the apteryx, a bird whose wings are reduced to the lowest rudiments. In the course of three years, Professor Owen obtained further information on the subject, through a gentleman who had gone out to New Zealand, and was at the house of a church missionary, saw large collections of the [illegible] these birds, of which he sent many specimens to the Professor. They said that their grandfathers formerly [illegible] them several existing varieties. The largest ostrich is [illegible] the largest of the Dinornis, comparing the bones in existence, must have been [illegible] high. This bird is confined to New Zealand, and it appears only in the north of that island. In other parts of the world, large birds have also been found, and the footsteps of birds as gigantic as that of the dinornis have been discovered—but in no instance that their existence has been received with a considerable degree of doubt and hesitation. It was thought that they belonged to some extinct reptile race, but the light which science has shed upon the subject, attests the truth of their real origin.

The subjoined engraving shows the newly-discovered relic of the dangerbird, in comparison with a similar bone of the ostrich; also, the skeletons of the New Holland cassowary, or emu; and of the apteryx of New Zealand, in which country the bone of the danger-bird was found. The apteryx is also called the kiwikiwi, and is one of the most extraordinary birds of New Zealand. PLEASURE EXCURSION OF THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION, CORK.

To the statistical section Captain Larcome read some extracts from the Census of 1841, which the Lord-Lieutenant had forwarded, and which excited considerable interest, considering that it had not yet reached the House of Commons.

In the mechanical section, a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Lalor Cooke, for his description of a new clock movement, marking half seconds, the system of escapement being quite new. Thanks were also voted to Mr. Leahy, for his new instruments for measuring the distances of objects, both by sea and land; their principle being that in a right angular triangle, you have given the base and all the angles. Thanks were next voted to Mr. A. Deane, for the following ingenious and practical mode of raising a sunk steamer of 400 tons burthen. He first made a cofferdam round the vessel, which was pumped out: he next excavated under her, till the breach was to be got at, which was then covered with plank and cow hide. The cofferdam was taken away, and with the tide she rose, and was floated to passage. The whole operation only took about four tides. She was sunk in about fourteen feet of water, the expense was about £400. Mr. Purser exhibited two new Fire Escapes, and a Cork Jacket and apparatus, for saving from drowning—the whole weight was 18lbs.; when the President asked Mr. Purser if he were a Cork man? (Laughter.)

On Tuesday evening, the second soirée was held at the Commercial Rooms and Imperial Clarence Hotel, and was brilliantly attended. Although it was arranged that the business of the sections should terminate on Tuesday, so great was the number of papers laid before them, that several continued their sittings on Wednesday.—We have only space to report the following, from the proceedings of the mechanical section. Mr. White read a paper by Mr. Starkie, "On a System of Filtration by Sponge in a compressed state." The sponge is lessened in bulk by one-tenth or one-fifteenth of its size, and will be capable of filtering from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 gallons of water in 24 hours. The method is to get a vessel of the above magnitude, in the middle of which there are two layers of sponge placed, which are squeezed together by two platforms of iron, worked by a screw in the centre, the plates being full of holes to allow the water to pass through.—[This we believe to be the principle of Stuckey's Filter, so highly commended by Lord Brougham.]

Mr. Hawkins described an account of a mode of the filtration of water, which he had adopted at Philadelphia. It was by passing it through a layer of sponge, of sand, and charcoal. There was also a slight decomposition of charcoal, which supplied the water with carbonic acid gas.

In conclusion, the president of the section reported on the important and powerful impulse given to mechanics by the proceedings of the Institution of Civil Engineers in London. It contained as members many working mechanics, while it also embraced numbers of the nobility, who were not ashamed to identify themselves with the progress of mechanical science. Prince Albert, and that illustrious Irishman the Duke of Wellington, were enrolled amongst the list.

A meeting of the general committee was held in the afternoon, when grants of money to the amount of £1389 were awarded.

The final general meeting was held on Wednesday evening, in the great room at the Corn Exchange, which was very well filled by the fashion of the city of Cork. The platform was occupied by the members of the association, and at half-past eight the chair was taken by the Earl of Rosse, amid loud and prolonged acclamations; after which Dr. Robinson, "the Irish Argo," as he was felicitously termed by Mr. Murchison, gave a luminous summary of recent scientific operations in Ireland, concluding with a most interesting description of the "leviathan telescope," constructed by the noble president, the Earl of Rosse; of which triumph of science we hope next week to present our readers with a series of illustrations. The Earl of Rosse then rose and delivered a brief valedictory address, and the assemblage separated.

THE PROMENADE AND SOIREE.

The largest of the annexed illustrations represents the promenade and soirée of the members of the Association and their visitors, in the superb saloon of the Imperial Hotel, which was magnificently appointed for the occasion. It is 75 feet long by 35 feet broad, and 25 feet high; and we agree with the Cork Examiner, that, "except at Mivart's, Long's, or some of the temporary sejours of fashion in the great Metropolis, we doubt if a finer or more elegantly furnished room could be seen." When filled with company in full evening dress, and profusely lit, the coup-d'œil was extremely brilliant. Our next engraving shows of the Association, on Thursday, the seventh day, to the far-famed harbour of Cork—the statio bene fida carinis, as it is well and truly called, par excellence—when a very large number of the members availed themselves of the opportunity of seeing its beauties, and examining its zoological, botanical, and geological treasures. The Prince steamer got under weigh amid the cheers of spectators who lined the quays; and the salutes of guns from the vessels in the river, particularly the London, Dublin, Bristol, and Liverpool steamers, whose gayest colours floated in the breeze. At Monkstown, the scientific portion of the company divided themselves into a dredging and a geological party, and proceeded in boats. Professor Forbes headed the dredging party, and Mr. Murchison, the geological. They remained for upwards of three hours dredging and "hammering;" and were taken on board again at Haulbowline, whence the Prince steamed onwards to the Carrigaline river, and, having gone through the different islands around the harbour, touched on Eastferry, Aghada, Rostellan, &c. &c., returned to Haulbowline, where a sumptuous déjeûner was prepared by Mr. M'Cormack of the Victoria Hotel. The Prince returned at seven o'clock, all on board being highly pleased with the trip.

In the course of the day, Mr. Purser experimentalised with his cork "Life-preserver." He jumped into the sea, and continued in the water perfectly safe and buoyant. He smoked a cigar, exhibited signals, fired a pistol, and performed other feats in the water, and could have easily gone over to Cove.

On Thursday evening, the much-looked-for ball came off in the great room of the Corn Exchange, and was attended by twelve hundred richly and elegantly dressed persons, among whom were more than one hundred naval and military officers, in their varied and gorgeous uniforms. The noble hall covers an area of 75 feet square; at one side of the square an enormous orchestra was erected, in which three bands were stationed. Never were there assembled in a Cork ball room so many lovely and attractive women.

We have left ourselves but space to name the cattle show and dinner of the Cork Agricultural Society, at which the leading members of the council were present; the horticultural show, on Tuesday; and the exhibition of the Cork Art-Union, all "got up" in honour of the brilliant visit of the British Association. The meeting over a great number of the members left Cork to visit the romantic scenery of Killarney, Glengarriff, Gougbneberra, the beautiful Blackwater river, &c.

"In wishing them farewell," says the Cork Examiner, "we trust the day may arrive when they will again pay us a visit. We know that they have been taught to see and appreciate the virtues of the Irish people, brief as has been their sojourn on our shores; and that though their advent was dissociated from politics, they have not wilfully excluded the evidence which observation gave them of the condition of Ireland and her people."

We subjoin a portrait of the Earl of Rosse, who has in so able and accomplished a manner presided over the meeting of the British Association. His lordship is the son of the second earl: was born in 1800, and succeeded to the title in 1841. He is lord-lieutenant and custos-rotulorum of the King's County, and colonel of the Militia. His devoted attachment to scientific pursuits and especially to the improved construction of the telescope, pre-eminently fitted him for the presidency of an association "for the Advancement of Science." He resides at Birr Castle, King's County, where he has built himself an excellent observatory, and where he devotes himself to the improvement of astronomical apparatus with an intensity which has few parallels in the records of science.

PROMENADE AND SOIREE, AT THE IMPERIAL HOTEL, CORK.

SCENE FROM "WHO'S YOUR FRIEND; OR, THE QUEENSBURY FETE;" AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE. "LORD LEATHERHEAD," "LADY BAMBOOZLE," AND "GILES."

Never did pastoral poet attempt to upset the MYTHOLOGY more effectually than did the court swains in the commencement of the eighteenth century. Moschus, Bion, Theocritus, and a few others of antiquity, described Nature as they found her; Master Virgil thought that HE would make a courtier of a shepherd, and accordingly Tityrus and Meliboeus talk Latin as if they "lisp'd in numbers;" but our late moderns have been more outrageous still, inasmuch as they made those who were tired with the debaucheries of a court, seek the ruralities of the village or the plain, and insult the simplicity of both by pretending to masquerade their innocence.

This vice has long since died, and we question the propriety of satirizing it after its decease; but we cannot, in justice, but say that the little comedy entitled "Who's your Friend?" is a most pleasant production, full of excellent mirth, principally arising from ingenious and well-contrived situation, a requisite in good drama, which Mr. Planché, the author, knows so perfectly well how to supply. Nothing can excel the affectation of shepherd life, which was portrayed in the first set by Madame Vestris, Mrs. Glover, and Mr. Strickland, unless it may be the truth and natural force exhibited by Mr. Charles Mathews in his performance of the simple, honest-hearted Giles Fairland.

Whoever had the "getting up" of this pastoral burletta is a consummate artist, for the "mise en scène" is altogether equal, if not superior, to anything we ever witnessed. There is an old saying, that too many in the culinary department spoil the pottage, but not so here, although we think we can detect more than one style in the colouring of this dramatic tableau. There is the same mindful attention to details and accessories which used to characterise the productions at the Olympic, and no doubt the same fair hands have had a finger in the pie. Our illustration represents a portion of the last scene in the second act, most inimitably acted by Madame Vestris, Mrs. Glover, and Strickland. Take "Who's your Friend?" for all and all, we have not seen its fellow for many a day. It is one of the neatest productions of the fertile Planché, and acted à merveille as it is, cannot fail to have a long run.

DESTRUCTION OF THE BERLIN OPERA-HOUSE.

The Opera House at Berlin, one of the principal ornaments of the finest part of the city, was destroyed by fire on the night of the 19th ult., after having stood somewhat more than a century. Nothing positive can be stated as to the origin of the fire; and although in a performance of the evening, a ballet called "The Swiss Soldier," there was some firing of muskets and cannon, there is no reason to believe the fire to have been caused by negligence in this respect. It appears that the watchman, who resided in the building, on going his rounds about ten o'clock, perceived nothing; yet immediately afterwards, towards half-past ten o'clock, the fire broke out, probably in the wardrobe, with incredible rapidity. The alarm was instantly given, and was spread throughout the whole city. An officer on guard, who first saw the fire, immediately hastened with his men to the theatre, and saved a small part of the furniture, and the greater part of the very valuable music; but the rapid spread of the flames, fed by the easily combustible materials, made it impossible to remain long in the building, which in less than ten minutes presented one mass of flames. The fire-engines were soon on the spot, and the most judicious measures were adopted. His Royal Highness the Prince of Prussia was one of the first that appeared, and gave the necessary directions for placing the engines and the soldiers who had been sent for to prevent the flame spreading to the neighbouring buildings. His Royal Highness the Prince Adalbert, Albert, and Waldemar, and also the Archduke Stepson of Austria, and Prince Augustus of Wurtemberg, were soon on the spot, and seconded the exertions of the Prince of Prussia, and of the military and police, and of General Colomb, the Governor of Berlin. As there was no chance of saving the Opera-house, every effort was made to save the buildings most exposed to damage; and above all the palace of the Prince of Prussia, and the royal library, and its immense treasure. As the damage could only come from without, every exertion was made to prevent the roof from taking fire, and within the building everything was prepared to remove the valuable books, &c., if it should be thought necessary; but not a volume was conveyed from its place. Between two and three o'clock, the danger being over, the greater part of the assistants and officers could be dispensed with, and the last retired between four and five o'clock; at seven, the people began to clear the rooms; and at nine, the library was opened to the public as usual. The palace of the Prince of Prussia was also protected in the same manner, and very little damage was done to it, or to any of the neighbouring buildings. Fortunately, no lives were lost, nor individuals seriously injured.

This superb theatre was the work of Frederick the Great, who, it seems, had long projected it, for he made a sketch of the building when he was Crown Prince. Immediately after his accession, in June, 1740, he gave orders for its erection, but he was prevented laying the first stone by his engagement in the Silesian war. The foundation-stone, which lies under the concert saloon, has the following inscription:—"Fredericus II., Rex Borussorum Ludis Thaliæ et Melpomenis, Sororum Sacra hæc Fundamenta ponit. Anno MDCCXLI., die quinto Septembris."

It was one of the most magnificently built theatres in Europe, 226 feet in length, and 106 in width. In the principal front was a portico, with six fluted Corinthian columns; and an enriched pediment, surmounted by three emblematic figures, and the tympanum embellished with sculpture. The other entrances were likewise surmounted by figures. Immediately adjoining is the Catholic church of St. Hedwig, an imitation of the Pantheon in Rome, and just seen in the distance of the engraving. The Royal Library, which so narrowly escaped destruction in the late fire, has an apartment 263 feet long, and 59 feet broad; and contains more than 400,000 volumes, besides manuscripts. The theatre contained three tiers of boxes, and accommodation for 3000 spectators. It stood in the Dorotheenstadt, or new town quarter, between the Friedrichswerder quarter and the northern bend of the Spree.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXII.

PRISONAGE

CAROLINE, during the whole of that night, remained by Sir Arthur's bed-side, and as for several days he was scarcely able to move, she continued to be unremitting in her attention, and did all in her power to alleviate his sufferings, which were occasionally acute in the extreme.

But even the anxiety thus manifested by her past conduct, having shattered her faithlessness, he ascribed her present conduct to hypocrisy, and even when he did not—when he could not but feel that the motives which prompted her tenderness were pure—he dwelt upon the happiness of which she might have been the source, but which had then been in his view for ever destroyed.

Having lain for ten days almost constantly in one position, Sir Arthur, by virtue of the consummate skill of Dr. Hawtree, aided by the excellent nursing of Caroline, so far recovered as to be allowed to sit for several hours during the day in an easy chair, and to receive short visits from Grenville and Major Palgrave, but not a word on the subject of his struggle with Darnley was mentioned to either. Dr. Hawtree knew of it: Sir Arthur had felt himself bound to explain all in confidence to him, but as the Doctor, being anxious to keep his mind tranquil, advised him to conceal his suspicions, and endeavoured to induce him to believe that they might after all be without any real foundation, he resolved to withhold them from Grenville.

"Falkland," said he, to his servant on one occasion, Caroline being from home, "Falkland, you have been with me several years, and I have not the slightest reason to believe that you ever told me a falsehood. Now, I wish to put a serious question to you, Falkland, and on doing so, I charge you to keep it a secret."

"You may depend upon me, Sir Arthur."

"I do depend upon you; and, therefore, I at once ask you whether, since the day on which I injured myself, that man Darnley has been here?"

"Why, Sir Arthur, I can't say that he has been here."

"Why do you lay so strong an emphasis upon the word 'here?' Have you heard of him since?"

"Why yes, I have heard of him, because he has written to my lady, and my lady has written to him."

"How do you know that, Falkland?"

"Ma'amselle Julie, Sir Arthur, told me; but I hope, for her sake, it will never be brought on the carpet. I am sure she would never tell any one else, and she only told me because she tells me everything."

"I perceive. It shall never be known that you revealed the secret. But how come she to know that they had written to each other?"

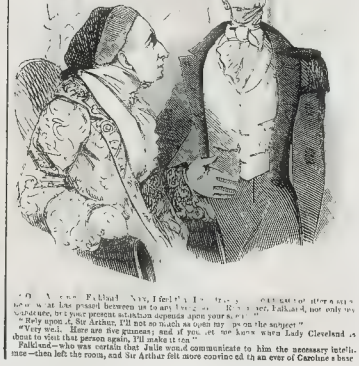
"Oh, she took the first letter and waited for an answer."

"How soon was this after that affair in the drawing-room?"

"Oh the next morning. But she has been since then with my lady to see how he is."

"To see how he is! What is the matter with him?"

"Why, Sir Arthur, Ma'amselle tells me that when he had that fall he hurt the spure of his back."



"O, Sir Arthur Falkland, Sir Arthur, I feel I have been guilty of great error in not having told you how much has passed between us to any extent, but only to a trifling extent, but your present estimation depends upon your secrecy."

"Rely upon it, Sir Arthur, I'll not so much as open my lips on the subject."

"Very well. Here are five guineas; and if you let me know when Lady Cleveland is about to visit that person again, I'll make it ten."

Falkland—who was certain that Julie would communicate to him the necessary intelligence—then left the room, and Sir Arthur felt more convinced than ever of Caroline's base

ABYSSINIAN MULE.

PRESENTS TO QUEEN VICTORIA FROM THE CHRISTIAN KING OF SHOA.

Captain Harris, the celebrated African Nimrod and traveller, who carried an embassy from the British Government to the court of Shoa, in Southern Abyssinia, arrived in this country in the Oriental a few days since, bringing a blood mule from the royal stud, with various emblazoned shields, silver swords of office, pieces of armour, decorations for the warrior, female ornaments, costumes, peltries, and manufactures, sent as a present to Queen Victoria; together with a highly illuminated scroll in the Æthiopic language, addressed to her most gracious Majesty by the Christian King, who traces his genealogy, through a long line of ancestors, to Solomon and the Queen of Sheba. In our last issue, the Court Circular noticed the delivery of these presents at Buckingham Palace, during an audience of her Majesty, to whom, after the Privy Council, Captain Harris was presented, by the Earl of Aberdeen.

CROWN OF THE QUEEN OF SHOA.

The mule, tricked out in all its gorgeous trappings, was paraded a considerable time in the park, for the inspection of the Queen and Prince Albert; and we deem ourselves most fortunate in being thus enabled to present our readers with an accurate portrait of so rare a curiosity. "Tishal," i.e. "without any rival," was selected, we understand, from the royal stud for the especial use of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and is as docile as she is beautiful. The colour is jet black, and the legs and ears are rather those of an antelope than of a mule. No subject is permitted, in the despotic kingdom of Shoa, to possess one of the same breed; and the furniture sent with it pertains equally to royalty alone. The saddle-cloth is of scarlet and blue, richly embroidered; and the high-peaked saddle, of green and crimson leather, displays the lion of Æthiopia on a swallow-tailed flap, reaching mid-leg, so as to conceal the stirrup, which is a mere ring of sufficient dimensions to embrace the great toe of a shoeless equestrian. The head-stall, breastplate, and crupper are of correspondent colours; and a profusion of silver collars, bells, chains, and jingles, which cover the neck, complete one of the most unique caparisons we have ever beheld. The beautiful animal grazed on the cold green meadows at the sources of the Nile in February last, and has suffered nothing in appearance from her weary journey across the parched deserts of Africa.

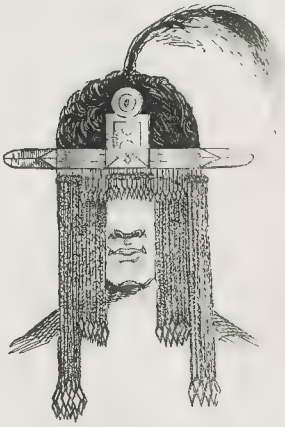
Many of the ornaments that we saw do eminent credit to the taste and invention of the savage. The Abyssinian Queen's crown—a tiara, which serves the purpose also of a veil—and a certain decoration, with a tail two yards longer than any Turkish bashaw's, which is conferred upon the warrior who has slain forty enemies with his own hand, are really perfect models in their way; and two shields, covered with devices in gold and silver, form very striking objects in the novel group. One of these latter, said to be 700 years old (for the Abyssinians would seem to deal in antiquities), has been carried by the present king, and by all his ancestors, in their numberless bloody forays. Then there are gauntlets beautifully worked, massive silver armlets and bracelets, ivory rings such as were fashionable in Egypt in days of old, spears, silver falchions, forming badges of distinction, but used in eating raw beef; and a complete set of ornaments, designed to enhance the native charms of the lady of distinction, together with magic zones, to preserve her against the influence of witchcraft!

Amongst the costumes, we were particularly struck with a tippet, or rather cloak, made of the sable fleece of an alpine sheep, the hair of which measures nearly two feet in length. There is also a robe fashioned of the spoils of a lion; and one of the hide of the black leopard, a species of the feline race which has not yet found its way into the Zoological Gardens, and which graces the shoulders of none but the governors of provinces. The ample cotton robes, decorated with broad crimson stripes, proclaim the low temperature of the country in which they are worn; and although we cannot pronounce the ladies' petticoats to be models of all that is becoming, we were delighted with the texture of the regal mantle, which speaks volumes in favour of the superiority of Abyssinian cotton, were it but placed in the hands of more skilful weavers.

Several primitive-looking baskets, variously fashioned of plaited grass, and covered with a vandyke network of party-coloured beads, were ticketed as forming a portion of the dowry of a princess. What they may have been designed to contain on such an important occasion as a royal wedding we cannot venture to surmise; but they are filled, at present, with myrrh, civet, and wild coffee, sent as specimens of the staple commodities of the rich country of Shoa. Captain Harris is said to have concluded with the King a treaty of commerce on the part of Great Britain, and, if properly acted upon, this convention ought to lead to highly important results. While we are stupidly thumping our heads against the western coast, which spurns the European with its deadly foot, others, who reap the harvest which should be our own, are fostering the traffic in human flesh in the most salubrious portion of Africa!

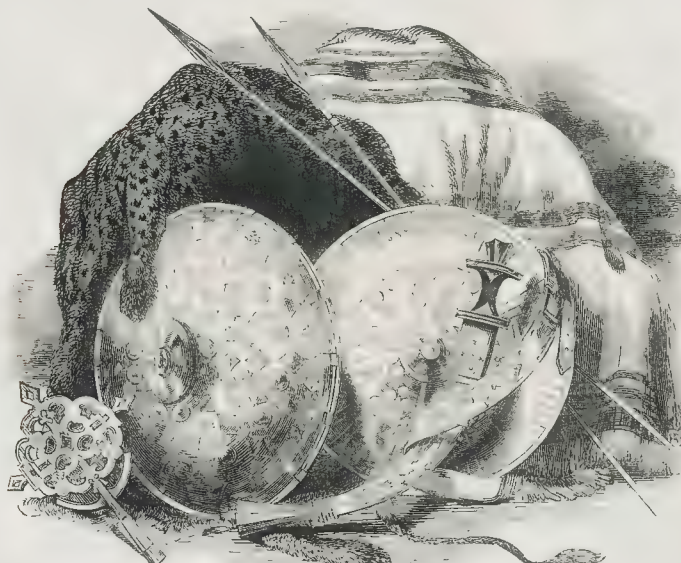
Not the least conspicuous object in the group was a monstrous tusk, hewn out of the jaws of an elephant killed by Captain Harris, in order to convince the despot to whom he had been sent, of a fact previously ridiculed alike by king and subject, namely, that one rifle-bullet would suffice to lay low the monarch of the forest. The skill displayed in the hunting field was rewarded by marks of royal approbation, such as are conferred upon the boldest warriors. The bare-footed Christian ruler of Shoa appears, in short, to have been not less adroitly measured for his shoe than was the tyrant with a long name, who figures in the frontispiece of the captain's "Wild Sports in Southern Africa;" for, so completely was the ear of the King gained, that, in spite of the pernicious influence exercised by a bigoted priesthood, his Majesty consented to the emancipation of seven thousand slaves, at British intercession, and even went so far as to liberate his own unfortunate brothers, who had for years been the pining inmates of a dungeon, not for any fault committed, but because such had been the usage of two thousand years.

The most interesting objects of the whole collection, if regarded as one from heathen Africa, undoubtedly consists in the antique-looking crosses, and other emblems of Christianity. The people of ancient Abyssinia, although barbarians in every sense of the word—who subsist almost exclusively upon raw flesh—profess the tenets of the Christian faith, and their naturally strong country is said to have afforded an asylum to a church since the beginning of the fourth century. Captain Harris, with whom we have frequently conversed, accompanied the King on several of his wild forays, when the undisciplined and barbarous soldiery fought under the sacred symbol of Christianity, like the crusaders of old, and were led to victory and to every species of atrocity by the Holy Scriptures carried before the army in a consecrated ark! On these occasions the influence of our countryman was again successfully exerted, to his lasting honour, in order to bring about the liberation of the numerous heathen captives taken in war, who had been doomed to perpetual slavery.



CROWN OF THE KING OF SHOA.

Abyssinia, although closely bordering upon the Equator, where the sun's despotism ought to equal that of the sanguinary tyrants who wield the sceptre of the land, can yet from its great elevation boast of a European verdure, an Italian sky, and an alpine climate. Fires and blankets and great coats are in demand during the greater portion of the year, and the range of the thermometer varies little during summer or winter. Captain Harris, whose works are so highly popular and attractive, is, we are informed, on the eve of coming again before the public in three volumes, devoted to Æthiopia; giving a complete history of that terra incognita, and of its isolated church, and detailing the proceedings of two years, during which the British embassy were entertained at the court of the Christian monarch. The work cannot fail to prove highly interesting, as developing a splendid country, of which no information has heretofore been acquired; and we believe that our readers will not look with diminished impatience for its appearance, from the little foretaste of the contents now afforded, and which we have contrived to glean in conversation with the gallant and gifted author.



GROUP OF ABYSSINIAN ARMS, &c.

DIPLOMATIC MOVEMENTS.—Sir Robert Gordon is on the eve of proceeding to Kongswart, where Prince Metternich is residing on his Highness's Bohemian estates, having come direct from Ischl. His Excellency Count Sebastiani, the French ambassador, will arrive at Kongswart about the same time, also to meet Prince Metternich. His Excellency Baron Canitz, the Austrian minister, leaves Verona at the end of this (August) month for Berlin, to be present at the annual military reviews in Prussia, and will also, en route, pay a visit to Prince Metternich. His Excellency Count Medem, it appears, will not take part in the conference on Spanish affairs, as his Excellency is about to leave Ischl for a tour, of pleasure it is said, in Upper Italy.

VICTORIA AT CHATEAU D'EU.

The visit of her Majesty to the Chateau d'Eu has progressed almost literally in the spirit in which we wrote of it in our last number. Our appreciation of the event has proved in all respects correct, and our forebodings of its innocent and happy character have been verified to the hearts' content of the subjects of both France and England. To ourselves it will afford the peculiar pleasure of abundant illustration upon a subject of intense public interest, and one likely to afford the highest gratification to all classes of our readers. The topic, moreover, is too cheering and rife with pleasant reflection to be hastily abandoned; and we shall make no apology for keeping it a little longer, and still in all its freshness, before the world.

The fact is, that the rendezvous of the Queen Victoria with the King of France is a very significant national adventure—we mean national as regards both countries. It has completely settled the loyal alarmists of London, and jealous politicians of Paris, by proving that confidence—by the moral march of civilization—may be justly and generously reposed between monarchs and countries whom the less trusting spirit of more tainted periods of history would not have permitted to have come into free social contact—into the happy collision of personal friendship—for any stake short of the prize of empire itself; and then only with such simulated courtesy and cold stately hospitality as would have banished truth from the meeting, and imbued it with all the insincerity of diplomatic guile. Men are by this time convinced that this modern consummation of confidence is the wisest and happiest at which to have arrived.

It is true that in England we had many serious doubters, and loyal subjects full of affectionate fears for their young Sovereign. Forgetting that Parliament had repealed the act which formerly required its sanction to the temporary absence of the Sovereign from Great Britain, even in a time of profound peace, the "doubters doubted" if Victoria was not, in accepting the friendly invitation of a neighbouring state, exerting an absolute power to violate the constitution of her own. Those who feared conjured up more dreadful visions. They did not think, as they would have done in times of old, that Louis Philippe would treat our monarch to a "surprise," and make a political captive of the flower and chief of England's rank and beauty; but they regarded with terror the revolutionary spirit of the democratic party in France, and half shuddered lest it might seize so favourable an opportunity to strike a double blow at the principle of monarchy, by hurling some fatal bolt at the French and English Sovereigns, even at the interchange of their act of friendship itself. There might be an infernal machine to undermine the happiness of the Chateau D'Eu! In France, any little jealousy that prevailed about the circumstance was purely political. It resolved itself into a fear of the fascination of the English Queen giving deceitful grace to the hidden machinations of perfidious Albion, and annihilating the promises of French commerce by a fair-extorted treaty that should strike it to the dust! Now all the classes of persons we have named are practically convinced of their error; and upon the subject of the royal visit there are now no doubts, no fears, no political jealousies, on either side of the Channel, upon which our spirited Victoria has made so animated and beautiful a trip.

The truth, as it has been elicited by facts, has proved completely in accordance with our last week's prophecy, and with the spirit of national feeling here and in France, among all the loyal, peaceable, cordial, and well-thinking of the two dominions. It is to this effect:—that a civilizing spirit has so attuned national animosities to a more friendly tone—the interchange of commerce, and the progress of learning, and the arts, have so softened political hatreds into amity and repose—that the advance of mental cultivation has so cleared away mean asperities, and harmonized the general interests of nations and societies, that monarch may visit monarch in each other's territories, in a spirit of simple neighbourly affection; that they may embrace without deceit, shake hands without treachery, and indulge the graces of friendship without a thought of their being tainted with political ambitions. And to have achieved such a condition of pure and holy trust—to have pushed the principle of human brotherhood even unto thrones; to have elevated the heart of society in its highest spheres of action—is one of the noblest moral results of advancing intelligence, and sets a seal of pride and glory upon the better philosophy of the age. This is the high religious light in which we would regard this interesting subject apart from national considerations, which involve the friendly communion of countries—the averting of bloodshed, and the Christian diarelish for war.

And who, after reading the excellent and creditable reports of the late royal meeting which have appeared in our daily journals, will say that the cordiality of France and England has not been mutually promoted and advanced? Look upon the picture. See how our dear lady Victoria has been received. With what a princely anxiety to blend the chivalrous gallantry of a former time with signs of the more sincere virtue of modern domestic feeling—of honoured friendship and affection—has the noble and venerable Louis, with his glorious family, displayed his determination to do honour to the gentle though courageous creature who responded to his generous invitation with so much honest freedom, and reposed her life—the hope and happiness of her country—with such a perfect confidence in the honour of his subjects, and the devotion they have bestowed upon his guest. It must be gratifying to us to know that the name of Victoria was never more loudly greeted than upon the shores of France. It is an epoch to record in the history of civilization.

The whole visit has been one grand gala—a continued interchange of gratification between hospitality and its guest—of good feeling between the people of the two Sovereigns—an enthusiastic burst of friendship — beautiful, overflowing, and essenced with the finest amiabilities of life. When the gallant old King led the confident happy Victoria into the bosom of his family, and presented her to his own consort, crowned with years and virtue—when that venerable Queen folded our own treasure to her bosom, and covered her, not with cold and courtly salutes, but with kisses of sympathy, in the genuine emotion of maternal love; when the rude and honest joy of the excited populace was stilled into silence for the moment, by a deep respect for the impulse which laid bare the heart of Royalty before a crowd—we ask emphatically, and the answer will come to us from the French and English people in a single breath—did not the two nations then join hands and hearts? Was there nothing symbolical of a national friendship in that beautiful personal embrace?

We have given elsewhere all the details of the Chateau d'Eu, but we cannot here resist the record of our earnest gratitude to France—her noble King and glorious people—for the honour and hospitality which our Queen has received from their generosity; and we have only to add a hope, that we may not be found backward in seeking to imitate so cheering an example when the fine old Monarch and his faithful consort shall pay their now promised visit to our longing English land.

PORTRAITS OF THE PRINCE DE JOINVILLE AND DUC D'AUMALE.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO FRANCE.

We this week present our readers with a series of picturesque illustrations of her Majesty's Marine Excursion, extending from the embarkation at Southampton to the royal squadron quitting Falmouth for the French coast. Next week we shall complete the illustration of this important event by another series of splendid and heart-stirring scenes from "Her Majesty's Visit to France," with portraits of the royal personages, the several stages of the progress, &c. In addition to the talents of our own artists, on this occasion, we have secured the able services of Mons. Morel Fatio, who has received the express commands of his Majesty Louis Philippe to execute a grand series of paintings of this important international event. Meanwhile, we annex two faithful and striking portraits of two of the illustrious Princes who were recently on a visit to this country for the special purpose of inviting our Most Gracious Queen and her amiable Consort to visit Louis Philippe, at the Chateau d'Eu.

Francois Ferdinand Philippe Louis Marie d'Orleans, Duke de Joinville, was born at Neuilly, the 14th of October, 1818. He entered the royal navy at an early age, and particularly distinguished himself at the taking of Saint Jean d'Ulloa. The young Prince, by the affability of his character, and his great nautical and literary acquirements, soon gained the love of every French sailor, but particularly those of the sailors.

In 1841, he was sent by the Government in the Belle Poule to transport to France the remains of Napoleon. Whilst on his return from St. Helena, learning that serious disputes had arisen between Lord Palmerston and M. Thiers, he made use of the following heroic remark:—"Should I be attacked, rather than strike I would blow up my vessel: the ashes of Napoleon shall never fall into the hands of the English." In 1843, the Duke was married to Donna Francisca de Branganza: the marriage ceremony took place at Rio Janeiro. The Duchess is a most amiable and accomplished lady, of a very sensitive turn of mind. It is related of her that on learning the death of her father, she opened the doors of her numerous aviaries and set all her birds at liberty, observing, "that the songs of the little warblers rent her heart asunder on a day of so much grief."

Marie Eugene Philippe d'Orleans, Duke d'Aumale, was born in Paris on the 16th of January, 1822. He entered the army as a subaltern, and was soon after sent to Algiers, where he partook of the fatigues and dangers of his countrymen. He particularly distinguished himself at the recent capture of the Smala of Abdel Kader, being then under the orders of General Changarnier. During his stay in Africa, he was present in many actions, and showed great determined bravery. The Duke may truly be considered "The beloved Child of the Army." It is said that he is about to take the command of the province of Constantine, and that ere long he will be appointed Governor-General of Algeria.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.—(From our own Correspondent.)—PARIS, Sept. 5.—The special reporters and excellent artists that you have sent to the Chateau d'Eu, will have forwarded you full and interesting details of the interview of the King of the French and the Queen of England. I shall confine my narrative to all that has taken place in Paris. The whole of the population of the capital were anxiously awaiting the arrival of the Queen; every one was desirous of assisting to render her every honour, and her visit as agreeable as possible. The National Guards prepared their best uniforms; even those who never attend review, and as seldom as possible mount guard, resolved on this occasion to be present, for none doubted that they would be reviewed. Our shopkeepers lain in the most fashionable stocks; our tailors and dressmakers were at work night and day; operas were ordered; in short, Paris was determined to be gay and brilliant. At Versailles and St. Cloud, all was movement and bustle—all were in expectation of getting a sight of England's Queen. It is generally believed that the French looked on the visit of the Queen to Paris as a pledge of a future good understanding between England and France, and felt proud of the alliance; even our journals threw aside their rancorous and unjust reproaches against the British Government, determined to lend their aid in forwarding so desirable, so important an object. Imagine then the sensation of the Parisians on learning this morning that her Majesty could not go to England without visiting Paris! I have lived long in France; I never witnessed such a disappointment! Yesterday, in every café, in every salon, on every promenade, the conversation was the Queen. "She will be received with her yacht at Havre," was the general remark, "and return to England with a high opinion of our hospitality and great desire to form a staple friendly alliance with her." To-day everybody is sad and triste, and the directions, from the highest to the lowest classes, might be heard, in doleful tones, "She is not coming." Politically speaking, the presence of the Queen in Paris would have done much good, and it is to be lamented that the opportunity is lost. Let us hope that no distant period her Majesty may be induced to honour our capital with a visit: let her be assured that her presence will tend more to consolidate in one bond two of the greatest powers in Europe, than all the diplomacy of our most eminent statesmen.

I am, my last I forwarded you an account of a seditious rising in Naples. I am now enabled to send you particulars which appear that for some time past secret societies have formed in every principal town, and that a favourable opportunity only was wanting for a general insurrection. The conspirators having, however, suspected that the Government had some suspicions of their intentions, were forced to take immediate measures; they therefore raised the report that "the French were coming to Ancona to rescue the liberals of Italy"—the country of the younger branches of noble families. The revolt was to have broken out at Naples and Bologna; but the Government, informed in time, arrested the principal conspirators, and the insurrection was confined to the brigandage system of several petty guerilla parties. The following letter will give you the latest news from Italy:—

"Bologna, Aug. 28

"It is now officially known that at the beginning of the present month a revolution was to have broken out in Naples, and to have been followed up throughout Italy. Our police, having received timely information, took the necessary precautionary measures, receiving their orders from the Cardinal Legate. The conspirators, on learning that their projects were known, retired into the mountains, pursued by our troops. The first day they succeeded in surprising one of our captains of gendarmerie and five men, whom they murdered, and then fled, to avoid our soldiers, from mountain to mountain. Their numbers have now considerably diminished. The conspirators imagining that an insurrectionary movement would have broken out in our city on the 22nd, on the occasion of a grand procession outside Porte Maggiore, approached within two miles of Bologna, and encamped near to Monte Paterno. A detachment of infantry, under the orders of a sergeant, were sent against them, but they not only perfidiously caused them to attack the conspirators, they were enabled to retire without the loss of a man. The detachment pursued them as far as Pianoro, where the insurgents are now surrounded, it is said, by our troops. On the 24th 800 of the insurgents were brought in prisoners. On the 27th, Cardinal Spinola issued a proclamation, creating a military commission for the trial of the conspirators—the verdict to be final, without appeal.

"Letters received yesterday from Rome state that the Pope, notwithstanding his great age, being 78, and having reigned 13 years, continues to enjoy the most perfect health. The Holy College is at this moment full of members, of whom six are cardinal-bishops. (Cardinal Testaferrata is dead)

"Our mines of gold are in a most flourishing condition. Of all the mines in the kingdom of cardinis, and which are to be found in the valley of Aizasca, in the province of Pallenza, the most flourishing are Meiserone, Cavero, Pezzo, Pergone, Pezzoni, and Pozzo Sepauli. The total product of these mines is about 1500lb. of gold.

"Some miscreants have been guilty in Naples of setting fire to many distinguished ladies' dresses, by throwing over them, as I do combustible matter. The Duchess of Castoletta and the Princess Candito are amongst the victims. The police is actively at work, and great hopes are entertained that the conspirators will be discovered, and receive the punishment they so justly merit."

SPAIN.—"The only new [illegible] the recognition by the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] tioned unfortunate officers, and also for the purpose of considering the propriety of sending out the Rev. Mr. Wolff to Bokhara. At two o'clock the chair was taken by Captain Grover, who opened the proceedings. He said he was of opinion that no authentic information had ever been received by the members of the Government, or any other persons, that either of the officers had been murdered. Statements were certainly sent forth, the production of some of the natives of Bokhara, which gave a very lengthened account of both gentlemen being put to death by having their heads cut off before a large concourse of spectators. Now he (Captain Grover) could show, from the letter of Dr. Wolff, that such accounts, under the circumstances, were not at all customary in Bokhara. Captain Grover next announced, at great length, the conduct of the Government, and gave a lengthened detail of the facts respecting the appointment of Colonel Abbott by the British Ambassador at Persia, for the purpose of obtaining information regarding the state of the country. After other observations the gallant Captain concluded by hoping that, as the Government had refused pecuniary assistance, the public would come forward and cause the required information to be obtained.—Mr. S. Buckingham supported a resolution for the appointment of a committee to receive subscriptions in order to have the Rev. Dr. Wolff immediately sent out. Mr. Buckingham denounced the appointment of Lord Ellenborough to the post of Governor-General, he being wholly ignorant of the affairs of the Eastern empire.—Several other gentlemen next addressed the meeting, and the resolution being put and carried, the proceedings terminated.

The steam-ship Caledonia sailed on Tuesday evening, shortly after six o'clock, and carried out 85 passengers; amongst them, Judge Halliburton, of Nova Scotia, the reputed author of "Sam Slick;" Mr. Macready, the actor; Mr. E. G. Wakefield, an American manager, and others connected with the theatrical profession.

POST-OFFICE NOTICE.—The following notice has been issued by command of the Postmaster-General:—"Her Majesty's Government having decided that Southampton shall be made the port of arrival and departure for the Peninsular, Mediterranean, Oriental, and West India mails, instead of Falmouth, the following are the arrangements which have been sanctioned, and which will come into operation on and from the 15th instant, on which day the next West India packet will be despatched from Southampton. The respective mails to be forwarded by the packets from Southampton will be made up in London, and transmitted from London to Southampton by the morning, instead of the evening mail, as at present, upon the under-mentioned days:—Several regular mails, viz., Vigo, Oporto, Lisbon, Cadiz, and Gibraltar, every Thursday. Mediterranean, viz., Malta, Greece, and the Ionian islands, the first of the month (when the first of the month falls on a Sunday, the Mediterranean and East Indian mails will be made up in London, and despatched on the previous morning), and the Thursday nearest the 15th of the month. Egypt and India, the first of the month. West Indies, the 2nd and 17th of the month (when the 2nd or 17th of the month falls on a Sunday, the West India will be made up and despatched on the following morning). The Brazilian packet will continue to be despatched from Falmouth, as at present. Letters to and from the Mediterranean and the East Indies, &c., intended to be forwarded by the direct packet, instead via Marseilles, should henceforward be addressed via Southampton.

COUNTRY NEWS.

ANDOVER.—Partridges are so very plentiful this season on the various farms around Andover, that a party of gentlemen, consisting of four in number, on the 4th instant, who arrived from London on the previous day, after traversing the grounds of Munxton, Thruxton, and Quarley, succeeded, after a few hours' shooting, in bagging seventy-five brace, besides four coveys, the latter very rare at this season of the year. Some of the coveys are remarkably strong, containing from sixteen to eighteen, including the parent birds.

BRIGHTON.—The Fearless Government steamer arrived again at Brighton on Tuesday morning from Treport, with despatches from the Queen to the Pavilion. The Fearless returned again in the course of two or three hours with letters from the Queen for her Majesty. We are happy to state that the royal children continue to enjoy uninterrupted good health.

DOVER.—The Duke of Wellington rode over from Walmer on Tuesday morning to preside at a meeting of the Harbour Board, to consider any application from the South Eastern Railway for more harbour land on which to erect two hotels at their terminus. The duke entered the town at twelve, and was received by a guard of honour of the 19th Regiment from the Castle, commanded by Colonel Jones, and under a salute from the guns at the Redoubt. His grace, after surveying the new harbour works, left about one for Walmer, with the same honours as awaited his entrance.

EAST SURREY REGISTRATION.—The days for holding the courts for the revision of the lists for this part of Surrey have been thus appointed by Mr. Fish, the barrister:—Town-hall, Reigate, Friday, September 15; Court house, Croydon, September 18; Assembly house, Kingston, September 18; the western parishes there, September 20; the Eagle, at Wandsworth, September 23; Golden Lion, Camberwell, September 28; the Workhouse at Bermondsey, September 30; Horns Tavern, Kennington, October 3. The revision is expected to be of great political interest, as each side has a vast number of objections and claims.

EXMOUTH.—The following melancholy accident occurred at this place last week. A boatman put up a sail, and a man's hat was blown off. The whole party, a man, two women, and the boatman, were overturned in the water by leaning all much on one side. One woman was drowned, and her body has not yet been found; the others were saved by some boats which went to their assistance, and rescued them with difficulty. The woman lost was a cook, and left a widow and married daughter with a large family.

HALIFAX.—DREADFUL MILL ACCIDENT.—On Friday afternoon a shocking accident occurred at the Hollins-mill, near Sowerby-bridge, through one of those dreadful machines so justly called "the child-eater." Several little girl (whose name is Harriet Bates) went to the mill to tell a widow her tea was ready, when she was caught in "the drum." The woman boldly attempted to rescue her from the horrible machine, but the child dragged herself too strong. Both of the unfortunate females were dragged within its iron teeth, from which only their lifeless bodies were afterwards rescued. So dreadfully had the merciless engine done its horrid work, that the body of the girl could not at first be found, until it was discovered literally doubled up in that of the woman.

HASTINGS.—A SAD ACCIDENT TO A CLERGYMAN.—The family of the Rev. John Pratt, of Seddlescomb, near Hastings, was on Friday last plunged into deep affliction by the untimely death of a son of the venerable gentleman, the Rev. Henry Pratt, of Wartling, Sussex. Friday being the 1st of September, the younger Mr. Pratt left home in his chaise for the purpose of enjoying a day's partridge shooting on the estates of his father at Seddlescomb, and the society catastrophe by which he was deprived of life arose from the incautious removal, on his arrival at that place, of a fowling-piece he had brought with him from the vehicle. The gun, which was already loaded, by some casualty not explained, went off, and the whole of the contents of the barrel entering the body of the unfortunate gentleman, his death was instantaneous.

HEXHAM.—A SERIOUS AFFRAY BETWEEN REAPERS.—A most distressing and fatal conflict occurred on Wednesday week amongst a band of reapers, on the Grange Farm, at Leintwardine, in the county of Hereford. It appears that a trifling dispute arose between them, and they speedily proceeded to blows, in the course of the party assaulted defended himself with his reaping-hook, and the death of one of the combatants terminated the affray, while another reaper was so dreadfully wounded that he was obliged to be assisted home. The name of the unfortunate man who was killed is John Stephens. An inquest was held on his corpse at the house of Mr. Richard Titt, of Leintwardine, before N. Lanwarne, Esq., one of the coroners for this county, when a verdict of "Manslaughter" was returned against Thos. Turner, and he was committed to take his trial at the ensuing assizes.

MACCLESFIELD.—We lament to state that on Wednesday morning last Mr. Thomas Bullock, farmer, of Gawsworth, received deadly injury from the attack of a bull, under the following circumstances:—It was about half past five in the morning, and he had just seated himself on a stool in the yard, for the purpose of milking, when the enraged animal rushed towards him. On seeing it approach he ran towards the shippon, but though the bull was three times the distance from him which his seat was from the entrance, it overtook him before he found shelter, and gored him against the wall. His screams alarmed the family, who rushed out in their night clothes to his assistance; but their efforts to rescue him were fruitless, till the infuriated animal, having left the mangled body, with a small shot, which he had broken his leg, and otherwise injured him, was driven from the premises. Before the furious animal would give up his victim it had been too late, for it had torn open his body, and deeply penetrated the lungs, leaving not the slightest hope of his recovery.

MAIDSTONE. REMARKABLE ESCAPE.—A few days since a man named Thomas, in the employ of Mr. John Thomas, landlord of the Barrow public-house, Bearsted, went in the back yard, to draw water from the well, and having let the bucket down to the depth of upwards of 100 feet, he by some means accidentally fell into the well, which is 160 feet deep. A woman who witnessed the accident immediately gave an alarm, when, to the astonishment of all, the man was found raising himself up by means of the rope, which he had succeeded in catching hold of close by the bucket. He was severely bruised and cut about the head, shoulders, and legs, and has suffered very ill from the effects of the fright, and injuries he sustained; but his escape from death is most wonderful.

SUICIDE BY DROWNING.—An inquest was held at Clare, Suffolk, on Monday, on Joseph Martin, aged 20, who was killed on Saturday while fighting with John Perry. Evidence was brought forward, which completely exonerated Perry from any blame, and which proved that Martin died from a rupture of the spleen. The jury returned a verdict, that the deceased died from a blow given him by John Perry, who was provoked into a conflict with the deceased by the conduct of the deceased himself.

WINCHESTER.—A lamentable accident occurred at Winchester on Sunday evening last. A private of the battalion of Foot Guards, a fine young man, while bathing in the meadows near the city, was suddenly seized with cramp, and drowned in sight of a number of his comrades who were on the bank. Previous to which, a drummer of the same corps fell down a steep part of St. Giles's-hill, and was taken to the County Hospital senseless and with little hope of recovery.

SCOTLAND.

EDINBURGH.—DEMISE OF THE DEAN OF GUILD.—We regret to state the demise of MR RAMSAY, the Dean of Guild, which took place a few days since. He formerly filled the office of Bailie, and his period of service (two years) as Dean of Guild would have expired in a few weeks. As a public and private man, MR. RAMSAY was generally respected, and his death will be as generally lamented.

GLASGOW.—MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE.—A respectable tradesman's family in Bridgeton, Glasgow, has been thrown into the deepest affliction by the following melancholy and unaccountable event. One of the daughters was to have been married in a few days, and the family were busied with the preparations. On Monday night they were occupied in this way, and retired to rest, all in the most cheerful spirits, with the intention of rising early in the morning to resume their labours. During the night the door was heard to open, and it was immediately found that the intended bride had left the house. Her absence occasioned great uneasiness, as there was no apparent reason for her departure at such an unseasonable hour. Her continued absence for two days gave rise to the gloomiest apprehensions. Thursday her dead body was taken out of the river, near Rutherglen Bridge. The whole affair is wrapped in mystery. The young woman was a well-disposed person; her contemplated marriage was of her own free choice, and had the sanction of the friends; and the end the other members of the family were known to show an amiable disposition towards each other.

WONDERFUL ESCAPE.—On the evening of last Tuesday a young boy, residing in Tarelo-street, Calton, rose out of bed in the night time, while in the rage of fever, and threw himself out of his room window—a height of three stories from the ground. It is somewhat remarkable that the youth, who was quite insensible during his descent, escaped with only a few slight bruises. He only "came to himself" when he had mounted the stairs and applied for admission at the door of his dwelling!

IRELAND.

At the weekly meeting of the Repeal Association in Dublin on Monday last, the rent for the week was announced to be £1097 6s. 8d.

AN AFFGHAN CHIEF IN TIPPERARY.—The Limerick Chronicle contains the following. The hoax appears to have been well played off:—"The town of Tipperary was in great commotion last Wednesday evening, a report having spread that an Affghan chief and his wife were to arrive—some said Akbbar Khan. Numbers of persons assembled, and about eight o'clock a one horse carriage was observed approaching, in which were seated the chief and his lady, dressed in full costume, and certainly nothing more beautiful and lovely could be imagined. In one minute the town was illuminated, and persons of all classes rushed into the streets. The demeanour of the chief and his lady was most courteous, but, as they unfortunately could speak no language but their own, it was impossible to carry on any communication but by signs. They signified that they had travelled an immense way, and were obliged to land on the west coast of Ireland—they were on their way to the Queen! After satisfying every curiosity that was made, as far as they could, the chief and his lady drove out of town, and, if we are informed correctly, found a warm and hospitable welcome at S——n. They left this morning on their way to London. We have not been able to ascertain the chief's name, but it is not Akbbar Khan: the dress of himself and lady was beautiful, and quite in character."

MR. GREEN, the aeronaut, made a successful ascent from the Botanic Gardens, at Belfast, on Saturday afternoon, in the presence of 4000 persons. He attained an altitude of above two miles (12,911 feet), and intended to have crossed the Channel to Cumberland; but, finding that he could not get over the water before nightfall, he descended in a field at Craigavad, not far from the seacoast.

The ball of the Royal Agricultural Society of Ireland took place, on Friday night, in the Pavilion at Belfast, and was attended by upwards of 1000 persons, the rank, fashion, and beauty of the province. Dancing was kept up with great spirit till four the next morning, and everything passed off most agreeably. Mr. Gordon was master of the ceremonies.

RICHMOND MECHANICS' INSTITUTION.

On Saturday, the anniversary of the birthday of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the first stone of a new building for this institution was laid by William Selwyn, Esq., Queen's Counsel, amidst a numerous assemblage of ladies and gentlemen of the town and neighborhood. The preparations made by the committee of management were highly creditable to them. The enclosed space, over the entrance to which was erected a rural arch covered with evergreens and flowers, was decorated with flags and banners for the occasion. A procession, which included the resident clergy, magistrates, and influential inhabitants, preceded by the children of the National School, and followed by the officers and members of the institution, met Mr. Selwyn at the entrance of the town. On reaching the enclosure an appropriate song was sung by the children. The song, to the air of the Savoy in which was inserted, in the usual way, some coins of the current year, &c. &c., was then lowered to its destined place, amidst the cheers of the meeting. A prayer was then offered up by the Rev. Edward Hoare, the curate. Mr. Selwyn next addressed the meeting, and the appropriateness of his speech, as well as the occasion, with which it was delivered, elicited the warmest applause. Mr. E. Collins then, on the part of the trustees, requested Mr. Selwyn's acceptance of the handsome silver trowel provided for the occasion.

The new building, of which we annex an engraving, is in the Italian style of architecture, and consists of a library, above 40 feet by 27 feet, and is capable of accommodating upwards of 300 persons. On each side of the theatre are rooms 20 feet by 16 feet, intended, the one for a museum, the other the library. The design is altogether the production of the architects, Messrs. Wardell and Littlewood, of Bishopsgate-street. The cost of the building is, we understand, to be defrayed by donations, and we sincerely hope that the sanguine expectations of the committee of management will be fully realised.

The stone laid by Mr. Selwyn bore the following inscriptions:—

"This stone was laid by William Selwyn, Esq., August 26, 1843. Wardell and Littlewood, architects.

"The site was the gift of her Majesty Queen Victoria, as lady of the manor."

ROYAL IRISH ART-UNION—DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

The Royal Irish Art-Union has now been in existence nearly four years; and it is gratifying to see in Ireland, where party spirit is so rife with evil, an institution like the present in the most flourishing condition. The anniversary meeting took place on the 29th ult., in the Great Theatre of the Royal Dublin Society. The interior of the building was thronged with a highly fashionable and distinguished assemblage, amongst whom the ladies were accommodated with the best seats, and appeared to take a great interest in the proceedings. Amidst those present we recognised the Lady Mayoress, Lady Blakey, Lady Talbot de Malahide, the Hon. Misses Plunket, Lord Mayor, Lord Talbot, Hon. and Rev. Dean Maude, Sir G. F. Hodson, Bart., Sir J. Kingston James, Bart, Sir William Betham, &c. &c. The beautiful prizes to be distributed were admirably arranged—the pictures on the wall, and the statuary forming attractive groups in the area. Amongst these may be seen, in our illustration, the charming statues of "The Girl Reading" and "The Girl at Prayer," by P. Macdowell; the clever groups of the "Boys and Dog" and "Boys and Goat," by T. Farrell; "The Andromeda," by Kirk, and "The Rescue," by Panormo; and "The Child at Play," by Burnet; in fact, we have seldom seen a coup d'œil more gratifying and cheering.

At one o'clock precisely, on the motion of Sir George Hodson, Bart., seconded by Walter Sweetman, Esq., the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor was called to the chair.

Mr. Stewart Blacker, the honorary secretary, then read the report, which stated that in the year 1840, this society brought £1235 to bear upon the neglected department of the fine arts in Ireland; in the succeeding year the income increased to £2330; in 1842, the public contributed their increasing confidence and approval by placing £3903 in the society's hands for the national object in view; and that this confidence has not been relaxed or approval forfeited may, we think, be fully gathered from the fact that we stand before you this day with an ascertained income of very near £5000 (cheers); making in the four years already mentioned a grand total of upwards of £12,400. Comparing it with the fourth year of the principal societies in the sister countries, the receipts stand thus:—England, 4th year, £2214; Scotland, 4th year, £3248; Ireland, 4th year, £4965; making a total for England, in four years, £4786; Scotland, in four years, £7318; Ireland, in four years, £12,433. The fund for this year has been thus apportioned:—Prizes for distribution, £2700; engravings, printing, paper, carriage, and other expenses attending same, £1600; for current expenses, £300; for premium fund, £100; making in all, £4700, which will leave about £250 for a reserve against contingencies not calculated on. (Hear, hear.)" The report then adverted to the improvement in the exhibitions, but regretted that the suggestion of the society as to moderation in prices had not been attended to by the artists—no less a sum than £14 024 being asked for the 580 works for sale this year—and besought them, for the sake of encouraging the growing taste in this country for modern art, to take the suggestion into serious consideration.

The engravings in progress for the society were then noticed. For 1841. "The Young Mendicant's Novitiate," ably engraved by S. Sangster, from the original picture by R. Rothwell.

1842. "The Peep into Futurity," by the eminent engraver, R. Golding, from Maclise's.

1843. "The Arran Fisherman," engraving by F. Bacon, from the original by Burton—all in satisfactory progress. And for 1844. It was stated that arrangements were making for a leading and popular line work, by their distinguished countryman Mulready, which elicited much applause.

After announcing the names of the artists who had gained the premiums—for Lithography, H. O'Neill and G. Du Noyez; Modelling, T. Farrell and J. Kirk, jun.; Wood-engraving, W. Walker; and Etching, R. Pilsellie, of Paris—the report noticed the plan proposed for the formation of a society having for its object a national gallery for Ireland, and recommended it strongly to the notice of the members, which called forth much applause.

After some formal business the drawing commenced. The reels on the table, the boxes were broken, and two blind boys from the Richmond Institution drew the lots for the whole society, one from the box containing all the numbers on the tickets of members, the other the numbers of the prizes. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the arrangements, and the various numbers came out very well mingled; the audience gave occasionally cheers as names were recognised. Loud cheers greeted the announcement of a prize of the statue of "The Reading Girl," by Macdowell, to his Excellency Lord de Grey; they were repeated when Lady de Grey obtained one of the casts of "The Andromeda." "Young Kirk; but the merriment of the meeting was excessive, amongst the ladies especially, when a £50 prize, entitled "Love; or Faint Heart never won Fair Lady," fell to Andrew Searle Harte, a Fellow of the College. The name of George Alexander Hamilton, Esq., M.P., was loudly cheered when he obtained "The Deserter."

The £200 prizes were as follows:—Scene on the Thames—Distant View of Erith, J. Tennant, £100; G. H. Gallagher, Ballina. Statues of the Vocal Memnon—Thebes—Sunrise, D. Roberts, £100; Wm. Fishbourne, sen., Carlow. We regret that we have not room for the entire list of prizes.

The prizes in all amounted to 236, valued at £2700, of which there were several casts from the works of the sculptors above mentioned; as also medals, in silver and in bronze, of Francis Johnston, Esq., the eminent architect, who so liberally presented the artists of Ireland with the academy house and exhibition rooms.

At the conclusion of the drawing, thanks were voted to the committee, and to the indefatigable honorary secretary, Mr. Stewart Blacker, to whom is due the credit not only of originating this institution, but of working it to its present highly promising condition.

A vote of thanks was proposed to the Lord Mayor, for the care and attention devoted by his lordship to the duties of chairman.

The meeting then separated, the fortunate prizeholders who happened to be present being the objects of much congratulation, and those who did not obtain any consoling themselves that they had at all events secured the beautiful engraving of "The Arran Fisherman's Drowned Child," by Burton.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE BOUDOIR.

LETTERS were now received almost daily by Charles. Dr. Hawtree and Major Palgrave were his constant correspondents, and although they declined to put the case in the most favourable light, they managed between them not only to explain the chief circumstances connected with Caroline and Dunbley, but to make it clear to him that his uncle's recovery was hopeless.

Before this unhappy intelligence arrived it was perfectly evident that Charles was sinking: but now that he contemplated darkly his future prospects, when Sir Gerard should be no more—seeing himself as a wretched man with all his prospects blasted, a prisoner without the power to struggle for advancement—his spirit was utterly broken, and he sunk at once into despair.

Lucrece—whom he now loved more tenderly than ever, and whom he viewed as his only angel indeed—saw the lamentable change which the cruel intelligence had produced with alarm; although her heart was wounded to the core at the thought of losing him whom she adored, she failed not to make every effort in her power to cheer him. Often while contemplating her beautiful face would he clasp the worst position in her arms, and exclaim in despair and pleasure, and make it, in imagination, seem with happiness. She could not, however, effectually rouse him. He would on those occasions embrace her with the most ardent affection, and promise to look at the bright side of things; but he soon relapsed into his former state: his mind clouded the brightness of every prospect: in his view it soon became dim.

Charles attended as much as possible at Lucrece's house, when she did not please if he was not present, invariably refused to accept any invitation unless she were accompanied by him. On one occasion, however, having promised to go to a soirée of Colonel Richardson, one of his fellow prisoners whom he highly esteemed, and feeling when the evening arrived unusually depressed, he succeeded in persuading upon her, as she knew the Colonel's lady exceedingly well, to go alone. Lucrece yielded of course, solely for his sake—knowing his anxiety to pay the Colonel as possible respect—and went to the soirée, and during her absence Fred. brought a piece of escape, which could not, he felt certain, fail.

"Now," said he, having explained the broad outline of the plan, to which Charles most attentively listened, "what is your opinion of it? Do you think that it is not only practicable but easy to be accomplished?"

"Certainly," replied Charles, "the plan itself is excellent: your escape by such means would be almost certain: but have you forgotten that you are now on parole?"

"I have not; but allow me to argue that point for a moment. Honour, of course, ought to be held sacred: that's admitted."

"And, being admitted, there the matter ends."

"Nay, but what description of honour is that which binds me to this accursed place?"

"That which ought to keep you within the walls of the darkest dungeon, if by virtue of the pledge the door were opened to admit light and air."

"But you have not look at the matter too strictly."

"Have you not pledged your honour that you will not attempt to escape?"

"Certainly I have, and I cannot escape without violating that pledge: nor in any other case would I dream of escaping; but look at the position of poor Alice! a young and lovely female, who has sacrificed everything for my sake, who is mining in consequence of me into the grave with her fondest hopes withered, and her reason impaired. Charles, it amounts but to this—I must either break that pledge, or break her heart; either must I sacrifice my honour or lose Alice."

At this moment Lucrece unexpectedly returned, and entered the room so gaily that they were not aware.

"So soon returned," he exclaimed as he embraced her.

"Have I returned too soon?" she inquired. "How I broken in upon one of your clavering reveries? Did you anticipate the pleasure of brooding over wretchedness the whole of the evening?"

"My dear Lucrece," said Charles, gazing at her with an expression of surprise; "but tell me, love, why have you returned so soon?"

"Would it be displeasing if I did not tell you?" What if I were now to say, 'Charles! be reconciled' for here you must remain?"

Fast in the mind of a man in despair a single germ of sacred hope, and instantly rich crops of blessings spring and wave and bloom—to be indeed too often blighted!—still, let the germ but once strike root, and the imagination seems with joy.

Lucrece! exclaimed Charles, suddenly starting. "These words from you—and with a smile!"

"Charles I dear Charles," cried Lucrece, as she fell upon his neck, and gave vent to her tears, "I am so happy! We shall all be happy soon. But," she added, with an effort to control her emotion, "it is cruel to keep you so long in suspense."

"It is the war at an end?" cried Fred.

"No, dear; but listen—on entering the principal room this evening I was presented by the Colonel to an extremely handsome person whose name I understood to be Barrington, and with whom I exchanged a few unimportant remarks, and passed on; but soon after the—leaving in the interim made certain inquiries of the Colonel he approached me again, and at once spoke of "Renaharnois!" said Charles, "I never heard of him."

"Nor had I before heard of you. The Colonel, it appears, informed him of your position, and also of your being extremely ill in consequence of some severe domestic affliction. Well, having expressed his regret at what he had heard, he encouraged me to enter into a full explanation. I did so, and then he proceeded to dwell upon the kindness of the Emperor, and to assure me that if the case were known to him, we should be released forthwith. I leave Charles, emphatically adding that if I and my brother were to proceed to Paris, present a petition to the Emperor embodying all the facts, and support that petition by an appeal to him in person, he would state his life upon the result. I could have blessed him! Oh! Charles, what were my feelings at that moment! My heart was filled with gratitude and joy, and although he would scarcely allow me to thank him, he must have seen that I was grateful indeed."

"But, how can I go to Paris?" cried Fred. "And how is the interview with Napoleon to be obtained?"

"Here are two letters," replied Lucrece, "which he kindly wrote at once, that there might be no delay: this will secure special permission for you to accompany me, and by virtue of this the interview will be obtained."

"Excellent!" exclaimed Fred., in rapture: but the spirit of Charles had sunk again: he was thoughtful and silent.

"My dear!" said Lucrece, "you do not appear to be much elated by this happy new"

"I am not, my dear girl, in that quarter I have not the slightest hope."

"Nor would you have," said Fred., "if even this Renaharnois were to stake his life on the result."

"Who is he?"

"I was too anxious, my dear, to return to you," replied Lucrece, "to make any minute inquiries about him, but the Colonel assured me that he was a person of great influence."

"And that is sufficient," cried Fred., "is it not?"

"No," returned Charles, "he may be one of those pernicious fools who boast their influence, but have none, and the result of your journey to the capital may be the proof that he is nothing more."

"But will not his influence be tested before we start?"

"How can it be tested?"

"For Heaven's sake, do not perpetually look at the black side of everything thus. If this letter—which I shall take as early as possible in the morning—obtain special permission for me to accompany Lucrece, will not his influence by that alone be sufficiently proved?"

"It may have enough influence for that; but the other is a very, very different matter."

"Dear Charles," said Lucrece, "be assured of success. I have heard that the Emperor is easily accessible, but, whether it be so or not, I feel sure that the letter will have great weight. Come, dear, at least, have hope!—say, believe at once that we shall succeed. If the Emperor have the heart of a man, I feel that I shall not appeal to him in vain."

"Do not be too sanguine, Lucrece; reflect upon the tyrannous character of the man! at all events, do not be too sanguine."

"Well, what time to-morrow shall we start?" said Fred.

"Why, if you go at all—"

"If we go at all! Charles, Charles! However, if we go and are to start without delay, the petition must be drawn up to-night: therefore, let us at once set about it."

"We can't do it," said Charles, "we must employ some lawyer, and have it drawn up in due form, and engrossed."

"Will that be necessary?"

"Charles, my dear," said Lucrece, "will you leave the management of the matter in my hands? I have not generally much confidence in my own judgment, Charles, but in this case I have the very highest. I will draw the petition! It should not, I submit, come from you, but from me. It should be in reality my petition—couched in my own language, and written in my own hand; and I feel that the more simple the language the more effect it will have."

"An excellent thought, Lucrece," cried Fred.—"the very thing!"

"That will be better, certainly," said Charles, "much better: yes, I think that that might perhaps have some effect."

"I am sure that it will—quite sure," said Lucrece, "and therefore, I'll leave you—for I must be alone—and set to work upon it once."

She then retired, and was absent for nearly two hours, during which she drew a sketch of the petition, embodying all the facts in the most touching strain, and combining with an appeal to the feelings of the Emperor, which she believed could not fail to reach his heart. Having finished the sketch she submitted it to Charles, who, much to her satisfaction, shed tears while he read it. It was then given to Fred., who on reading it wept also, and thereby confirmed the conviction of Lucrece, that the Emperor himself would be moved.

"Admirable!" exclaimed Fred. "Admirable indeed."

"Thus, remember, is but a sketch," said Lucrece. "I want you now to suggest improvements."

"That will be impossible," said Charles. "No, my dear, let it go just as it is: do not alter a word."

"If he be insensible to that," cried Fred., "he's a fiend! Now, let me make a fair copy, Lucrece."

"It had better, I think, be in my own handwriting."

"But you must, my dear," said Charles, "feel dreadfully fatigued."

"Oh, not in the slightest degree. Dear Charles," she added, as the tears gushed forth, "how can I feel fatigued!"

He embraced her fondly, and blessed her with fervour; and having pictured the delight of which the power to communicate to him the intelligence of his being free would be productive, she resumed her task with an expression of joy

"Now," said Fred., "let us have a bottle of champagne, and drink success to our enterprise, like Englishmen full of hope!"

Charles summoned the servant, and the champagne was quickly produced, when the toast was formally proposed by Fred., who included the health of Beauharnois.

A long conversation having reference to the position of Beauharnois then ensued; and as this was naturally led to the character of Napoleon, and the assumed probability of his listening to the appeal, they continued to converse until Lucrece produced the petition, which she had written in a beautifully legible hand, when it was read again both by Charles and Fred., who were then more ardent than before in their expressions of admiration, and soon after that, at the suggestion of Lucrece, it being then past midnight, they retired.

In the morning, albeit they had scarcely closed their eyes, they had an unusually early breakfast, and immediately afterwards Fred., having begged of Lucrece to be in readiness on his return, proceeded to the office of the functionary to whom the letter was addressed, and who, to his unutterable delight, at once gave him the necessary order to pass.

"Now," he exclaimed, displaying the order on his return, "now, what think you of the influence of Beauharnois?"

"He certainly," replied Charles, "appears to have some influence."

"It was given to me in a moment!—without the slightest interrogation—almost without a word."

Lucrece then announced herself ready to start, and as Fred., on his way back, had ordered a carriage to be brought to the door, with all possible despatch they prepared to take leave.

"My dear Lucrece," said Charles, taking her aside, "in speaking to the Emperor, use nature's eloquence: do not task your memory: speak from the heart, and may Heaven firmly nerve your utterance."

"Fear not, dear Charles," replied Lucrece, "I feel that, in pleading such a cause, I shall be firm."

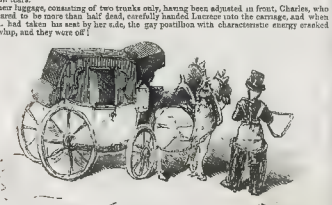
"And if you be, you will not plead in vain."

"Oh! Charles, how happy I am to find that you think so!"

"Bless you, Lucrece!—God bless you!"

The lumbering carriage—which seemed to have been built at least a century, and which evidently had not been cleaned within the memory of any living man, drawn by heavy cart horses by virtue of ropes, and guarded by a gaudily-dressed postilion half buried in his boots—then appeared at the door, and as Fred., who was standing impatiently at one of the windows, announced it on the instant, Lucrece and Charles embraced each other in silence and in tears.

Their luggage, consisting of two trunks only, having been adjusted in front, Charles, who appeared to be more than half dead, carefully handed Lucrece into the carriage, and when Fred. had taken his seat by her side, the gay postilion with characteristic energy cracked his whip, and they were off!



MARLBOROUGH COLLEGIATE SCHOOL.

This institution, for the education of the sons of clergymen and others, originated in a letter addressed to the Archbishop of Canterbury; the committee first appointed to carry out the plan having been materially assisted by the co-operation of the noblemen, clergy, and gentry connected with the county of Wilts and the adjoining counties, as also with the counties of Oxford, Devon, and Cornwall. The distinctive features of the plan are:—Providing the best possible education and maintenance at cost price; constant superintendence and sound theological teaching, according to the doctrines and formularies of the Established Church; watchful care over the morals of the boys, as well as over their education; and admission to the privileges of the school by means of nomination only. The establishment has been planned for 200 boys (to be increased hereafter, if required, to a number not exceeding 500), of whom two-thirds shall be the sons of clergymen, and one-third the sons of laymen. The right of nomination is acquired by donations towards the general fund, to be appropriated to the providing and maintaining of buildings and accommodations, furniture, and articles of outfits; and the residue to the foundation of exhibitions at the universities, or for annual allowances for fixed periods, upon entering either of the professions of law or medicine, to be open to the whole school, and distributed according to merit. The institution is managed by a council, consisting of the Lord Bishop of Salisbury, as president; the bishops of England and Wales, as vice-presidents; together with trustees, treasurers, and life governors, of whom one-half are clergymen: the Archbishop of Canterbury is visitor.

MARLBOROUGH COLLEGIATE SCHOOL.

The preliminary arrangements being completed, the institution have located themselves in the noble mansion represented in our engraving; and which, in the early part of the last century, was the residence of the Marquis of Hertford; in later times, it has been better known as the Castle Hotel; and has just been fitted up to accommodate 200 scholars. The situation, immediately adjoining the town of Marlborough, is very desirable, especially to the south-western counties. The mansion, of which the engraving shows the south front, with St. Peter's Church to the right, is a massive red brick edifice, consisting of a centre and two wings, with a terrace walk, and very fine trees and shrubs. In the rear, or north front, are spacious grass-plots, and a covered play-ground; and the extensive offices have been converted into a school and class rooms.

We are happy to add that the school was opened on the 26th ult., with 200 scholars, the full number intended to be received at first. As became the importance of the occasion, the president, the Bishop of the diocese, accompanied by the Marquis of Aylesbury, the Mayor and Corporation of Marlborough, the Rev. Sir Erasmus Williams, Bart., Rector of St. Peter's, several members of the school council, viz.: the Earl of Eldon, the Venerable Archdeacon Berens, the Rev. G. H. Bowers, the Rev. J. G. Brett, Robert Few, Esq., Sir Stephen Glynne, Bart., M.P., the Rev. R. Gorton, Christopher Hodgson, Esq., the Rev. B. Harrison, F. A. M'Geachy, Esq., M.P., Joseph Neeld, Esq., M.P., the Rev. C. E. Plater, T. H. S. Sotheron, Esq., M.P., the Rev. John Ward; the auditors, John Shepherd, Esq., William Pott, Esq.; and the masters and scholars of the foundation, went in procession to St. Peter's Church, where, after divine service, the Bishop of Salisbury preached a most eloquent and admirable sermon, explanatory of the great and important objects such an institution is calculated to attain, if based, as all education must be to ensure success in its results, on the sure foundation of the Christian religion.

A more important movement in the cause of education has scarcely occurred in these times; it will give to that large and influential body of men, the clergy of the country, the means of providing for their children that measure of classical instruction which before could only be obtained in our great public schools; but at an expense which entailed upon them far greater sacrifices than in many instances their limited incomes rendered prudent or even justifiable. The same education is also offered to the sons of laymen at a comparatively small expense.

The establishment consists of a master and five assistants (besides masters for modern languages and drawing), who are to instruct the scholars in classical and mathematical literature, so as to qualify them either for admission into the universities, or for any profession their parents might design.

The arrangements for the domestic comforts of the boys, and for discipline and superintendence on the part of the masters, have been carried out to the admiration and satisfaction of those parents and friends who accompanied the pupils on the days of their admission; as well as of those noblemen and gentlemen who visited every part of the buildings and grounds on the day of opening.

The good feeling of the inhabitants of Marlborough was testified by inviting the council to a public dinner on that day, at which the mayor presided. The speeches delivered on the occasion by the Bishop of Salisbury, the Earl of Eldon, and F. A. M'Geachy, Esq., M.P., were listened to with the greatest attention.

THE EARL OF ROSSE'S GREAT TELESCOPE, AT PARSONSTOWN.

The annexed series of engravings illustrates the history of one of the greatest scientific triumphs of our time—the construction of the LARGEST TELESCOPE IN THE WORLD, by the Earl of Rosse, at his residence, Parsons-town Castle, in King's County Ireland, about 87 English miles from Dublin. Of his lordship's able presidency at the recent meeting of the British Association, at Cork, we spoke in our last number; where, also, our readers were promised the very interesting illustrations we now introduce to their notice.

A pleasant history might be written of Parsonstown castle; the changes it has been subject to since the time of the O'Carrols, its original possessors, being not a few. In 1642, it was besieged by the Irish, and relieved by Sir Charles Coote; in 1643, it was taken by General Preston; in 1648, it was attacked by O'Neile; in 1650, it was taken by General Ireton from the Irish, who, for some time, had possession of it; in 1688, Sir Laurence Parsons was besieged in it by Oxburgh, and it was garrisoned by his so diers for some time afterwards; after the defeat of King James, Sir Laurence was again established in the castle, which was again besieged by Barsfield, &c. &c. The present appearance was given to it some years ago, after it had been severely damaged by fire. These actions and events might be made interesting to our readers; but we are sure we shall meet their wishes more fully by attending, for the present, to the scientific pursuits of its possessor. His lordship has gained for himself a name of much celebrity; his high talents are combined with great perseverance, and both are happily guided by sound good sense. He seems to love science for its own sake, and, unprompted by any desire for applause, he has been working silently and for himself, until the magnitude of the results have forced themselves on the notice of the world. He has particularly distinguished himself by attaining an end, which has been for a long time a desideratum to scientific men—the production of large metallic reflectors. Until he accomplished the casting of his speculum, six feet in diameter, it was thought to be impossible; and the difficulties and obstacles he met with in the prosecution of his object, would have deterred a smaller mind. For the last ten or twelve years there has been erected on his lawn, a reflecting telescope, made by himself (a view of which we give), the concave speculum of which is 3 feet in diameter, and whose focal length is 27 feet. It is elevated and depressed with the greatest ease, being accurately balanced by heavy weights over pulleys; and it is turned to any part of the heavens by means of wheels running on a graduated iron circle, fixed in the ground. The casting, grinding, and polishing of this speculum, and the machinery of the tube, and its suspension, were all accomplished under his lordship's eye, and by his own direction. We give a view of the exterior of his workshop, and of the house where, by help of a steam-engine, all the processes connected with the producing of the speculum were performed. It will be interesting to know more exactly what are the operations carried on in this laboratory. We will attempt a description, necessarily very brief, and as much on the surface as possible: a more scientific and elaborate one will no doubt be soon given to the world in its proper place. A detail of the several steps taken in the making of the large speculum will suffice for our purpose.

Lord Rosse has discovered that the only metals which should be employed in forming speculum metal are copper and tin, and that the proportion should be, copper 88 9 to to 126·4. Of these metals, for his large speculum he melted three tons, in three cast iron crucibles. In his first trial to melt the metal, he found that the weight was so great that it insinuated itself into the heated crucible, and oozed through it at the bottom. To remedy this, his lordship had crucibles cast with their faces upwards. Crucibles are always cast with the bottoms up; and so, the air rising, makes these parts porous, and caused the oozing of the metal. The plan he adopted of getting them cast face upward—allowed the air to lodge at the top; and he completely succeeded in his next attempt. Having sunk in the ground three large furnaces, each about 4 feet in diameter, and 6 feet deep, and connected with a chimney about 19 feet high, and four feet broad, tapering slightly to the top, he heated them with turf fires, which he preferred to coal.

PARSONSTOWN CASTLE, THE SEAT OF THE EARL OF ROSSE.

One crucible, holding one ton of metal, was placed in each, and for 19 hours was subjected to an intense heat. The shape on which the metal was to be cast being made ready, and three sleepers being rightly placed to receive the crucibles, they were lifted, by means of an immense crane, from their furnaces; and at nine o'clock on the evening of the 13th of April, 1842, without accident or delay, they simultaneously poured forth their glowing contents—a burning mass of fluid matter, hissing, heaving, pitching itself about for a minute, and then calmly settling into a monument of man's industry for ever. There were a great many witnesses of this scene, and not one can forget the entire composure of Lord Rosse's manner. While every other person seemed anxious and fearful, he directed the men as collectedly and easily as if it was one of the most ordinary occurrences of life; and his only answer to the many proffered suggestions of the by-standers was, "There's no fear—there's no hurry." When the metal had settled, it was drawn by a capstan into a heated oven, and built in, where it remained for sixteen weeks, annealing. The great difficulty experienced in producing large reflectors is, that in cooling the metal generally cracks; and when this does not occur, the number of holes often found in the solid mass renders it of no use. Lord Rosse has the merit of overcoming completely both these obstacles. The plan usually adopted in casting is to make the shape in sand; this substance, however, in his lordship's experiments, allowed the under portions of the metal to remain heated as long as the upper, and both surfaces setting together, left the central portions the last to cool, which thereby caused warping and cracking in the speculum. Lord Rosse thought that if the metal was cast in a shape of iron, its high conducting power would cool the under surface rapidly, and that the cooling would extend itself gradually to the top. This he found, on trial, to be the case; but the air and gas that is always mixed with the fluid metal not having the porous sand to allow its escape, rose through and filled with holes the speculum, and consequently destroyed it. The problem now was to find some substance of sufficiently high conducting power to cause rapid cooling; but, at the same time, sufficiently porous to allow the escape of air when the metal was poured on it. In a happy moment the noble mechanic solved it. He thought that by binding together layers of hoop-iron, and turning the requisite shape on them edgewise, that the interstices would be too small to let the metal pass, and large enough to give the air exit. The existence of the six-foot speculum is a magnificent proof of the truth of the calculation. Nothing could have answered more fully. We should be proud to think that the greatest scientific triumph was not the creation of a happy chance, but the result of reason.

The speculum being cast, was left for sixteen weeks in the annealing oven; and we may well envy, but can scarcely imagine, the feelings of its maker when, on removal, it was found without spot or blemish. The surface had now to be ground and polished. The figure required for the surface of a reflecting speculum is that of a parabola. There is, in general, very great difficulty in producing this curve; and it has been such a terror to opticians that few can be found willing to undertake a speculum of larger diameter than six or eight inches. However, Lord Rosse, by a combination of motions, both of the speculum and polishing tool, easily produced the desired effect. The speculum was placed in water, and turned round by the steam-engine, while the polisher had a horizontal motion given by the same means: these two motions were the most apparent, but there were others, into the consideration of which we could not enter sufficiently briefly. The grinding-tool was made of iron, turned to the required shape in his lordship's workshop; it was then cut by grooves into octagonal-shaped pieces on the surface, and holes bored through it in different places, to allow sand and water to run from the upper surface between it and the speculum: the supply of sand and water was constantly kept up. The entire weight of the grinder was not allowed to rest on the speculum; it was partly counterpoised by a weight hung to an attached lever. It required six weeks to grind it to a fair surface. The polishing generally requires only six hours. The same tool that grinds it is, for the purpose of polishing, covered over with pitch, on which crocus is spread: nothing else is necessary. The division of the tool into small parts on the surface by grooves is requisite for producing a good shape. If an even surface of pitch were used, the heat that is produced by the friction making the pitch soft, it would accumulate in some places more than others, and so destroy the right shape; but, when the surface is divided into those small portions, the pitch cannot be pushed to any distance from its original position, and, of course, the surface must be constantly true.

In the view of the tower of the workshop there is seen a long pole running up from the top. On the summit of this is a little crossbar, to which is attached a small dial of a watch. It is directly under this that the speculum is polished. The body of the tower serves as a tube, and the dial is reflected in the speculum below; the polishing is continued until the picture produced is absolutely perfect. When this process is finished, the speculum is ready for the tube; and such a tube as is prepared for it: a company of soldiers might go through their manœuvres in it. It is 59 feet long, and 7 in diameter. It was built in a long gallery, over a range of outhouses, and this had to be thrown down to take the leviathan away. It is made of wood, and hooped with iron. The mechanism by which it is to be suspended and moved is the result of deep calculation, and is not the least meritorious of Lord Rosse's works. When we see this enormous instrument moved about and regulated by one man's arm, and placed in its position with more ease and certainty than a hand instrument can be, he will then appreciate the plan and the mind that conceived it. We could not at all enter into a detailed account of the several pieces of the machinery: they would require a diligent study. The chief means employed is a large cast-iron hinge, which is attached to the bottom of the tube, and which allows it either to be elevated or depressed, or turned from side to side. This hinge will be supported on and fixed into solid masonwork in the ground, and will keep one end of the tube stationary. The walls which support the machinery—a sketch of one of which we give—are built exactly in the meridional line, so that the telescope, which will lie between them, will only take in objects as they pass this line. They can be kept in the field of view for half an hour on each side of the meridian. The speculum is 6 feet in diameter, with a focal distance of 53 feet; its power of magnifying may be judged of by the fact that a portion of the moon, the size of a common house, will be visible. Before being placed in the tube it will be fastened to what is called an equilibrium bed, a support made of triangular pieces of iron which have a motion among themselves, and be so disposed that they will adapt themselves to every change of state of the speculum produced by variation of temperature and other causes, and so prevent warping and its consequences. The iron pieces are to be lined with frieze and pitch.

We have been tempted into a longer paper than we at first anticipated, and still we have left a great deal unsaid. We could with pleasure have given a more detailed account of his lordship's labours—of his difficulties and successes in overcoming them. We would like to speak of his first speculum, made in pieces, and attached to a compound metal of zinc and copper, in proportion exactly suited to the contractions of itself. We had much to say concerning the magnificent instrument at present in use, only to be eclipsed by the coming colossus, and to describe his lordship's workshop with its thousand contrivances; but these things would fill a volume, and would be obviously ill adapted to a place like this. But we hope we have said enough to raise sufficient curiosity on the subject to excite a wish for more: and we can fairly promise that a visit to the noble lord's demesne will amply repay any trouble attendant on it. When we were there, we were astonished and amazed at the magnitude of the large instrument, and were lost in wonder when we thought of the results likely to be the consequence of its successful use. But we confess we were more pleased with examining an equatorial instrument—which his lordship has also erected: it is eighteen inches in diameter, the largest ever made, and, by its peculiar mechanism, the truest ever used. Sir James South laid out £7000 on erecting one, and had to break it up afterwards because it did not answer. Lord Rosse has been entirely successful. This instrument alone is a wonderful piece of work; but, taken in connexion with all the rest, it is truly marvellous how much and how well one man has done. When we sat down to this paper, we were determined that not one word of eulogium would we pass on Lord Rosse, as he needs no panegyric from us; but the mind should be dead to feeling and to justice, if it could contemplate the vastness of an intellect like his, and withhold its tribute of applause. We are proud to say he is our countryman, for we feel that the works which have placed him at the head of all the mechanicians in the world will, with his great powers, enable him to be the first astronomer in existence; and we offer him our most hearty congratulations on the success that has hitherto attended him.

Lord Rosse's pleasure-grounds are most elegantly and tastefully laid out. A large lake has been lately added to the other beauties of the place, and has given his lordship an opportunity of trying his skill as an engineer; the water for the lake being supplied from a distant part of a river which runs through the demesne. As the bed of the river was low near where the lake was intended to be, an aqueduct was cut communicating with the river high up its source, and when it was brought to the required elevation, a tunnel was sunk under the original bed of the river, and thus one stream runs over the other, both supplied by the same source. The tunnel answers its purpose completely. There is also a wire bridge of light and elegant appearance, suspended over the river close to the castle, which is likewise the produce of his lordship's workshop.

It would be an injustice to the Countess of Rosse were this short notice of the demesne concluded without acknowledging the debt the people of Parsonstown owe to her. She has with most exquisite taste improved and made delightful the grounds about the castle, and freely opens them for their accommodation. She has made the town the residence of all who can command the means, and the envy of those who cannot. She has raised the tone of its society; but she has done what reflects much more credit on her mind: she has taken the most lively interest in the poor, and is constantly improving and changing in order to afford them work. The lake was commenced solely to give them employment, and, since then, hundreds have been daily hired to do what but for beneficence might well remain undone. The consequence of this conduct is, that she is universally esteemed and looked up to, and that her town is almost entirely free from the discontent and distress that is so rife in other places. The people are quiet and contented, and well disposed, and are as much indebted to the good sense that produced all this as the world is to the talent that has astonished and is so likely to benefit it.

The town of Birr, or Parsonstown, is the prettiest inland town in Ireland. There are more private fami lies live here than in any other town of the same size. There are public libraries and a mechanics' institute; first rate markets, and everything that money can purchase. In fact, we think the town likely to progress rapidly, and we wish it God speed.

 HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO FRANCE.—We have the pleasure to announce that our series of Drawings of the above interesting event are complete. We have the combined talent of English and French artists. Amongst the variety of sketches, we have several by the celebrated Mons. Morel Fatio, who has received the express commands of his Majesty Louis Philippe, to execute paintings of this great event. We are obliged to defer these engravings until next week, having already devoted so much space to her Majesty's excursion.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1843.

The locality of Knightsbridge, near the barracks, has been the scene of a disgraceful conflict between the military and the police. There have been two statements of the affair, each exceedingly contradictory of the other. One, the first published, and taking in rather a strong spirit the part of the civilians against the military, proclaims a horrible outrage committed by the latter. It states that some drunken soldiers entered the room of a public-house in the neighbourhood where some peaceful citizens were taking refreshment, and at once provoked indignation by wantonly insulting a modest female, then in quiet companionship with a respectable young mechanic or tradesman to whom she was engaged. Blows shortly ensued, and in a general melée of disorder and riot, in which the chairs and tables were broken up for weapons, the house was at last cleared of the soldiers, who then roused their comrades from their barracks. These rushed to their assistance in numbers, armed, and only half dressed, and, going back to the house, where a mob had now collected, plunged into a general riot of a most violent kind, cutting and wounding those about, and maintaining so serious a conflict that the guard were at last turned out to march the soldiers back into their barracks, and so terminate a very dangerous affair. It was particularly mentioned that one woman was carried into an hospital with her head cut open, and was lying at the point of death. This is the first statement; but since its appearance a letter has been found its way into the Times from the pen of a "Private in the Blues," so well written that, if he be a "private," he must either be superior to his class, or the Blues are a very educated regiment. It gives a very different colour to the whole affair, and we present it to our readers with very trifling abbreviation. The "Private" writes thus:—

It is a well-known fact, sir, that there is in the neighbourhood of Knightsbridge a group of the most daring and ruffianly characters, known by the name of the "Forty Thieves," who are, and have been for several years past, the terror of the inhabitants of Knightsbridge: they live entirely by plunder, and their nefarious doings are well known to the police. They meet at the public-house called the King's Head, which is a sort of concert-room, and is filled almost to suffocation by this gang and their pals, as they style them, with here and there a sprinkling of respectable tradesmen. Whenever an opportunity occurs they pick a quarrel, a sort of fight is got up, and then robberies of the most barefaced nature are perpetrated on the respectable portion of the room. Both the Blues and the Life Guards when at Knightsbridge have several times been obliged to interfere to protect people from being plundered, and in consequence have incurred the enmity and vengeance of these ruffians. Some of the "Blues" use the house, which is, till between nine and ten o'clock, tolerably well conducted; but about that time the gang begins to arrive; at ten the soldiers are obliged to be in barracks, and after that hour the most scandalous outrages are committed, and several soldiers who have been unfortunate enough to be alone have been shamefully maltreated. The shopkeepers in the neighbourhood, to their great injury, are obliged to close much earlier than is convenient to them, owing to the outrageous behaviour of these blackguards.

On Friday night two or three privates of the Blues were at the public-house in question, and several insulting expressions were made use of respecting soldiers, of which no notice was taken. One of the men got up to leave the room, when a fellow, surrounded by others, exclaimed, "These — soldiers are off, now we shall have more room." The soldier quietly turned round and inquired the reason of the insult, and received for answer a still more insulting expression. Some more words ensued, which ended in a fight; this was the signal for a general attack by the whole party on the soldiers, who were severely injured, the scoundrels breaking the legs from a table to beat them with. Several of the regiment in the street, who were going into barracks, hearing the noise, rushed up stairs, and with great difficulty rescued their comrades, and brought them into barracks, followed by the mob, whose yells were terrific; and, being foiled in their prey, commenced breaking the windows of the barracks.

The comrades of the man who was most hurt felt greatly excited, and several of them got over the wall, and proceeded to the King's Head, with the intention of clearing the house of the desperate gang that so long infested it, in the execution of which they experienced considerable difficulty, the mob having a superiority of numbers, being joined by several of the lowest characters in the neighbourhood, armed with every description of weapon they could obtain. Being directly opposite the barrack-gates, the noise attracted the attention of the guard, who were implored by several respectable inhabitants to turn out, and put an end to the fray. The guard at last turned out to bring in the men, but not, as your reporter states, armed; not a man was allowed to take his arms; the guard were immediately pounced upon, and several were severely hurt. The men in the rooms facing the Knightsbridge-road, who had retired to rest, hearing the noise, got up, and seeing from the windows that the guard and a number of their comrades were being ill-used, they very naturally rushed to the barrack-gates with the determination of rescuing them, but they were not allowed to go out, until all hope of the disturbance being over, without their aid, and then the guard was given up. They then went out and cleared the road, and every man came peaceably into barracks, but not one of them was armed with either sword or pistol. As far as the latter are concerned, we have not one in the regiment, they having been cast a twelvemonth ago. I will not deny that during the confusion two or three innocent persons might have been struck, but it was not wilfully done; in disturbances of this nature it is almost impossible to avoid it. The men were much excited at witnessing the ill-usage of their comrades, and would not any community or family have expressed the same praiseworthy feeling with regard to one of its members? That it was an attack on the people of Knightsbridge is a complete falsehood, as many of the inhabitants fled to the barracks for protection from the violence of the mob, and have expressed their admiration of, and gratitude to, the men for their conduct.

Now, we have drawn attention to this subject for the purpose of "inquiring why there has been no inquiry." First, we want to know, admitting the truth of either story, where were the police before the outrage began to assume its desperate aspect, and when their presence would have made the whole affair a matter for civil jurisdiction? Next, if there be a woman lying at the point of death in an hospital of a sabre wound, why nobody is brought for a magistrate—why no warrants are issued, no civil authority displayed, no step taken for public satisfaction? Thirdly, is there any military inquisition going on; and, if so, why the public are not made cognizant of it? If the military committed the outrage, if the first statement be true, clearly they should at once be made amenable to civil justice, otherwise a cause is left open in the locality of the excitement why the civilian should execrate the soldier. On the other hand, if Knightsbridge be the den of the "forty thieves well known to the police," and the terror and disgrace of the neighbourhood, that is a matter which speaks little for the vigilance of the civil force, and requires to be looked to also. Again, it is not meet that soldiers should be held dressed, and, after barrack hours, in a mob conflict, or that a guard should be turned out to bring them in without a seemly military investigation succeeding such an event. In any case, and whatever story be true, the matter, for the sake of justice, should be put in its proper light, and inquiry be imperatively demanded by the public at large. Should there be any attempt to withhold it, let an appeal be made to the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. They are both bound to sift the causes and rights of any murderous collision between the citizens and the troops.

A case has been during the week brought before one of the police magistrates which seems to require passing commentary.

An unhappy wretch, in a plight of destitution and disease, described as being in rags and covered with vermin, was admitted into the parish workhouse, and there, with a view of attaining to something like cleanliness, and shaking off the loathsome annoyance which was inflicting upon him such disgusting personal misery, he hit upon the expedient of totally destroying his already tattered garments, and thereby levying upon the parish a contribution of something like decent clothing. The man's ruse had the effect, and more than the effect. The authorities gave him a parish jacket, but first painted upon it a brand of theft and slavery—of theft in the words "Stop it," which made its miserable wearer everywhere cognizable by the police, and liable to be taken before a magistrate, as he actually was—and of slavery in the name of the workhouse whence it came, one of the local prisons of the bad law with which no thought of freedom can be with safety associated. Thus attired, the poor wretch was sent forth to the hootings of the mob, for crowds to trail at his heels and salute him with jeers and obloquy—the brand of a felon upon his back, and the prisoner of any busy policeman who might wish to take him in hand upon the public behalf. It was in the latter capacity that he figured before Mr. Henry, the magistrate, who at once expressed his decided disapproval of the course adopted by the parochial authorities, and evinced his warm indignation at its impropriety, particularly as the new poor-law itself contained an express prohibition for the punishment, in different terms, of the offence with which the wretched pauper was charged. We would be foremost to deprecate the wanton destruction by paupers of their clothes when once admitted to the workhouse, though we can find some palliation for the wretched being whose rags were swarming with loathsome vermin, and might be said to be "stopping to his flesh;" but we would not have even a far more unpardonable refractory culprit visited with the infliction of the badge and brand of slavery and theft, and so sent forth to the wild derision of the streets. We rejoice, therefore, that the magistrate should have expressed himself strongly against this un-English expedient, and that the folly and cruelty of the workhouse legislation should have ended only in the following beneficial result:—

Mr. Henry said he must repeat that it was most unseemly to have a person like the prisoner traversing the streets of the metropolis in such a dress. In the first place, it led to public inconvenience, as crowds of people followed him about; and in the next, independent of the odium it would bring on the parish, its officers would have to attend to the different police-courts to which the pauper would be taken by the police, on account of the words "stop it" which were placed so prominently on the jacket.

The gatekeeper said he could not help that, and repeated he had only acted under the sanction of the board of guardians.

The governor of the workhouse was one of those who had actually painted the jacket.

Mr. Henry said he could not think, for the sake of the public, of turning the man into the street in such a state, and directed a constable to go to Whitechapel workhouse and obtain a coat and shirt for him.

This was done, and Mr. Henry told the gatekeeper he might take the jacket home with him.

The well-dressed functionary seemed by no means to relish his worship's direction, and said he had other places to call at, but would send for it.

The offence of entrapping innocent parties into apparent crime, so as to subject them to the penalties which the law provides for the guilty, in order that the false informer may profit by the success of his accusations, is one of the grossest and most detestable that can possibly be committed. It is an offence which every public body, however anxious for the vindication of justice and the maintenance of the law, should by every means discountenance, for it is perfectly akin to and co-ordinate in villany with another offence, that of extorting money from an innocent party under the threat of false and abominable charges. Both are crimes of the deepest dye, and deserve to be punished with the utmost rigour. The man who treats another with violence, who waylays or robs him, does not, at all events, deprive him of the sympathy of his fellow-creatures; but the man who entices a person into the commission of crime, and then seeks to make the law, which was designed for the protection of the innocent, a means of the cruellest injury and oppression, and deprives at the same time his victim of the solace of character and commiseration. A case to which these remarks are applicable appeared in this paper last week, in a report of certain proceedings which took place at the Worship-street Police-office. A man named Spellman inquired at the police station for two constables, whose names he mentioned, and with whom, from that circumstance, it might be supposed he had some acquaintance, and, not finding them, he informed another constable that he could conduct him to an utterer of base money. The person to whom he alluded was a boy named Nicholls, who was arrested, and three bad shillings were found in his possession. It was afterwards, however, clearly shown that this bad money had been previously given to him by Spellman, with a request to keep it for him for a short time, and that Spellman thereby sought to entrap him into the alleged violation of the law, and all the concomitant horrors of trial and transportation. Spellman's object would appear to be to procure money from the authorities at the Mint, as a reward for the information and successful prosecution of the supposed offender, as well as to obtain the usual expenses allowed to witnesses attending at the Old Bailey on behalf of the Crown, and possibly to recommend himself to the notice of the commissioners of police by his activity and zeal. In either case the motive and means of its accomplishment would exhibit the lowest baseness and most unscrupulous perfidy on the part of the principal agent, as well as great laxity and a radical fault in the system which would admit of the possibility of its success. On the reappearance, however, of the parties at Worship-street, on Monday, it was stated by the solicitor for the Mint that no encouragement had been given by the authorities in that department to such practices, and that Spellman, under any circumstances, would have received no reward from them. The statement of the inspector of police also went to exonerate that body. However, we trust that the miscreant will not escape the proper reward of his Machiavelian ingenuity; and, however little anxious for severity or punishment in ordinary cases, we think that crimes of this class and nature require a most rigorous treatment for their repression.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AT BRIGHTON.

BRIGHTON, Thursday Evening.

From an early hour in the morning the cliffs were lined with thousands of well-dressed spectators in expectation of greeting her Majesty, whilst numerous ships appeared in the offing, and myriads of pleasure boats, filled with gay parties, studded the roads. The Grenadier Guards were drawn up so as to afford an uninterrupted passage to the royal carriage, and the 7th Hussars were kept in readiness as an escort at the Pier. At one o'clock the guns were heard in the direction of Beachy Head, and expectation from the moment was all on tiptoe. At three o'clock the Royal Victoria and Albert yacht, which had outstripped all the rest of the squadron, arrived, and in half an hour afterwards her Majesty, with her illustrious Consort, landed in the royal barge, accompanied by the Prince de Joinville, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, &c. It is unnecessary to state that her Majesty was hailed by the assembled multitude with the most heartfelt marks of loyalty and enthusiastic regard.

Her Majesty was evidently improved in health by the voyage. The Queen wore a blue gown, over which was a black pelerine, and a worked straw bonnet and single feather, and held in her hand a blue and white striped parasol. Prince Albert was in a morning dress, but the Prince de Joinville was in full uniform as a French admiral

A walking procession was soon formed at the pier-head, and her Majesty proceeded towards the royal carriage on the Esplanade, having Prince Albert on the right, and the Prince de Joinville on her left, followed by Lord Aberdeen and the lords and ladies of her suite, Marshal Count Bertrand, Gen. Pechel, the clergy, magistrates, and other public bodies, uncovered. The Coast Guard presented arms as she passed.

The approach to the shore was the signal for the loudest hurrahs of the thousands on the beach and on the cliffs. The bathing women and the fishermen ran over the sands, up to the knees in water, waving their hats, and treating the utmost joy. Her Majesty met them more than once, and bowed and kiss her hand. Prince Albert walked with hat in hand, and the Prince de Joinville found it much more convenient to take his hat entirely off than give it the general salute. Never was a more sincere picture of joy and hearty, stirring, and appeared to make a deep impression on her Majesty.

As soon as the Queen reached the Esplanade the band of the Grenadier Guards struck up the national anthem, and the men presented arms.

The Esplanade was quite clear for the royal progress; the inhabitants, however, crowded the bagnets on one side and the beach on the other, and continued cheering along the whole line.

At the entrance gates were placed the royal standard and the town colours. The Commissioners, with white wands, were present, to form a body guard walking at the side of the Queen's carriage; under a detachment of the 7th, or Queen's Own Hussars, formed the escort thence to the northern entrance of the Pavilion. The Steyne and the Pavilion Parade were crowded, and the balconies were all filled with well-dressed ladies, who waved their handkerchiefs in token of their loyalty and attachment.

At a quarter-past four o'clock the royal carriages arrived at the Palace in the following order:—The first—containing her Majesty, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the Prince de Joinville. The second—Lady Canning, lady in waiting; and Miss Liddell, maid of honour. The third—Colonel Wylde, equerry in waiting; and Lord Charles Wellesley, clerk marshal. The fourth—Sir E. G. Arbuthnot and Sir Charles Clarke.

Monsieur Touchard has arrived as an attendant on the Prince de Joinville, and had the honour of dining at the Palace on Thursday evening.

The Earl of Liverpool, immediately after his arrival, took his departure for Buxted, the seat of the noble Lord Steward.

The Earl of Aberdeen returned to town by the half-past six o'clock train.

Sir Edward Sugden visited the Palace as deputy lieutenant in waiting.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent is expected on a visit to her Majesty.

Several of the visitors and resident gentry paid their respects to her Majesty by calling at the Palace immediately after her arrival, among whom were the Earl and Countess of Chichester, the Belgian Minister and Madame Van de Weyer, Admiral Lord Colville, Lieutenant-Colonel Lord W. Thynne, Lieutenant-General Upton, Colonel Bell, M.G.; Colonel Horne, the Commanding Officer of the Grenadier Guards, &c.

In the evening the yachts illuminated, and sent up fireworks. The steamers displayed blue lights, and the royal tradesmen illuminated their houses.

The Prince de Joinville leaves for Ostend this morning (Saturday). The royal yacht goes to Portsmouth to take in coals, but is to return immediately; and there is a rumour that her Majesty will accompany the Prince to Ostend on Saturday, but it is only a rumour, founded on the fact that the Victoria and Aluert is to come back to the roadstead.

THE MURDER AT COBHAM PARK.

A rumour was prevalent during the week that the wretched parricide, Dadd (the particulars of whose atrocity appeared in our late editions last week), had been arrested at Calais by one of the old Bow-street officers, on Monday last, and brought over to Dover; but this is not the case. The savage maniac is still prowling about in quest, perhaps, of other victims. We observe, with the greatest abhorrence, that already the most disgusting exhibitions and announcements are being made, in order to excite the morbid curiosity of the public in reference to this unnatural and tragical event. We were in hopes that the enlightened good sense of the British people had put an utter extinguisher on this raw-head and bloody-bones school of art, but it pains us to perceive, by the newspaper advertisements, that there may still be found persons ready to perpetuate the horrors of such occurrences, even in defiance of public opinion. We trust that the police will exercise a strict censorship over the performances at those juvenile haunts of crime and profligacy, the "Penny Theatres;" and, to prevent the contagion of any higher priced representation of the loathsome scene, we still think that conventional decency affords the best protection.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

TOTAL LOSS OF THE BRISTOL AND DUBLIN STEAMER "QUEEN."

We regret to announce the total loss of the above steamer, belonging to the Bristol General Steam Navigation Company, which took place on Saturday last, on the north-east part of the island of Skokholm. In proceeding down the channel we had the most beautiful weather that ever shone from the heavens, about twenty minutes past, and very near weather, as clear as day. We were abreast Smalls Light, and steering a direct course for Saint Bride's Bay, between Skokholm and Skomer; and as we were entering the Roads it came on a dense fog, so much so that we could not see the ship's head. We immediately put the ship's helm hard a-port, and brought her head S.S.E. to make the Milford Lights, and there is my course found to be correct. I gave my orders to the engineer directly to slow the engines quite slow. The orders were strictly obeyed, at the same time sent Mr. Reeve, the chief officer, to the engineer, to tell him he had better be ready to stop or reverse her, as I thought request, at the same time going quite slow. Scarcely had these orders been given, before the ship went on shore. I had a good look out on the right ahead. It was immediately attended to, and immediately she struck. At the same time we should not see what it was until we saw the breakers against the rocks. We reversed the engines, and she hauled off, and we directed our course for Milford, thinking to save the ship. About the distance of one mile from the island we saw a sloop, and called her along side to assist us. At this time there were ten feet water in the hold, and she was fast settling forward, when I immediately put all the ladies on board of the sloop. By this time I had a great lat to port and very much by the head. I sent the sloop from alongside and remained by the ship as long as prudence would allow me to do so. In about a quarter of an hour from this time she sunk in from ten to sixteen fathoms of water. We have saved nothing but the plate, two compasses, and the boats. The losses were all or nearly all, in their night clothes, and so arrived at Milford last evening at six o'clock, the fog being so dense she could not find the harbour. We have had every attention paid to us since we arrived here. The crew I sent up by the Pembroke steamer this day. I keep the chief officer and steward with me until I receive orders from you. To-morrow morning we go out to the spot where the ill-fated vessel went down, to see what can be done. If we can find her, it may be possible to raise her. at all events we may remove the valuables on board.

I remain, &c. "C. G. GARDINER.

"P.S. Myself, Mr. Reeves, and Rowles have saved nothing but what we stand in."

SLOOP WRECKED.—THREE LIVES LOST.—On the 22nd ultimo, as the sloop Good Intent, burthen 47 tons, Captain Thomas Moverley, of Thorne, was proceeding with a cargo of coals for South, when off Cleeness and the Bull Light (the vessel being in stays; there came on a heavy squall of wind from S.S.W., which capsized her, and two men, and the captain's son, aged seven, were unfortunately drowned, and all the wearing apparel of the captain and his wife lost, in addition to the cargo. When the vessel went down, the wife clung to a boat oar, having on her gown unfastened, and her shoes, which were washed off by the sea. The captain swam about until he got hold of two bulkhead boards, and seeing his wife floating at a short distance, he with difficulty got to her and righted the boards, after drifting about for an hour, they were saved, being picked up by Robert Drewery, of No. 7 pilot boat, of the port of Grimsby, when they were safely landed on Sunday morning. The remainder loss is upwards of £200. The hull of the vessel, in which the boy was found, has been brought into Grimsby harbour, and his body has been interred in the churchyard.

FOUR VESSELS RUN DOWN AT SEA.—During the last four or five days accounts have been received of the unfortunate disasters at sea, announcing the total loss of four valuable vessels, by being run down by others, happily unattended with any loss of life. On the night of the 19th of last month, during a dense fog, the Acadia steam-ship, Captain Lott, which, on her homeward passage from Boston to Liverpool, ran down an American barque, called the Merchant, from Amsterdam, bound to Quebec. The fog at the time was so thick, that those in charge of the Acadia did not perceive the unfortunate vessel until she was close under her bows; and to prevent a collision was, it is said, perfectly impossible. The engines were instantly stopped, and in the next moment she struck the Merchant. The commission is reported to have been truly fearful, and for a time the passengers on board the Acadia were in a state of great alarm. The crew of the barque, finding the sea was rushing in torrents into the hold of the vessel, instantly took to the long boat, but it was as much as they could do to get away before the ship pitched forward and directly disappeared in deep [illegible]. The crew were afterwards picked up by the Acadia, which brought them to Liverpool. The Merchant is about 400 tons burden. On the 25th of the same month another [illegible] took place between the barque Grahamville of Rideford, in Devonshire, and the ship Leviathan, which terminated in the loss of the former vessel. It occurred off Cape de Monte, and the Glenburnie sank almost immediately. She was laden with coals, and was bound to Rio Janeiro. The crew were saved, and have since arrived in safety at Bahia, from which place they belong. A third vessel was lost in a similar way in the Atlantic by coming in contact with a brig, called the K. T. E. which has arrived at Bristol with the intelligence. The crew were rescued.—On the 10th ult. in lat. 49° 48, long. 16° 15, the Mercy, from Algoa, ran foul of the Mersey, belonging to Newtonabbey, causing such serious injury that in the course of an hour the Mercy went down. She was laden with [illegible] and the crew were preserved.

MERCHANT VESSEL LOST.—On Tuesday morning last, during a heavy squall, the Good Intent, Captain Moverly, was upset whilst in stays, between the Bull Light and the Spurn, and almost immediately sank. The crew, consisting of two men, [illegible] drowned; also her master's son, aged seven years, with Mrs in bed in the cabin. Captain Moverly kept himself and his wife afloat on an oar until they were rescued by the crew of a pilot cutter belonging to Grimsby, in a quarter of an hour after the accident.

RAMSGATE, Sept. 5.—A box containing newspapers and letters, and destined for Sydney (bearing her Majesty's post mark, October 21, 1842, has been picked up twelve miles east of the North Foreland, and brought in here. Attached to the box are two square iron several pound weights, with a piece of [illegible]

ST. HELENA, July 18.—The Cascade, Lake, from Mauritius to London, which put in here on the 19th ultimo, has been condemned. 16th.—The Regular, Barney, from London to Bombay, was abandoned, in a sinking state, May 13, in lat. 32° 8, long. 33° E. [illegible] saved.

LIVERPOOL, August 16.—The Lady Isabella, Dobson, from Liverpool to Santa Martha and Carthagena, ran on Belfast Reef on the 7th inst., and bilged; greater part of the cargo saved; but mostly in a damaged state.

We have been informed, on good authority, that the Regular, Budd, from London to Bombay, which foundered off the Mauritius on the 13th of May last, had on board 10,000 sovereigns, 3,000 dollars, £6,000 worth of copper, and £1,000 worth of steel

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

A CHILD BURNED TO DEATH.—A child, whose parents live at 7, Apollo-court, Fleet-street, was burned to death on Monday evening, under the following circumstances:—The child, which was six years of age, and named Eliza Sophia Jackson, had been left by the mother, together with two other children, locked up in a room, the mother being compelled to go from home. The deceased, in her mother's absence, was playing with the fire, when her clothes caught the flame. Mr. Baker, the beadle of St. Clement Danes, happened to be passing through the court, and his attention was attracted by flames bursting from the room, and by cries of "murder," and "fire." Upon reaching the room he found it enveloped in flames, and the little girl in question on fire, and in the most excruciating agony. The little sufferer was immediately conveyed to the King's College Hospital, where she died in two hours. This is one of the thousand similar accidents that occur from the very bad habit of parents locking in their children when they go abroad.

In the case of Mr. Briggs, the upholsterer, who was killed by his gig running into collision with a butcher's cart on London-bridge, as mentioned in our last, the coroner's jury have returned a verdict of "manslaughter" against George Crisp, the driver of the latter vehicle.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT AT THE ROYAL EXCHANGE.—On Tuesday one of the men engaged in sculpturing the slab under the balustrade surmounting the top, and in front of the Exchange, lost his balance and was precipitated with frightful rapidity to the bottom, when he was taken up in a dreadfully mangled state. The most prompt surgical assistance was procured, and the wretched sufferer was immediately removed to the Hospital, where it is said he expired about half an hour after admission. Curiosity

HER MAJESTY'S MARINE EXCURSION.

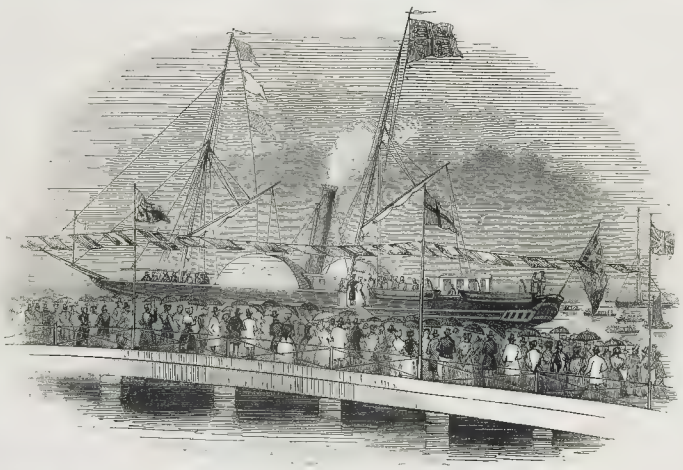
THE ROYAL YACHT OFF SOUTHAMPTON.

Our illustration of this most interesting and eventful "progress" has hitherto only extended to "the passage of the Bar," and the "High-street, Southampton." We now resume our agreeable task of chronicling the events and incidents of the royal voyage pittoresque, premising that all the sketches for the annexed engravings are from the pencil of Mr. Landells; and we feel confident that the skilful effect with which he has here pictorially recorded the royal excursion will be at once acknowledged by our readers, whilst our artist's general success in marine subjects will be the best guarantee for the fidelity of his present labours.

Before the details of our engravings, we proceed to the arrangements at Southampton, as narrated by our correspondent at Cowes:—"At about four P. M. on Sunday, the 27th of August, the day previous to the embarkation of her Majesty at Southampton on her marine excursion, H. M. S. Warspite, 50 guns, Captain Lord John Hay, came to anchor in Cowes Roads from Portsmouth; and shortly afterwards H. M. brig Grecian, 16 guns, Commander Smythe, took up her station about a quarter of a mile astern of her to the eastward, in readiness to do honour to England's Queen. The greatest bustle and excitement prevailed on shore and afloat, on its being made known for certain that the Queen was, for the third time, about to honour 'the Island' with her presence. During the whole of the day, the R.Y.S. yachts kept arriving from the westward, whether they had been to give eclat to the Torquay and Plymouth regattas, in the preceding week, causing the roadstead again to assume its summerlike appearance.

"On the following morning (Monday), at an early hour, the loyalty of the inhabitants became more and more conspicuous; and, although the weather did not augur a very promising appearance, being dark and lowering, with a Scotch mist falling, that would wet an Englishman to the skin, it could not damp the loyalty and excitement which was evinced by the fair daughters of Vectis to give her Majesty a warm reception, and who on any other less important occasion, would have remained safely housed within their respective domiciles. Notwithstanding the dulness of the weather, the hearts of her Majesty's subjects at this 'Queen of watering places' (Cowes), were lit up with joy at the thought of 'the Queen is coming,' and that she would again visit the Island, and show her Royal consort the once favourite abode where 'Victoria' sported on the lawn of 'Norris' as the gay and joyous girl. And could there be anything more natural, while there remained so many links to connect her Majesty's youthful history with the Island? For here it was that Victoria experienced the beneficial effects of its climate during the summers of 1831 and 1833; and here it was that her Majesty chose a wetnurse from her subjects for her first-born.

"We could recapitulate many incidents connected with the former visits here of her Majesty when Princess; but, as our object is to condense as much as possible, and confine ourselves to her Majesty's present brief sojourn among us, we shall return to the morning, when the booming of cannon announced the embarkation of the Ocean's Queen on the waters of the Solent, and when all eyes were eager to catch a glimpse of the royal yacht, freighted as she was with so precious a gem."



EMBARKATION OF THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT AT SOUTHAMPTON.

HEAVING THE LEAD.

ENTRANCE TO SOUTHAMPTON PIER.

Our first engraving represents the royal yacht off Southampton, and shows the beautiful proportions of this superb vessel to great advantage. Her boats are seven in number, consisting of the Queen's barge, which is 35 feet in length, and built diagonal, with comle deals from New Zealand, and only five-eighths of an inch in thickness, the knees and thwarts are not observable, and yet she is strongly kneed together, so that there is an entirely flat surface inside, beautifully gilt and varnished. Its fitments are entirely mahogany; the outside is painted pure white, with gilt moulding, and having the royal arms emblazoned on her bows in purple and gold. She is fitted with canopy awnings of rich silks, supported by copper standards; the cushions are also of rich silk. The sculls are painted white, and 14 in number; each scull bears the royal arms on the handles, and the blades have the dolphin in gold in bold relief. There is one dingy, 14 feet in length; two gigs, 28 feet in length; and two pinnaces, 32 feet in length; with a life-boat, 26 feet long, with air-tubes, made of copper, which are placed round the seats of the boat, so that it will be impossible for any accident to happen. The whole of the boats' fitments are entirely mahogany, and each bears on its bows the royal arms.

The next scene is the embarkation of her Majesty and Prince Albert on board the royal yacht, having been steered thither in the admiral's barge, by Commander Sheringham, of the Fearless. Her Majesty was received on board the yacht by Lord Haddington, and other lords of the Admiralty. Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, and Major-General Sir Hercu es Pakenham. Lords Aberdeen and Liverpool were on board the royal yacht, and accompanied her Majesty. The Duke of Wellington, who was at the head of the pier, having handed her Majesty from the carriage into the admiral's barge, returned to the temporary house on the pier, evidently very wet, and returned to town by railway. Immediately on her Majesty ascending the deck of the royal yacht a royal salute was fired. Her Majesty did not long remain on deck in consequence of the rain.

The fourth engraving shows the entrance to Southampton Pier, near the quay, at the south-western corner of the town. The pier is a structure of considerable extent and elegance; it was erected some years since, and called "Victoria Pier," after her Majesty, by whom, before her accession, it was opened.

Shortly after twelve o'clock order was given to weigh, and the royal yacht proceeded down Southampton Water, towards Cowes. She was followed by the Sovereign steamer, and by the Ariadne, having on board the mayor and civic authorities; and also by many other steamers, which, with the Commissioners' yacht, and the Oriental steam-ship, engraved on the next page, were gaily decked for the occasion.

The vessels in Southampton Water, which were unprecedentedly numerous, were dressed in their colours, and produced a very lively effect. There were, besides many private yachts, and a vast number of steamers of different commercial and other public companies, the following Government steamers,—Cyclops, Prometheus, Lightning, and Fearless.

The steam-squadron manned their yards as the royal yacht passed, and the admiral dipped his flag, which was flying on board the Fearless. The whole of the steamers then got under way, and followed in the wake of the royal yacht. A number of the Royal Yacht Squadron who were lying off also made sail.

The third engraving on the opposite page shows heaving the lead on board the royal yacht, and Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence explaining to her Majesty the use of it.

Having passed Calshot Castle, which is shown on the lower right-hand corner of the page, the yacht directed her course to Cowes. It was not until some time after the men-of-war in Cowes Roadstead had announced, by their firing, that her Majesty was in sight that the royal steamer could be descried through the haze, abreast the Red-buoy apparently, and on, approaching the westernmost part of the roads. At one o'clock the royal standard became visible from the castle, and the castle guns, which for the previous ten years had been silent—indeed, ever since the Queen, as Princess Victoria, left her residence, Norris Castle—then discharged their contents with a report that completely deafened the ears of the bystanders. On the smoke clearing away a most magnificent spectacle presented itself; a whole fleet of steamers following in the wake of the royal steamer, and on either side the Royal Yacht Squadron in two divisions; the commodore, Earl of Yarborough, in his beautiful yawl, the Kestrel, leading the starboard division, and the royal yacht going at less than ordinary speed, to enable the whole fleet to keep up with her, and progressing slowly onward towards Ryde and Spithead.

An accident, fortunately attended with no serious consequences, may be mentioned here. This was the Monarch steam-ship fouling the South-Western, the vessel in which was our artist, who has sketched the collision.

As soon as the royal yacht approached Spithead the flag-ship St. Vincent, 120, manned yards, and fired a salute in excellent style. This inspiring scene is shown in the uppermost engraving. Salutes were also fired from Monkton Fort, from the garrison at Portsmouth, and the Victory, 100, in the harbour. The two opposite engravings show the royal yacht in sight of Cowes, and the Royal Yacht Squadron club-house on the Marine Parade, the fashionable promenade, and, from its situation, commanding the entrance of Cowes harbour and the roadstead. At the northern extremity of the parade is the castle originally built by Henry VIII., but almost modernised into a mansion, and now the residence of the governor of the island. Cowes is situated on the east and west sides of the entrance of the Medina. The town is seen to greatest advantage from the roadstead; and the houses command delightful views of the coast of Hampshire, with the New Forest, Calshot Castle, Southampton Water, Stokes Bay, Portsmouth, and Spithead in the distance. As a proof of the maritime importance of Cowes, it is selected as the port of rendezvous, where vessels of every denomination and of every flag call for orders, as to their ultimate port of destination; and, with some improvements, Cowes would be one of the finest harbours in the kingdom.

The royal yacht having passed the St. Vincent, returned to Ryde, where her Majesty and Prince Albert landed in the admiral's barge at the pier, under a salute from the Grecian, 16, to which a steamer was lashed at Cowes, in order that she might keep company with the yacht. The details of the landing were narrated, at some length, in our last number. Approaching the town from the sea, the effect is very imposing: house rising above house to the top of a hill, considerably elevated above the sea-level, interspersed with trees and evergreens, give it a very inviting appearance. The pier stretches out into the sea 1740 feet in length, or one third of a mile. To the right is a handsome terrace, behind which rises the elegant spire of St. Thomas's Church; further to the right are the market-house, town-hall, and chapel of St. James; while, near the shore are some beautiful marine villas.

In taking water off Ryde Pier, the barge, from the yacht rolling about, got under the accommodation-ladder, and broke off the lower part, on which Mr. Frederick Warren, mate, and son of Admiral F. Warren, was standing as a sidesman: he was, consequently, thrown off into the water, to the great alarm of her Majesty, who, in the extreme agitation till he was picked up, which, being an expert swimmer, was speedily done. The young gentleman has been assured of his promotion.

We may here quote (from the Times) an extract of a letter from a gentleman on board the Royal Victoria and Albert yacht:—

"Her Majesty, who enjoys her marine excursion amazingly, has been entirely free from any attack of sea-sickness. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, however, who is extremely liable to an attack of this nature, was somewhat indisposed during the slight breeze which blew in the course of Tuesday; but during the whole of to-day the Prince has not had, nor indeed is he likely to have, any return of this odious malady. It is most gratifying to observe the great urbanity and kindness manifested by the Queen and her illustrious consort to every one of the crew with which the royal yacht is so efficiently manned. Her Majesty and the prince, in pacing the decks arm in arm, enter into conversation with the sailors on the subject of naval tactics, making various inquiries connected with various matters concerning the discipline of the vessel. We have some powerful telescopes on board, which are the source of great amusement to the Queen and his Royal Highness. Her Majesty's health is exceedingly good. The Queen and the Prince rise early, breakfast between eight and nine o'clock, partake of luncheon about two o'clock, and dine about the usual hour. The Sovereign generally retires to rest between ten and eleven o'clock. The internal decorations of the royal yacht are of the most chaste and magnificent description. She is replete with every convenience, and with respect to her steaming and sailing capabilities she may be said to be unrivalled. The number of hands on board is upwards of three hundred. This number includes the Marines and the Marine Artillery. Should the weather continue as favourable as it is at present, it is quite a matter of speculation how long her Majesty will be 'the Queen of the Ocean on her own proper element.'"

At a quarter past two the spectacle was hailed for a while by the East Cowes Castle Point, having been nearly an hour in passing through the roads; and it was not until about half-past five o'clock that the royal standard again hove in sight, her Majesty being on her return from Ryde to Cowes. The weather had now become more cheering, the rain had ceased; still there was a gloom over head, and a mist on the horizon, that gave it more the appearance of November than August. The Parade was soon thronged with people, and numerous boats, filled with fashionables, were placed in requisition, wending their way towards the royal yacht to get a peep at the Queen. Her Majesty's ships Warspite, Modeste, and Grecian, again saluted the royal yacht, and as she passed outside the Warspite the sailors who were on the yards gave her Majesty three cheers. An Austrian merchant barque, the Jenny, Captain Francovitch, lately arrived from Bahia, was also dressed out in a profusion of colours, and fired a royal salute with such precision that it would have been difficult to have guessed her other than to be a man-of-war; her symmetry, appearance, and rig deceiving the keenest eye. The royal yacht continued her course through the roads to the westward, and proceeded as far as Egypt House, where Lord Durham, during the summer of 1833, resided, and where his lordship gave a magnificent banquet and entertainment on the 1st to her Majesty (when Princess), and the juveniles of the nobility then stopping here. The royal yacht, after viewing the spot, returned to the roads; and at twenty-six minutes past six let go her anchor off the castle, amid the cheering of the populace and

HER MAJESTY IN FRANCE.

CHATEAU D'EU, Saturday, Sept. 2.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived in the royal yacht in the roads of Treport at five o'clock this afternoon. The flotilla escorting her Majesty came to anchor under a salute from the battery on the beach and the French war-steamers in the roads, and shortly afterwards his Majesty the King of the French arrived in an open carriage drawn by eight horses, accompanied by her Majesty the Queen of the French, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Orleans, the Princess de Joinville, and the Princess Clementine, the Princes de Joinville and Augustus of Saxe Coburg, and the Duke of Aumale and Montpensier escorting the royal carriage on horseback. Several other carriages, conveying the French Ministers and great officers of state and the household of the King of the French, followed in the train. On arriving at Treport his Majesty Louis Philippe embarked on board the barge of la Reine Amelie, and proceeded to the royal yacht to escort her Majesty and the Prince Consort to the French shore. On the arrival of the barge at the Victoria and Albert her Majesty descended into it, and, together with Prince Albert, was conveyed to the landing-place under a salute from the whole of the vessels in the roads, as well as from the battery on the beach.

Their Majesties Queen Victoria and Louis Philippe entered a tent that had been erected on the jetty, where the ceremonial of introduction was gone through between the royal personages present; after which their Majesties and Prince Albert entered the carriage that had conveyed the King and Queen of the French to Treport, and, amidst the mingled cries of "Vive la Reine Victoria," and "Vive le Roi!" together with shouts of the military, the salutes of the cannon, and the general acclamation of thousands of spectators who crowned the heights and crowded the windows, drove off to the Chateau d'Eu.

On the arrival of her Majesty in the court of the chateau, where the 1st Regiment of Carabiniers à Cheval and the corps d'élite of the 1st, the 24th, and the 66th Regiments of Foot were drawn up, the bands played "God save the Queen," and the troops presented arms, whilst her Majesty descended from the carriage. The Queen graciously bowed to the civil and military functionaries who were assembled in the grand portico to receive the royal party, and was conducted by King Louis Philippe to the balcony thrown out from the state apartments, where her Majesty again graciously saluted the troops, and retired amidst the most enthusiastic shouts of welcome from the soldiery as well as the spectators assembled.

At eight o'clock dinner was announced, when his Majesty the King of the French, with her Majesty Queen Victoria at his right, and the Queen of the Belgians at his left, proceeded down the grand staircase to the salle à manger, which is situated on the ground-floor of the chateau.

The royal dinner party consisted of her Majesty and Prince Albert, who were respectively seated at the right hand of the King and the Queen of the French, who sat opposite to each other, the Queen of the Belgians, the Princess of Joinville, the Princess Clementine, Madame Adelaide, the Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg, the Prince de Joinville, the Dukes d'Aumale and Montpensier; Viscountess Canning, lady in waiting on her Majesty; Lord Cowley, the British ambassador; the Earl of Aberdeen, the Earl of Liverpool; the Marshal Count Sebastiani, M. Guizot, ministre des affaires etrangères; M. Lacave Laplagne, ministre des finances; Admiral Mackau, ministre de la marine; General Athalin, intendant de la maison du roi; the Marquis de Roure, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Lord Charles Wellesley, Colonel Wylde, the Hon. George Anson, Colonel Chabannes, &c. During dinner the band of the 24th Regiment of Infanterie Legère played several favourite airs from French and Italian operas.

The Mareschal de Camp, the Marquis de Roure, has been appointed chevalier d'honneur to her Majesty Queen Victoria.

Colonel Chabannes, aide-de-camp to his Majesty the King of the French, has been appointed aide-de-camp to his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

The King has signified his entire satisfaction with the conduct of the civil and military authorities charged with the preservation of order and the prevention of accidents during the ceremony of Saturday.

Lord Cowley, the British ambassador at the court of the Tuileries, was in attendance at Treport to receive her Majesty on her landing on the shores of France.

Mr. Gordon, her Britannic Majesty's consul at Havre, also repaired to Treport, to pay his respects to the Queen of England.

The Prince de Joinville joined the royal squadron in the war-steamer Pluton, in which he embarked at Cherbourg. Her Majesty having despatched a steamer to inform the Prince that it was her intention only to pass within view of Cherbourg, where there is a very extensive breakwater, his Royal Highness hastened to meet the squadron, and at three A.M., on Saturday, he encountered the yacht Victoria and Albert, on board of which he immediately went, and was thus conveyed to Treport.

SUNDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, together with the Earl of Liverpool, lord steward; Lord Cowley, ambassador at the court of the Tuileries; Lady Canning, Lord Charles Wellesley, Colonel Wylde, and others of the royal suite, heard prayers this morning in the saloon appropriated to her Majesty's use.

After prayers the Queen and the Prince Consort, accompanied by their Majesties the King and Queen of the French, the Queen of the Belgians, and the royal family of France, and escorted by a numerous cavalcade of ministers, generals, court and state officers, took an airing in the grounds of the chateau and the neighbouring forest.

The royal dinner party comprised nearly the same personages that were assembled at the table of King Louis Philippe yesterday.

MONDAY. Her Majesty Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, their Majesties the King and Queen of the French, with the other royal personages, and a numerous suite, left the chateau this morning at two o'clock, and repaired to the Forest of Eu, when their Majesties took an airing in the drives and avenues of the wood.

At four o'clock a collation was served at the Mount d'Orleans, of which her Majesty and Prince Albert, together with the King and Queen of the French, the Queen of the Belgians, and the royal family of France, and the distinguished and noble guests partook. The band of the Carabiniers à Cheval played during the collation several favourite airs. After the collation her Majesty, conducted by the King of the French, repaired to a tent close by the great tent, when, surrounded by the royal personages present, and by the officers of state, and the members of the household and court, the Queen of England held a levee, at which there were presented the nobility and gentry of the neighbourhood, who had repaired or been invited to pay their respects to her Majesty.

The royal party returned to the chateau at six o'clock. At eight dinner was served in the principal salle à manger, her Majesty being conducted, as before, by the King of the French.

In the evening a concert was performed at the chateau in the salle des gardes, the particulars of which will be found under our musical head.

Her Majesty is in the enjoyment of excellent health and spirits; Prince Albert, also, is quite well.

TUESDAY NIGHT.—This morning, at seven o'clock, Prince Albert, the Prince Auguste of Saxe Coburg, the Duc d'Aumale, and the Duc de Montpensier, accompanied by Colonel Wylde, Mr. G. Anson, Colonel De Chabannes, and other French officers, reviewed the 1st Regiment of Carabiniers, in a plain distant about four miles from Eu, in the direction of Dieppe. This superb regiment went through various manœuvres and experiments with great precision and despatch, for nearly two hours. Prince Albert then rode along the line, the troops presenting arms, and the band playing "God save the Queen," and gracefully made his acknowledgments to the French Princes for the military treat they had afforded him, and expressed his pleasure at the soldierly manner in which the regiment performed its several evolutions.

The Princes and suite then inspected the infantry in the "Caserne de Montpensier," a fine barrack, newly erected in the town, and, having gone over the building, and seen the soldiers go through their exercises, the Princes returned to the chateau to breakfast, having been absent about three hours. Prince Albert wore his field marshal's uniform, and looked well, though a trifle fatigued, on his return. The group of princely cavaliers were loudly cheered by the people and strangers whom they encountered during the morning's ride.

In the afternoon the entire royal party visited the ancient collegiate church of Notre Dame, which adjoins the chateau, and which is dedicated to St. Laurence of Dublin, its founder. It was known but to a very few that their Majesties were about to visit this church, and, consequently, there were not half-a-dozen persons therein when they arrived. The party, consisting of nearly all the members of the French Royal Family, Queen Victoria, Prince Albert, Lords Aberdeen and Liverpool, M. Guizot, and suite, entered by the side door on the western side just at four o'clock, the Queen of England leaning on the arm of the King of the French, and the Queen of the French upon that of Prince Albert. Her Majesty wore a tartan dress, with black mantle and white silk bonnet; the King was in plain clothes, the Princes in mufti. The Duchess of Orleans appeared on entering the church to be affected by some sudden recollection, and was about to retire when the Queen of the Belgians, taking her by the hand, led her towards the great altar. Her Royal Highness, the Queen of the French, and the Queen of the Belgians then kneeled and continued for a short time in prayer, on rising from which it was apparent that the Duchess of Orleans had shed tears. The whole of the Royal party then walked round the church, examining the various curiosities, &c., and afterwards descended into the crypt, in which the monuments of the Counts d'Artois are placed. The crypt was lit by candles, so that everything it contained was easily to be inspected. Her Majesty Queen Victoria appeared very much interested in what she saw, and his Majesty Louis Philippe in his explanations acted as an experienced antiquary, evidently pleased in answering the questions put to him.

After leaving the church the illustrious party proceeded to Treport for a drive. When her Majesty had taken her place in the char-à-banc, King Louis Philippe pushed Prince Albert forward, who said, "he could not precede his Majesty." "Ah! there is nothing of 'Majesty' necessary here," replied the good-natured monarch, "get up." "But your Majesty will not have room beside the Queen." "True, true," said the King, "I am a little stout, but I will sit sideways."

The festivities ordained at the chateau in honour of the royal visitors of England, and the out-of-door recreations succeed each other with happy rapidity. Every day and almost every hour brings round some amusement, and "the feast of reason and flow of soul" are ever followed by healthful exercises, which thus make the appetite of pleasure grow by that it feeds on.

The Prince de Joinville was rallied on the ennui he displayed while waiting for the royal party in the forest. It seems that he threw stones, patted children, sat on a heap of flints, chatted with soldiers and spectators, and, finally, took to pulling the ropes by which the tents were drawn up, and was near performing feats with less of physical force a feat similar to Samson's. The Duchess of Orleans, who has on this occasion appeared in public for the first time since her bereavement, was an object of deep interest. Her presence at the promenade and the luncheon was in compliment to our beloved Sovereign, who seems to have the power of charming all who approach her. It was her Majesty's attention to the Princess Clementine of Coburg which suggested to King Louis Philippe the idea of inviting her Majesty to visit France. It appears that the Queen's kind and endearing reception of the Count de Paris (and the other grandchildren of his Majesty the King of the French) made such an impression on the Duchess of Orleans, that she broke through her resolve to remain secluded for yet some time, and she joined the gipsying party. At dinner her spirits appeared even still better, and she joined in the gay conversation, which lasted throughout the banquet.

The concert of last evening, which, by royal caprice, or by still more imperative artistic whim, had been substituted for the opera comique originally commanded, was chosen with taste and executed with skill. It was composed of morceaux from Armide—specimen of concerted instrumental pieces, and a few choruses, the words of which were so altered as to allude delicately and judiciously to the present joyous occasion. Our Queen and Prince appeared charmed with the performance. The concert was held in a small salle, fitted up for the purpose, which does not comfortably contain above fifty persons. It was occupied exclusively by the select few sojourning at the chateau, and was a strictly private réunion.

The breakfast at the chateau this morning was marked by increasing gaiety and friendship. Among the innumerable works of art to be seen in this gem of a chateau, are some splendid pieces of tapestry, and specimens of the far-famed Porcelain de Sevres. Two of the former, "The Death of Meleager" and "Diana Hunting," were particularly admired by her Majesty Queen Victoria. The King, delighted at an opportunity for gallantry, prayed her Majesty's acceptance of them and a superb casket of Sevres china with so much warmth, that refusal was impossible

Everything is so new and so gay, that her Majesty is said to find amusement in everything that passes around her. I know not exactly how her Majesty felt after the first moment of her interview with King Louis Philippe, but the manner of his Majesty must have caused her some astonishment, for, in the outset he gave a specimen of his finesse, which very much alarmed the Jacks who were witnesses of it, and who began to think of cutlasses and handspikes, and coming to "the rescue." The moment the King set foot on deck he took her Majesty in his arms, saluted her on each cheek, and without waiting an instant for recovery from the surprise, descended into his barge with his precious burden. This produced the first laugh, and it has been reproduced almost every moment since.

A very elegant dinner was given on Monday evening by the captain of the Pluton French war steamer to the British naval officers and the French officers of the land and sea service present at Treport. It was done in the best possible style; and the very best possible feeling was apparent throughout.

A very good painting, by a clever French artist, has already been made of the royal squadron lying off Treport. The gentleman's name is Jugelet. There are also several artists here from the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, taking sketches of the various places, so that there will be no fear of the history of these events being misrepresented.

At Treport it had been designed to have taken inspection of the vessels in the port and road, but the tide being low, and these running rather roughly, this little manœuvre was not proposed until too-late-now. The royal party drove to the jetty of Treport, and returned to the palace to dinner.

Covers are daily laid for about seventy persons.

There is another concert this evening.

It was expected that the Queen would leave the Chateau d'Eu, and embark on board the royal yacht Victoria and Albert, on Thursday morning at at eleven o'clock

WEDNESDAY.—The royal diversion of this day consisted of a drive through the forest of Eu, and a cold collation in a part selected, distant about twelve miles, and called Mont Catherine. The wands and attendants having been despatched in advance at an early hour, the royal party followed, leaving the chateau about two o'clock. Passing along the same road as that which they took on Monday to the fête champêtre, until they got embedded in the forest, then turned into what is called the Route Madelaine, and, halting at those points which afforded the best coup d'œil, they at length arrived at the spot destined for the honour of being the refective table of royalty.

In this excursion the Prince de Joinville, the Duc D'Aumale, the Duc de Montpensier, the Prince Auguste of Saxe Cobourg and suite, led the van on horseback, and his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the King of the French occupied the first seat of the first char-à-banc; the three Queens, of Great Britain, of France, and of Belgium, being seated in the second banc. In the first seat of the second char, M. Guizot, sat as usual with Lord Aberdeen on his right, and Lord Liverpool on his left. The remaining carriages, six in all, contained the other guests, and strangers, and officers now staying at the chateau

The party returned to the chateau at about seven o'clock.

It was a magnificent day, the sun shining effulgent, and without a cloud to dim its perfect lustre.

This evening a vaudeville is to be performed at the chateau, a temporary stage being fitted up for the purpose. The actors have been brought expressly from the Opera Comique, at Paris, another set of actors (from the Gymnase Dramatique) was engaged in the first instance, and a play was bespoke, which was rehearsed, and all the preparations made to have it performed, but the last moment it was discovered that in the play ("Jean de Paris") there were some rather mal à propos allusions to a wandering princess, and it was immediately stopped, the unfortunate company of comedians sent back to Paris, and a new set ordered, who would take care to select a performance that would not clash with crowned heads. This was the reason of the change in the fête.

DEPARTURE OF HER MAJESTY.

THURSDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert left the chateau at a little after eight this morning in the large and splendid char-à-banc which conveyed her to the chateau on her arrival. She was accompanied by all the members of the royal family, including the King and Queen of the French, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Orleans, Madame Adelaide, the Princess Clementine, the Prince and Princess of Joinville, and the Dukes of Aumale and Montpensier. The escort consisted of a troop of the splendid regiment of Carabineers. The 1st Regiment of the line was stationed upon the pier at Treport, and the 54th occupied the court of the Chateau d'Eu. The royal party were received by the line with cheering and every demonstration of respect.

On the arrival of the cavalcade at Treport, they were received with loyal shouts, the yachts in the harbour manned their yards, and gave three animated cheers, which were enthusiastically responded to by the multitude. The royal party entered the tent prepared for their reception, where they remained for some minutes in friendly discourse. Upon leaving it the King, taking the hand of her Majesty, led her on board of the barge which was prepared for the occasion. The King, the Duke d'Aumale, and the Duke of Montpensier, together with M. Guizot and some others, accompanied her Majesty and Prince Albert on board the yacht. On leaving shore, shortly after nine o'clock, a royal salute was fired from the batteries, which was returned by the ships, the people cheering the party loudly until they reached the yacht.

The King of the French and his suite remained on board for a short time, and on leaving was saluted with a royal salute from all the English ships. Immediately afterwards the royal squadron sailed. The royal squadron consists of the royal yacht the Victoria and Albert, the St. Vincent man-of-war, and four steamers of war. The Duke of Aumale accompanies the squadron; the former being commanded by his Royal Highness the Prince de Joinville, who escorts her Majesty to England.

The following impromptu is the production of a young enthusiast, written on witnessing the landing of her Majesty at Treport.

HOMMAGE A LA REINE.

BY AN ANGLO-GAUL.

STROPHE.

Salut! Souveraine de l'Océan,
Le Ciel bon chemin a paré.
Mêlons, oh! mêlons en reuleinent
La rose, le lis, le violet,
Que le tricolor fils de la Gloire,
Etende ses bras victorieux,
Pour faire hommage à VICTOIRE
Dans le pays de ses Aieux.

Salut! c'est bien ta Normandie,
Des héros la noble patrie,
Du grand Conquérant la patrie;
Mais, oh! mille fois plus beau
Ton sort que celui du Conquérant,
Lui—foudroyant la guerre;
Mais toi—tous les cœurs enchaînant
Dans le nœud de tes frères!

ANTISTROPHE.

Voilà le Roi d'un peuple entier,
Le jouet du sort trop longtemps;
Voilà ses Enfans, de la Nation fiers,
Et la Nation fière des Enfans!
Ah! viens voir ce splendide Paris,
Qui t'ouvrarait son cœur avec ses portes;
L'amour et la joie dans chaque cœur ont jailli,
Et l'ancienne Lame est morte!

Voici l'Asile! Reine des Ondes!
Oh dorment les foudres etents,
Vo.à le tombeau du Guerrier inconnu!
Et tu courres les yeux de ta main!
Oh! que de gloire de pleurs et de sang!
Son ombre perd tout ses courroux.
Français! Anglais! oh! serrons nos rangs,
Et la terre entière est à nous.

Mais bâtons! le devoir te réclame de nos champs,
Et les flots ont reçu le sr Maîtresse;
Le canon gronde ses adieux éclatants,
Au chêne a succédé la tristesse
Elle passe la main, elle la passe encore,
Comme autour d'elle murmurent les vents:
La Reine a retourné à son peuple qui l'adore,
La Mère à ses Enfants.

CHŒUR.

Salut! Souveraine d'Albion;
Salut! à ton digne Epoux;
Salut! aux tendres Régitons
Qui rendent tes jours si doux;
Qu'ils embellissent le trône de leur Mère,
Et soient eternels dans l'histoire,
Qu'ils marchent toujours dans les pas de leur Père, Vivent Albert et Victoire!

NEW MUSIC.

SACRED HARMONY, a Collection of Three Hundred and Fifty Standard Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Ancient and Modern, for One, Two, Three, or Four Voices, with an Accompaniment for the Pianoforte, Organ, or Seraphine. By J. A. Hamilton. D'Almaine and Co.

In the preface to this work the author observes that "one of the noblest uses to which music can possibly be applied will be found in devotional and congregational singing, as psalms, hymns, chants, anthems, &c." He is further of opinion that "this sort of exercise tends more than any other pursuits to enlarge and elevate the mind, both in a moral and religious point of view; to wean us from low and sordid ideas and habits; and, particularly in youth, to open the heart to kindly and noble sentiments, by cultivating and refining the taste." All this is very true, although to anti-Platonic, for, as everybody knows, the Athenian bee banished music from his republic hive, in which proceeding we will not, with Cicero, agree to errare cum Platone, &c., but, on the contrary, prefer to be right with those who think that music, and particularly sacred music, is the most divine art that can be studied. In this work Mr. Hamilton has collected a great number of magnificent psalm and hymn tunes, the best of which are the oldest; from what cause we will not presume to say, unless it be that choral harmony was better understood a century ago than at present, on account of it having been obliged to depend upon itself so much more than in the modern remplissage —orchestral days. The best constructed, and consequently the most agreeable, are those by Ravenscroft and Battishal, for they carry internal evidence of the purpose for which they were written; not so those distortions from Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, &c. If a melody have once been sinner enough to allow itself to be ushered first time into the world in a theatre or concert-room, it is all useless to try to reclaim it: you can never make a saint of it. Association with its early recollections will always detect and expose its masquerading reformation, and, whatever beauty it may have had in its pristine state, it can never pretend or aspire to the "beauty of holiness." Any composer or compiler who attempts to proselytise in this way will invariably fail in his design, for of him we must say,

Ex Græcis bonis Latinas fecit non bonas.

This work is handsomely printed, and no doubt will be eagerly sought after by all amateurs and professors who love genuine psalmody.

4. CHATTER, CHATTER, CHATTER. Ditto, ditto.

Mr. Phillips, we believe, is a distinguished performer on the violoncello, and controls the musical department of the Princess's Theatre. His compositions are marked by attention to his subject, and a pleasing, smooth, if not very original style of melody, accompanied by unobjectionable harmony. Of the four productions we prefer No. 3, "'Tis so, because 'tis so."

THE MONK (Der Mönch.) Song sung by Herr Staudigl. The music by Meyerbeer. Mori, Lavenu, and Co.

This is a grand composition in the author's happiest verve; eloquently descriptive of the remorse of a monk, who, in his hopeless anguish, exclaims—

"Accurst accurst the moment he for ever
Where I pronounced the dreadful fatal vow;
'Twas false to swear that from the world I'd sever,
To IT and joy my heart's devoted now!"

Sash, we suspect, are the sentiments of many a recluse when it is too late. The passage into the major at the close of each verse exhibits Meyerbeer's fine notion of effect; altogether, particularly in the hands of the great Staudigl, it is a most powerful production, full of learning and beauty.

CRIVELLI'S ART OF SINGING.—The author of this work, who is the son of a celebrated singer, and inherits from him all the knowledge of "the beautiful" in his charming pursuit, has produced a thing most inimical to his own interests and those of his brother professors, that is, if it were read and studied with that attention which its merits deserve, no other master would be necessary! It is a most compendious treatise on every department of science, care, and study necessary to the development (and even formation) of the vox humana, so expanded by experienced and well-founded rules, both of the knowledge and taste which we frequently distinguish themselves above mere physical endowment, and which make the singer of mind the singer par excellence!

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT CHAT.

WANTED!—A POET LAUREATE!—His Majesty the King of the French wishing to compliment Queen Victoria in a peculiarly nice manner, on Monday last sent for M. Auber, and receiving him with his usual affability, said, "Eh bien! M. Auber. We must have by to-morrow night, or Wednesday morning at farthest, an ode" (his Majesty's exact words were une cantate) "to celebrate and commemorate the auspicious visit of her Britannic Majesty to Eu." "Sire, it is impossible," replied M. Auber, astounded. "Why?" "The time is so short." "Ah! your are always thinking of time." Au reste, it must be done." "But I have no theme." "Pooh! pooh! you have her Majesty. You will act under positive inspiration." "I mean, Sire, that I have no poem." "No poem. A la bonne heure. Let us have a poet forthwith." And, according to the royal mandate, an impromptu scribe was found forthwith, plainly showing that Poeta nascitur et fit, or at least made to fit on occasions.

GRAND OPERA, PARIS.—Donizetti's opera "Les Martyrs" has been reproduced at this theatre with greater success than on its first appearance some seasons back. Duprez and Dorus Gras sang and acted magnificently, as did also Massol in his original rôle of Severus.

DEATH OF MR. CHARLES ASHLEY.—This veteran violoncellist expired suddenly on Tuesday, from apoplexy, in the 72nd year of his age. He was one of the principal performers at the commemoration of Handel in 1786.

CARLOTTA GRISI.—This vocalist-danseuse has been engaged by Mr. Bunn for Drury Lane. A M. Petipa, from the Académie Royale, Paris, has also been engaged.

MRS. ALFRED SHAW.—This charming cantatrice will appear in the course of the ensuing Drury season in some novelties now in preparation for her.

PAGANINI.—This accomplished singer and actor has just taken his leave of the public of Marseilles by a gratuitous performance of Figaro for a public charity. He thence proceeds to St. Petersburg, to meet Rubini, Lablache, and other distinguished vocalists.

A NEW PIANOFORTE.—A Monsieur Montal has just made a discovery in the mechanism of the pianoforte, which he calls "mécanique à répétition expressive," by which the touch will be enabled to give the most delicate gradations of tone and sentiment, without raising the finger from the key. The improvement was publicly exhibited last week at Paris, in M. Montal's new salons, to a crowd of scientific and artistical distingués, and met with unqualified approbation.

The celebrated historical painter, Paul Delaroche, had been summoned to Eu by the King of the French, to paint a picture of the first meeting between his Majesty and the Queen of England. The eminent marine painter, Morel-Fatio, had also been summoned to the same royal residence, in order to record the landing of her Majesty at Treport. Both pictures are intended for the Versailles gallery.

On Monday last a court-martial was held by the officers of the troops stationed at Carmarthen, to try a private of the 4th Light Dragoons, and a private of the 76th Infantry, for getting drunk and striking their superior officers.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

SPEAKING-MACHINE.

A Hamburg correspondent of the Athenæum, gives an account of an invention which is attracting great attention there—"the sprach-machine," or speaking-machine of M. Faber, a native of Freiburg, who has, he states, overcome the difficulty which so many have experienced in their attempts to construct an instrument which should imitate the tones of the human voice. It consists of a caoutchouc imitation of the larynx, tongue, and nostrils, a pair of bellows worked by a pedal, and a set of keys by which the springs are brought into action. The weather affects the tension of the India-rubber, and though M. Faber can raise the voice or depress it, and lay stress upon the particular word or syllable, still, he says, there is room for improvement, and this is even more evident when the instrument is made to sing.

FLATTERING PREFERENCE.

Two natives of the Marquesas (cannibal) Islands, have been carried to France. The story runs, that on the voyage one of their fellow passengers asked which they liked best, the French or the English? "The English," answered the man, smacking his lips, "they are the fattest."

LORD STOWELL AND SIGHT-SEEING.

Lord Stowell used to boast that there was not a sight in London he had not seen, and, according to a current story, he had seen some more than once. He was paying his shilling to see a new mermaid, when the man at the door, apparently ashamed to cheat so good a customer, refused to take the money, saying—"No, no, my lord; it is only the cold say sarpent!"

MAD DOCTORS.

It happened that, in 1787, Miss Boydell, the niece of Alderman Boydell, was shot at in the street by a man who was arrested on the spot. Her clothes were set on fire, but she suffered no serious injury, and, indeed, it was never proved that the pistols were loaded with any thing destructive. The prisoner turned out to be a medical practitioner named Elliot. On his trial the defence set up was insanity, in proof of which Dr. Simmons, physician to St. Luke's, came forward among other witnesses. The doctor, in order to show the disordered state of the unhappy man's mind, produced in court a paper which Elliot had sent to him, for the purpose of being presented to the Royal Society, but which the doctor thought too visionary for that learned body. He called the attention of the court particularly to a passage, in which the author asserted "that the sun is not a body of fire—but been hitherto supposed, but that its light proceeds from a dense and universal aurora, which surrounds it and emits light to the inhabitants of that body's surface beneath, and yet be at such a distance aloft as not to annoy them. No objection," he proceeds to say, "arneth to that luminary, being inhabited, and vegetation may obtain there as well as with us. There may be water and dry land, hills and dales, rain and fair weather; and, as the light, so the season must be eternal; consequently it may be easily conceived to be by far the most blissful habitation of the whole system." Here then we find adduced as a proof of the madness of Mr. Elliot the very doctrine which Herschel promulgated with much applause eight years later.

DEATH OF GREAT MEN.

To thinking minds, time is seldom so unpressively marked, its clock seldom heard so audibly and solemnly, as when the successive removal of our great men of an age. The constellation which ushered in the present age was gorgeous one by one—Goethe, Scott, Byron, Coleridge, Lamb, Lovedpeared, and now Wordsworth has gone after them. Wordsworth, indeed, remains yet a little while, but he is now bereft of all his great companions, of all those with whom he has passed his active years. There is something, we say, supremely sad and solemn in these departures. It is not merely the exciting feelings of an age, and what lives are removed, as of course over us, the ground seems taken from under our feet, we feel as though a charge of desperation were at hand, as though all future opening before us.

HOGS AND WAX CANDLES.

At the presentments of the British Association of Science in Cork, a curious method, recently adopted in the United States, of bringing their hogs prime to market, was mentioned by one of the sections. It appears that as the pigs, near the vale of the Mississippi, cannot be brought to profitable market as an article of food, they are converted by a chemical process into wax and oil, in which form they are readily transported, and the pigs of the Mississippi are thus converted into wax candles for illuminating our drawing-rooms! The oil is of excellent quality and well adapted for lubricating machinery, for which purpose the bear sperm oil has hitherto been most used. The custom of the North Americans, who carry on the business of converting pigs into wax candles, is to drive the animals into the woods, where they feed for some months on the acorns, &c., and they are fattened for one month on Indian corn, by which time they are quite ready for the process of conversion, and they are boiled en masse, fat and lean together, when the state of the provision market make it profitable to spare some of the hams.

AN ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.

There are few of our fellow-citizens, we should suppose, but must have been more or less familiar with the sight of the old half-witted individual who, for a long series of years past, has been known about town under the cognomen of "Sir Peter Simon." We have also heard that he died in the Royal Infirmary on the 1st of the present month. As his only known source of livelihood for the last thirty years was a species of begging, it has been generally supposed that, after what the outward man certainly indicated him to be—very poor; but, on opening his house the other day, in Lochend's close, Canongate, bank receipts were found in his possession for nearly the sum of £30 of which had been deposited in the month of March last. Besides the money we have referred to, there was found in his house a large collection of old hats and shoes, which he had collected from his "friends," as well as an excellent stock of black cloth coats, which he apparently never had worn. He had also about a cartload of stones in his room, in the shape of geological specimens. Considering the comfortable manner in which our knight managed to provide his living, and the sum which he contrived to accumulate, some of our readers will be apt to suppose that Peter's composition was not deficient of a certain amount of cunning—a conclusion which, we dare say, will not be far from the truth. We understand that a brother has just arrived from Australia to look after his affairs.—Edinburgh paper.

FISHING EXTRAORDINARY.

The Dumfries Courier, which is rather remarked for dealing in the marvellous, but yet obtains a wonderful degree of credence, contained last week the following:—"A few days ago the Isle of Tiree was visited by a shoal of whales, which were no sooner observed than several boats put to sea to surround them. The 'leaders' were shaving a creek, when a native, Mr. D. Maclean, who chanced to be riding by, jumped off his horse, taking with him the bridle and his trusty dirk. It is well known that, if one whale heads, and is stranded, the rest of the shoal, by some fatality, follow, and are easily secured. Mr. Maclean, seeing the leader quite close, jumped into the water, and stabbed it in the belly. The monster plunged back to the saline element, it turned belly up. Donald put his bridle about its tail, and swam with it to an adjacent boat! In this manner the unequal fight continued for about an hour; when Mr. Maclean, after having secured eleven whales, felt exhausted, and had to give up the contest."

QUESTION OF PRIORITY

Our worthy contemporary, the Post, has lately set up the following paragraph:—"POPE OR PRIOR.—There is a silly article in the Examiner of the 19th of August about the Church, which contains a paragraph beginning thus:—'Pope's gentle dying of the sarfeit of salmon, calls with his last breath for the jow, so the Church, &c. As the Examiner, if clever in anything, is so in its allusions to well-known plays and poems, we beseech to call this an unfortunate blunder. Every one, however, may remember, that in the first of the moral essays of Pope, occur the following lines:—

'A salmon's belly, Helluo, was thy fate;
The doctor call'd declares all help too late:
Mercy, cries Helluo, mercy on my soul,
Is there no hope? Alas! then bring the jowl.'"

Facile hic plus minus est quam olim fuit in Eva," as he genteelly classics himself, borrowed many a good thing without acknowledgment.

NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN.

We learn from Cicero and Pausanius, that there was a Temperance Society established in Sparta under the name of Philitia, which word in its Greek derivation may be traced to frugality, or sobriety. We should like to know if our modern reformers are acquainted with this historical fact?

THRESHED INTO MATRIMONY.

It has been often and very much deplored by many a match-making mamma (like Lady Bumbazede at the Haymarket), that bachelors have segregated themselves from all agreeable society, and formed themselves into CLUBS. What a pity they do not revive the old Lacedæmonian law, by which the women were allowed to publicly insult and beat every old "single fellow!" visit, "ex defensionde," in case he was last obliged to double himself and his expenses too by taking a wife

A CONSIDERATE THUNDERBOLT.

We find the following in Gentleman's Mesenger:—"The electric fluid entered a house, near Clermont (Haute-Marne), on the 20th ult., and went three times round the kitchen. It then took off the cap of the woman of the house without doing her any harm. From there it passed to a stable, and killed two fowls and a cow, leaving several other animals untouched. It finally disappeared through a hayrick, but not setting the hay on fire."

John Walsh, a philomath of Cork, where the British Association lately held their meetings, threw down his glove to the whole of that body, defying them to prove that any one proposition of geometry had been correctly demonstrated before his new elements of the science made their appearance. Newton (according to this new light) "never invente l a single fact in mathematics and astronomy, but by false reasoning and quackery had seriously retarded the progress of both;" and as for any modern dabbler in the dark, "I will meet him," saith Walsh, "in the Cork papers, and slate him as I slated the late Dr. Lloyd, provost, Dr. O'Brien, now Bishop of Ossory, and the Rev. Mr. Luby, in the University of Dublin." Slating, in Cork, has been found before this to be rather an unpleasant operation.

the many heartfelt demonstrations of respect, all that could be was done, to give her Majesty that reception which should show how much they valued the honour conferred on them. The whole of the depôts at Parkhurst Barracks, about 600 strong, comprising those of the 42nd Highlanders, the Rifles, Fusiliers, &c., were marched into town at an early hour to form a guard of honour, and were stationed along the edge of the Parade, extending themselves from the Club-house to the Marine Hotel causeway, and presented arms when the royal cortège was passing. The evening displayed every kind of rejoicing on shore. Fireworks and illuminations on an extensive scale, both ashore and afloat, wound up the day, and gave the whole the appearance of a fairy scene. Her Majesty remained on board, where she dined and slept.

One of the most conspicuous objects of interest on first arriving in the roadstead from the eastward, is the never-to-be-forgotten "Norris Castle," a view of which from the roads we present our readers. Here it was that her Majesty spent many of her happiest moments; and we can easily conceive the delight of our Sovereign on again visiting this her once favourite and endeared residence.

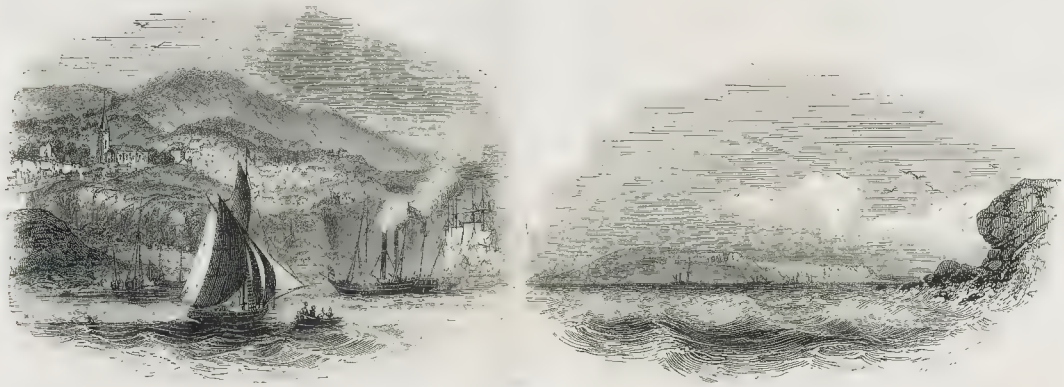
On Tuesday, at early dawn, her Majesty rose, and, without any state or ceremony whatever, embarked in the royal barge, and proceeded on board the Kestrel, where the royal party was received by the noble Commodore of the Royal Yacht Squadron, and conducted by him over the vessel. Her Majesty, at half-past eight, again embarked in the royal barge, and was steered by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence towards the harbour. On passing the Castle and Squadron House, salutes were fired from each of the batteries. The R. Y. S. causeway or landing-place was soon covered with carpet, in the expectation that her Majesty would probably land thereon; but the royal party did not land at West Cowes, as has been stated in the various papers; and the royal barge proceeded up the harbour along the West Cowes side of the river, and then was pulled across to East Cowes, where her Majesty, H. R. H. Prince Albert, and suite disembarked at the landing-place in front of the Medina Hotel and Royal Thames Yacht Club House, amidst the cheers of the inhabitants; where carpets had been spread for the royal visitors to walk upon to the carriages of Lord Delaware and George Henry Ward, Esq., of Northwood Park, which had been sent over in readiness to convey them to Norris Castle. So unexpected was the early visit of her Majesty, that neither the corporation of Newport, as conservatives of the Medina, nor the harbour-master, were prepared to accompany the royal barge, or pilot it between the mud banks of the East and West Medina; and thus her Majesty was received on landing by the only naval officer at the port, Lieutenant John Spurin, R.N., commanding the Coast Guard station at East Cowes, who had the whole of the Coast Guardmen drawn up as a guard of honour, and who presented arms to the royal visitors when passing to and from the landing-place.

THE ROYAL VISIT TO NORRIS CASTLE.

Her Majesty entered the carriages at twenty minutes to nine o'clock, and in a few minutes was again in her favourite Norris, on entering which, her Majesty required no assistance in finding her former apartments, but immediately pointed out to her Royal Consort that "this was my room, and this was mine also." What were the feelings of our beloved Sovereign at this moment pen could not describe; but every person of mind and taste will frame to themselves an idea of the feelings of our Island Queen at these happy moments, and the various reminiscences which must, in those few moments, have crowded on the mind of her Majesty; in a word, "all the joys of childhood."

On the return of the royal party her Majesty took the new road, and came through the "Duchess of Kent's Gate," the entrance to the splendid estate of George Eyre Brooks Esq., and having taken a view of the improvements now progressing on that estate, and the numerous villas in the course of erection, the royal party proceeded along the "Albert and Victoria Groves," and passed close to the church designed by the royal architect Nash), the foundation-stone of which was laid by her Majesty when Princess, in company with her illustrious mother, in September, 1831.

At twenty minutes past nine her Majesty again alighted from her carriage amid the cheers of her subjects, and embarked in her barge, and was soon alongside the royal steamer, which at about ten o'clock got under way, followed by the Cyclops, Prometheus, Lightning, and other steamers. Her Majesty's ship Warspite and brig Grecian left the roads the previous night, and proceeded towards Plymouth. Her Majesty's ship Modeste saluted the royal yacht en passant, and then got under way. The royal yacht, accompanied by the men-of-war steamers, proceeded towards the eastward, round the back of the island, with the intention, it was rumoured, of landing at Ventnor, to which place a despatch had been sent overland, and where carriages were in readiness to convey the royal party to Appuldurcombe House, the seat of the Earl of Yarborough. The royal yacht, accompanied by the steamers, continued its course onward, keeping as near as possible to the shore, to afford the royal party the opportunity of seeing the variety of beauties and miniature landscapes, as well as the gigantic scenery of the Undercliff, with which this part of the island abounds. At noon the royal steamer neared Ventnor, followed by four men-of-war steamers, and accompanied by several yachts, among which we observed the Xarifa, belonging to the Earl of Wilton, and the Gem, the Marquis of Ormonde. At first it was thought, from the yacht approaching so near the shore, that her Majesty would land at Ventnor, and the Breakwater Committee were in readiness on the cliff to give her a welcome. On observing the Royal Standard, a royal salute was fired from the heights, at the same time the hills reverberated with the salutes from the private battery of the castle at Steephill, the seat of J. Hambrough, Esq., and from the fort of Lord Yarborough, at St. Lawrence. Flags were flying in all directions, and the hills of the Undercliff were thronged with people. From the immense concourse assembled, it was evident that all, but the bedridden, had abandoned their homes. The whole sight was splendid in the extreme, such as never before had been witnessed in that locality. Her Majesty did not land, but the royal fleet continued its course after leaving the Needles for Weymouth, where the royal yacht came to anchor in Portland Roads for the night.



VENTNOR, ISLE OF WIGHT. PORTLAND ROADS.

Prince Albert, attended by the great officers of state, next visited Portland Castle, and was received on the beach by Captain Manning, who was attended by Lieutenant Inskip, R.N., commanding the Coast Guard station; the men being in full uniform, and presenting arms on the landing and departure of the royal party. The illustrious Prince and his distinguished attendants were conducted over the castle by Captain Manning, after which they walked through one or two of the principal villages. About a quarter before nine, a brilliant display of fireworks took place at the castle, in honour of the Queen's visit. Captain Manning had the honour of accompanying Prince Albert back to the royal yacht, when the gallant officer was introduced to her Majesty's presence, and presented the Queen with a copy of "Buckingham's History of the Towns of Weymouth and Dorchester, with Portland, Maiden Castle, &c.," superbly bound in crimson morocco, with the following inscription on the cover:—"An humble tribute of respect to her Majesty Queen Victoria, from her faithful subjects of the royal manor of Portland." Immediately on its being known that her Majesty had arrived in Portland Roads, the mayor and corporation of Weymouth, with the civic regalia, put off in the corporation-barge for the Roads, and approached the royal yacht. After being announced, her Majesty signified her royal pleasure to receive the mayor of Weymouth, on which his worship went on board, and was immediately conducted by the Lord in Waiting to the Queen and Prince Albert, who expressed their sense of the loyalty and attention of the mayor and inhabitants, and said that the want of time alone prevented their landing at Weymouth. Admiral Sir W. Hotham, K.C.B., and Admiral Hancock went off to pay their respects to their gracious Sovereign and Prince Albert, and were presented by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence.

THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT LANDING AT DEVONPORT DOCKYARD.

In the evening, large bonfires were lighted up on the Nothe and other heights facing Portland. At ten o'clock, there was a grand display of fireworks on the Look-out, and also from the Adelaide and Peterel cutters, in Weymouth Roads, which had a brilliant effect. Shortly after, the royal yacht came to anchor in Portland Roads, as seen in the engraving, the Ariel received orders to proceed to the westward with private despatches.

On Wednesday morning, her Majesty and Prince Albert rose at six o'clock, and at five minutes before eight o'clock the yacht got under way for Plymouth, receiving a royal salute from the battery of Portland Castle; and salutes from the Nothe station and the Adelaide revenue cutter. The royal yacht was accompanied by several steamers. Her Majesty was in excellent health and spirits, having enjoyed a good night's repose. Prince Albert was also in good health, and, with the Queen, looked happy and well. The royal yacht went down channel in good style, and as the day turned out beautifully fine, her Majesty and the Prince must have been highly delighted with the whole line of the coast.

[We regret here to record the occurrence of a dreadful accident. It appears that the royal yacht, on arriving off the harbour of Lyme Regis, shaped her course for the landslip, towards which point a general movement was made by a large number of persons, who had congregated to see her Majesty. Among other equestrians thus proceeding towards the landslip, was J. Jacques de Bruen, Esq. His horse, a spirited animal, went at a rapid pace towards the cliff, and on approaching the brink, made a sudden stop; and it is supposed that Mr. de Bruen, on perceiving the danger, and in disengaging himself from the horse, rolled over the frightful precipice—a depth of two hundred feet! The unfortunate gentleman survived but an hour and a half after the accident. The feelings of his brother and friends, who witnessed the awful scene from the private carriage of the deceased gentleman, may be more easily conceived than described. The deceased was a remarkably fine young man, a wealthy merchant of Holland, and only in his 24th year. A coroner's inquest has been held on the body, when the jury returned a verdict of — Accidental death.]

To return to the royal progress; of which we shall now speak more in detail, as the narrative of the excursion, after the departure of the royal squadron from Portland Roads, appeared only in our late edition of last week.

The royal squadron coasted as near the Dorsetshire shore as they conveniently could, under the careful pilotage of Lieutenant Crispin, of the Vulcan steamer, who embarked in the yacht at Weymouth. The Queen was highly delighted with the scenery, and with great animation made constant inquiries as to the names of places, and the owners of houses which met her view. The neighbourhood from the Exe to the Start attracted her notice; and when off Dartmouth the yacht was brought to, the royal barge was lowered, and her Majesty and Prince Albert and their suite entered, and, steered by Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, made a tour of the harbour. After remaining off Dartmouth for about an hour and a half, the yacht was again got under way; and still keeping the awful cliffs in the vicinity of the Bolt Head and Bolt Tail close aboard, the vessel rounded the Plymouth Mewstone at half past five, and passing round the east end of the Breakwater, took up moorings in Barnpool, under salutes from the Caledonia, Formidable, Inconstant, a Neapolitan double-banked frigate, the Apollo, Virago, Dolphin, and her own escort; as well as so as the batteries of the Citadel, St. Nicholas Island, Mount Edgecumbe, and Mount Wise. The authorities immediately paid their respects; in the evening a magnificent bonfire, of some hundreds of tar-barrels, was lighted up in the Hoe; and all the ships in the Sound were illuminated and decorated with blue and other lights, and threw up flights of rockets.

BONFIRE ON THE HOE, PLYMOUTH.

At about half-past nine o'clock on Thursday morning, a royal salute announced that her Majesty had left the royal yacht, which, being moored in Barnpool, was only a few yards from the private landing-place of the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe. The noble earl had caused a temporary platform to be erected, and steps leading therefrom to the water's edge, for the convenience of her Majesty's landing. Her Majesty was attended to the shore by the Lords of the Admiralty in full uniform, who then returned to the royal yacht to wait on Prince Albert.

Her Majesty then commenced a ramble through that "fair and famed domain, where stately beech, chestnut, and towering pines, appearing to outvie each other, upstretch their lofty heads, and scorn the wintry blast."

Just before 11 o'clock, another royal salute from the ships and batteries announced that Prince Albert had left the royal yacht; and about 11 o'clock, his Royal Highness, attended by the Lords of the Admiralty and their Secretary, in full uniform, arrived at the landing stairs of the dockyard, at Devonport. A guard of honour (marines), with the marine band, were drawn up at the pier, and on his landing, the Prince was received at the top of the stairs by the Rear-Admiral Sir S. Pym, K.C.B., the superintendent, and the heads of the departments; the guard presenting arms, and the band playing the national anthem. The Prince was then conducted through the establishment, and embarked again at half-past 12. The men of the dockyard had a holiday granted them by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

Her Majesty held a levee on board the royal yacht, which was attended by Lord Haddington, Honourable Sydney Herbert, Admiral Sir George Seymour, the Hon. G. L. Corry, Admiral Sir David Milne, Lord Aberdeen, the Earl of Liverpool, &c. Among the presentations to her Majesty were Sir S. Fym, the Admiral, superintendent of the Dockyard; Capt. Sir F. Fellowes, superintendent of the Victualling-yard; Col. Beattie, commandant of Marines; the clergy of Plymouth, Stonehouse, and Devonport; the mayors, aldermen, and councils of Devonport and Plymouth; and all the officers in command of her Majesty's ships and vessels in the Sound and the harbour, the captain of the Neapolitan frigate La Regina, &c. Addresses to her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert from the corporations of Devonport and Plymouth were presented by Lord Aberdeen.

A few minutes after three o'clock, the hunder of the ships-of-war gave notice of the Queen having left the yacht, and the first chime of the half-hour had scarcely struck when the guns of the garrison proclaimed that her Majesty had landed. The Queen and Prince Albert were received upon their landing by the naval authorities of the dockyard, and by Gen. Murray, the military commander-in-chief of the district, who was attended by a very numerous body of officers, all mounted. Her Majesty and the Prince having taken their seats in one of the royal carriages, which was an open one, drawn by four horses, immediately left the dockyard, escorted by the general and his staff. As soon as the Queen and Prince Albert made their appearance outside the dockyard gates they were received with enthusiastic cheering by the assembled multitude. The first carriage was occupied solely by the Queen and Prince Albert, the others contained the Earls of Aberdeen and Liverpool, and others of the household.

The royal cortège, after passing through Devonport and along the Union-road, was met at the boundary of the borough of Plymouth by the mayor, the town council, and corporate officers, accompanied by the borough police, who preceded her Majesty through the streets leading to the Hoe; and returned thence by nearly the same route to the borough boundary, on the Stonehouse-mill-bridge, where the authorities of Plymouth took their leave.

After leaving Plymouth, the procession returned through Devonport, headed by the mayor, to the dockyard, when her Majesty re-embarked, and went on board the yacht. Her Majesty remained a short time on board;

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

PROTESTANT MISSION TO JERUSALEM.—The rector of St. Thomas, Winchester, the Rev. W. D. Veitch, has been appointed examining chaplain to the Bishop of Jerusalem, and also head master of the Missionary College of that diocese.

OXFORD, Sept. 5.—This morning intelligence was received of the death of the Rev. J. E. Bridges, D.D., President of Corpus Christi College. Dr. Bridges died on Sunday last at Hyères, in the south of France, where he had gone in the hope that change of air would benefit his health, which for some time past has been very indifferent. The rev. doctor was elected president of his college in 1813.

OXFORD, Sept. 6.—This morning died the Rev. Anthony Grayson, D.D., Principal of St. Alban Hall. Dr. Grayson was formerly Fellow of Queen's College, and was appointed principal of the hall in 1824. The right of nomination, unlike that of the other halls, is vested in the Society of Queen's College; a senior Fellow of which generally succeeds to the appointment. It is supposed that the Rev. William Thompson, M.A., nephew of Dr. Grayson's predecessor, will be the new Principal.

"Providence," says a trite axiom, "supplies the victuals, but ——," worse luck, sends the cooks!" If old Scratch furnishes the Yorkshire cuisine, he's a better fellow than prejudice makes him. Should the reader be sceptical we ask him to try one specimen, and then to give his opinion on an honest man with an honest palate. Let him only have accustomed morning's meal, a slice (or slices) of a roasted York ham, the first cut of the antecedent day's dressing. By the spirit (or essence) of Mrs. Glass, it maketh our mouth to water the very thought of such matters are fatness! a most favourable opportunity for the experiment will be the race meeting at Doncaster in the ensuing week, for, of all the savoury merry-makings in Europe, that is the place for the flesh-pots. Nowhere in England is the course of feeding more orthodox, and, if there be a solitary exception to the general rule of our readers who have never been to the great northern races, let him depart by that night's train (if haply he inhabit the great city), and should the running not come up to his standard, our word for it, he shall find something crazy enough to content him.

Thus having despatched the company, it becomes us to advertise them of the entertainment they may expect. The approaching meeting at Doncaster will partake of the éclat of the last—that is to say, the 1000*l.* squeezed out of the corporation last year by the indolence and good-nature of the Jockey Club will be also forthcoming in the present on the same principle of pecus forte et dure. The present anniversary closes the five-day meetings; in future the number will be, very wisely, restricted to four. As usual, the two great days will be the Tuesday and Thursday, the former so elevated by its Leger, the latter by its Cup. Either through natural or unnatural causes, there is always a sensation upon the St. Leger; very often a robbery, if, indeed, that ought to be considered anything out of the common on the turf. This year a very handsome premium for a shindy has been held out since Epsom. If backing a horse odds all through the summer over the St. Leger cannot ensure us a row at Doncaster, then let the glory of the north for ever be departed. The Cup is ordinarily a more smooth affair, as the entries for it are only made a few days prior to the event; still we must not despair even of it, for not long since Harkaway assisted us to an energetic émeute that gave great zest to the Thursday's flavour. Lord Eglinton, the steward, has announced his determination to war to the knife with all defaulters who shall attempt to pollute the spots where rainy gentlefolk congregate, with their nauseous presence. Should this resolution be carried upon, without favour or affection, his lordship will help us to the most select m.eting ever known in this land. Most perilous dealings of promoting the success of races announce the facilities for reaching as inducements for visiting them. In our desires to supply Doncaster with company, we have to show how the visitor can get away. Those who only wish to be present when the Leger is run for may leave town by the mail train on Monday night, bonking themselves to Rotherham. Thus they will arrive at Doncaster to breakfast (and let them forget the roast ham) on Tuesday morning, have lots of time for the rooms, and, having seen the event decided which brought them down, they may return to London by 8 A.M. on Wednesday morning; or, if they will find the excursion to their taste we undertake to ensure, if haply it jumps with their humours to flavour good fare with good sport. Such promise of pleasure for the coming week at Doncaster offers: its business on Thursday at Tattersall's stood thus:—

ST. LEGER.—6 to 4 on Mr. Bowes's Coltherstone (take 7 to 4); 10 to 1 agst Lord Chesterfield's Priizefighter (taken); 20 to 1 agst Mr. Wrabter's Nutwith (take 12 to 1); 20 to 1 agst Lord Exeter's Lucetta colt (take 25 to 1).

Latest betting at Warwick, Thursday:—7 to 4 on Cotherstone; 10 to 1 agst Lucetta c.; 11 to 1 agst Nutwith; 11 to 1 agst Prizefighter; 20 to 1 agst Dumpling. Lucetta c. and Prizefighter in great force.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

DRILLING IN THE ARMY.—It is stated that, in consequence of the recent tragical occurrence in the 4th Regiment at Parramatta, an order is to be issued from the Horse Guards, directing a uniform system of drill for the entire British army.

Officers commanding regiments, whether abroad or at home, may in future profit-onally mention the name of good-conduct drill immediately after they shall have fully satisfied themselves, by careful inspection of the Returns of Service, and of the Regimental Defaulters' Book, that the respective claims are properly entitled to that reward.

HER MAJESTY'S Lug Pantomo was lost on the 24th ——— June, on a reef called Las Pepas, below Colonia. The crew were all saved, and the gu- had been landed, and taken to Lobos.

RETURN OF THE SOUTH SEA EXPEDITION.—Captain Sir John Ross has just returned from his voyage of exploration to the South Seas. He transacted business at the Admiralty on Tuesday, having run up to town, leavin. his ship at Portsmouth. The gallant sailor was in excellent health and spirits, and expressed the greatest satisfaction at the result of his voyage.

ON TUESDAY detachments of the 2nd Light Dragoons and 9th Lancers, consisting of one field officer, one second officer and 34 ranks and file of the 3rd, and an officer (Cornet King), two non-commissioned officers, and ninety-eight rank and fi ——— left quarters from the Cavalry Depot, Maidstone, to Gravesend, to embark on the Queen, for Bengal, to join their regiments.

FRANKFORT.—The approaching review of the 10th Corps of the Army of Hanover will be very brilliant; a considerable number of Princes are expected to be present, at which the King of Hanover will command. Besides the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, they expect the King of Bavaria, the Grand Dukes of Mecklenburg and Oldenburg, the Dukes of Brunswick and Nassau, and the veteran British hero the Duke of Wellington, besides many members of the German princely families.

ARRIVALS.—Commander Samuel Winford, to the Sea Josef guard-ship, vice Hoskins. Commander R. C. Rustead is appointed to the Apollo, 20, troop-ship, vice Frederick. Master James Underwood, to the ——— ship.

PRIZE MONEY.—Iris, Cambrian, Rattlesnake, Zebra, and Cameleon.—The officers and crews of those vessels, as also of the Sirius of January, and list of February, 1826, were paid in the capture of goods from a nest of pirates at the island Carabuse, will have the following respective proportions of the net proceeds paid to them on and after the 15th inst.:—Flag (the lion's share), £617 15s. 9d., first-class £15 18s. 11d., second £3 11s. 8d., third £1 11s. 10d. fourth 18s 3d., fifth 9s. 7d., sixth 4s. 9d., seventh 2s. 2d., eighth 1s. 7d

EPITOME OF NEWS.

The Poor-law Commissioners have decided that the payment of the salary of vestry clerks is illegal where any such payment is made out of the poor-rates.——A branch railway is now in contemplation to unite the town of Salisbury with the South-Western Railway at Bishopstoke. It will take two years to construct.——It has created some sensation amongst the capitalists of Frankfort that the United States Government has withdrawn its agency from the firm of the Rothschilds, and has transferred it to the Barings. The mistrust which the Rothschilds expressed on occasion of the last American loan is said to be the cause of this measure.——The King of the Belgians arrived at Frankfort on the 26th ult., on his return from Aschaffenburgh, where his Majesty had been on a short visit to the King of Bavaria.——Her Majesty the Queen Dowager has presented the munificent donation of £50, through the Right Hon. the Earl Howe, towards the building fund of the Queen's College at Birmingham, for the residence of medical students.——A young man was drowned a few days ago at Nottingham through trusting to a life-preserver, which slipped down about his middle and held his head under water.——Two mechanics were suffocated by foul air near Ripley in Yorkshire last week whilst attempting to descend in a well for the purpose of sinking a pump.——The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have issued orders that from henceforward the Madeira, West Indian, Mexican, and Mediterranean mails are to be embarked and landed at Southampton, instead of at Falmouth, by which the steam-ships will be allowed to proceed direct to their destinations, and the delays that have hitherto occurred will be avoided.——It is understood that Lord Aberdeen's absence with her Majesty in France has occasioned the negotiation for a new commercial treaty with Brazil, as likewise the tariff question with Portugal, to be delayed; but that on his lordship's return both will be commenced in earnest.——A letter from Athens, Aug. 10, states that a gang of twenty-six coiners, Greeks, Turks, Italians, and French, have been discovered and arrested in that city, and handed over to justice. They had been occupied in the fabrication of Greek crowns and French two franc pieces. Other parties connected with this gang, to the number of upwards of 200, have been since arrested, many of whom by birth and fortune belong to the higher ranks of society.——The same epidemic which last year infected a great number of cattle has again manifested itself. The early symptoms of the disease are difficulty of breathing, accompanied with a slight cough; and, if not taken in the first stage, and early remedies procured, it is almost sure to prove fatal.——The subscription in aid of the new movement on the part of the National School Society already exceeds £90,000. Of this sum 530 individuals have contributed not less than £70,000.——We understand that the noble-minded individual who, under the title of "Minimus," lately gave £500 to the City Mission, is Mr. Buget, of Totteridge.——Mr. Callaghan, M.P., has offered his services as one of the 100 "delegates" to form Mr. O'Connell's Repeal Parliament.——The Duke de Rovigo, who has recently incurred the ire of Mr. O'Connell, for his animadversions on the repeal movement, is married to the niece of Mrs. M'Crea, wife of the Rev. J. B. M'Crea, the independent minister, formerly of Dublin, now preaching at the Congregational Chapel, Arundel.——The last audit of the Government Danes savings' bank presents the following figures:—Deposits, £353,358 8s.; payments and disbursements, £212 956 1s. 1d.; paid to Government by way of annuities, varying from £4 to £20, the sum of £190,407 1s. 11d.——An Act of George III., c. 85, sec. 8, enacts that all who neglect to pay the rate for the relief of the poor, due and demanded of them, are not entitled to vote or be present at vestries held for making such rates, is being revived, and the parochial authorities of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, have given notice that they will enforce a rigorous adherence to the provisions of the Act.——The Brighton and Dieppe Company have determined to add another splendid steam-ship to their line of vessels, already so remarkable for everything to be desired in ships to be employed in in such service. The new vessel is to be the same size as the Biberma.——It is rumoured that Louis Philippe will return the visit of her Majesty to the continent, and that the Archbishop of Canterbury gave an entertainment on Tuesday at Addington Park, to the ministers of his diocese and their wives.——There are about 260 prisoners in the Queen's Prison, and between 300 and 400 in Whitecross-street. In the former the inmates are only allowed one quart of porter a day each, and the visitor can be admitted for six in the evening, but may continue until nine o'clock.——Considerable numbers of Irish reapers have made their appearance in Liverpool within the last few days, on their way back to Ireland—a proof that the harvest is pretty nearly ended in the south.——The excavations for a nunnery, to contain thirty inmates, between the village of Sibsey and Ratcliffe Hall, Leicestershire, were commenced last week.——The third annual dinner of the subscribers to the British Swimming Society was held on Tuesday evening at the Freemasons' Tavern, Thomas Wakley, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The dinner was well attended.——Thomas Hart, beerseller, Hailwell, near Leeds, christened his twenty-ninth child on Sunday. Of that number twenty-five are still alive.——It is said to be intended to hold a Dissenting Convention at Birmingham, as soon as the arrangements can be matured, the object being to cement more closely the union of the sects, as it respects advices and remittances; for in consequence of the established regularity of the arrivals for so long a period, bills are drawn and accepted to correspond to the dates with the utmost confidence.

EXPENSIVE RETURNS.—As a proof of the enormous and unnecessary expense to which the country is yearly put by members of Parliament moving for returns, it may be stated that during the last session one return connected with one of the metropolitan prisons, moved for in the House of Commons, occupied three clerks upwards of thirty days, and contained, amongst other particulars, the dietary of 1 lb. loaf per day for every prisoner, although that it was almost more than a man could carry, and the printing of it cost about £2000.

STATE OF SOUTH WALES.—By the latest accounts it appears that the disturbances in South Wales, it appears that toll-bars are now sinking in importance as a grievance; in fact, most of them are either down or abolished, and objections to the New Four Pay and no tithes, and to high rents, are beginning to stand in the front rank. The tithe-payers now say, "We are determined that no clergyman shall receive more than £100 a year from tithes." In nine cases out of ten they do not receive so much, and very often from every source united not £100 a year in the aggregate.

It is rumoured that a grave has been dug in Dynevor Park, near Llandilo, the seat of Lord Dynevor, the father of Colonel Trevor, the Vice-Lord-Lieutenant of the county, and a notice has been sent to Colonel Trevor that it is intended for him, and that he is to be laid in it before the 10th of October. As may be easily supposed this has given rise to very serious apprehensions.

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.—A young woman of respectable appearance, named Hannah Augusta Brimley, alias Horton, was placed at the bar, before Mr. Hall, charged with obtaining goods under false pretences. Inspector Otway said the prisoner had been convicted about two years back, at Brighton, on a charge of forgery, and received sentence of transportation for seven years; but, in consequence of the intercession of certain influential persons, the punishment was commuted to two years' imprisonment in Lewes jail, from which place she had only a few weeks been discharged.—Mr. Levinson, outfitter, 61, Cockspur street, stated that on Thursday last the prisoner came to his shop and asked for an outfit for a person about to proceed to the East Indies. She gave her address, 13, Paragon, Kent-road, and on a reference being required, also gave the name of the Hon. Fitzhardinge Henry Berkeley, Spring-gardens. In a further conversation she said the outfit of the vessel was the Bellerophon, Captain Evans, but declined to give the name of the broker. Witness said it was usual for him to provide boxes on receiving an order for goods going abroad, but she replied that she had procured them at Goddard's, in Cheapside, from whom she had purchased a piano; in fact, she was about to become the wife of a captain in the 21st Regt. Madras Native Infantry, for whom she would require a complete outfit, and as it was a delicate matter to describe the quantity and quality of the articles on the night want, she was shown into the drawing-room to hold a conversation with witness's wife upon the subject, but ultimately no order was received. On her return to the shop she selected an silk handkerchief and a satin scarf to show to her "intended," which were to be returned on the following day if not approved of; and witness having some misgivings as to the truth of her story, sent his lad after her when she left, when she was traced to a gin-shop, and then to a pawnbroker's, in Long-acre, where she pledged the articles.—Ordered to be remanded for a week.

THE SEQUEL.—John Thompson, a genteel-looking youth, was charged before Mr. Cottingham, with attempting to rob Mr. Foster, a commissionagent, of a purse, containing nine sovereigns and some silver. The complainant stated that about eleven o'clock that morning, as he was crossing Blackfriars-bridge, he felt a tug at his coat-pocket, and was just in time to prevent the prisoner from snatching his purse out. He immediately seized the prisoner, who found him hugging a friend of his associates, who struck and kicked him. The prisoner denied the charge, and said that he never had a lock turned on him before. Two policemen, however, said that the prisoner was one of the "swell-mob." He was committed for three months to the treadmill.

LAMBETH STREET.—BRANDING PAUPERS.—A most wretched-looking object, whose only articles of wearing apparel consisted of trousers and jacket, the latter having the words "Camberwell parish," and "stop it," painted over different parts of it, was brought before Mr. Henry, by a policeman, who found him hugging an iron lamp-post, in Whitechapel. The unfortunate man, in reply to the questions of the magistrate, said he was a "navigator," and a native of Cheltenham; and after being employed for some time on the Cheltenham and Gloucester line of railroad, had gone to Dover to seek for another job. He got employment for some time, but was again thrown out of work. He wandered about for some time, and being without the means of procuring a lodging, had applied to Camberwell workhouse for a bed. He was admitted amongst the casual poor, and on the following morning was given the jacket he then had on.—Mr. Henry: The truth, I suppose, is, that you destroyed your own clothes while in the workhouse?—The man, who said his name was Thomas Wood, replied that such was the case, and he had done so on account of their filthy state.—Mr. Henry said it was most unseemly to have a person like the prisoner traversing the streets of the metropolis in such a dress. In the first place it led to public inconvenience, by crowds of people following him about; and in the next, independent of the odium it would bring on the parish, its officers would have to attend at the different police courts to which the pauper would be taken by the police on account of the words "Stop it," which were placed so prominently on the jacket. The worthy magistrate then directed a constable to go to Whitechapel workhouse, and obtain a coat and shirt for him. This was done, and Mr. Henry told the gatekeeper he might take the jacket home with him. The well-dressed functionary seemed by no means to relish his worship's directions, and said he had other places to call at, but would send for it.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last statement a fair average supply of English wheat has been received up to Mark-lane, in, for the most part, good conditions. On each market-day the show of samples has been good, yet the demand has proved rather dull, though at a reduction, in some instances, of from 1s to 2s per quarter. For all kinds of foreign wheat, both free and in bond, there has been scarcely any enquiry, and prices may be considered somewhat nearer. The duty having reached its lowest point for the present, or 1s per quarter, some anxiety has been manifested by the importers to realize from vessel. Barley, owing to the large quantity of free foreign grain now in the granaries, has met a dull enquiry, at barely former rates. The sale for malt has proved heavy, but no material variation can be noticed in its value. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have remained about stationary.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, 2041; Barley, 480; Malt, 870; and Oats, 1940 qrs. Flour, 6963 sacks. Irish: Wheat, ——; Barley, ——; and Oats, 7770 qrs. Foreign: Wheat, ——; Barley, 1450; and Oats, 1760 qrs.

and the royal party then went to view that stupendous national work, the Breakwater, upon which they landed, and remained some time ere they returned to the yacht.

In the evening, there were bonfires and fireworks. The column on Mount Wise was illuminated, and looked very splendid. On the Hoe a very large bonfire was kept alight for several hours. It was fed with tar-barrels, and gave an immense light. But by far the most magnificent sight of the whole was afforded by the men-of-war in the Sound. At nine o'clock, when the gun fired, the whole of them manned their yards, each man having a blue light in his hand. Few who have not witnessed an illumination of this description on board a man-of-war can form an adequate idea of its splendour. Two of our illustrations represent these old English rejoicings.

The patent of his Royal Highness Prince Albert's appointment as Lord High Steward of Plymouth was presented to his Royal Highness in a marble box, made from a portion of the Breakwater. It was not given into his own hands, but presented, with the address, through the Earl of Aberdeen.

On Friday morning, at nine o'clock, the royal yacht got under way from her moorings at Barnpool, and proceeded at half-speed through the Sound and Cawsand Bay, and out to sea by the western passage of the Breakwater. While passing through the Sound, her Majesty was saluted on her departure by all the men-of-war in the port, and by the batteries on shore. The yards of the shipping were manned, and their crews, as the royal yacht passed them, gave three hearty cheers.

When off the Breakwater, the yacht hove to for a few minutes, to enable her Majesty and Prince Albert to view the whole scene before putting out to sea. A few minutes before ten o'clock she took her departure, steering towards the Eddystone Lighthouse, which the royal party was desirous of closely inspecting. From the Eddystone, the yacht steered to the westward, towards Falmouth, which she made about half-past one o'clock, and came to an anchor off St. Paul's Castle. Her Majesty did not land at Falmouth, but proceeded from the yacht into the harbour in the barge, accompanied by Prince Albert. Salutes were fired from the forts and shipping, and the crowds which lined the shore cheered most enthusiastically. The mayors and corporations of Falmouth, Penryn, and Truro, put off in boats to wait upon her Majesty, and were most graciously received; and the Queen expressed herself much gratified with the manner in which she was received at this port, particularly with the immense number of boats which awaited her on her entering, and attended her détour in the barge around the inner harbour.

While her Majesty was here, she, together with Prince Albert, paid a visit to the Caledonia, 120. The Queen and the Prince were received on board by the gallant commander-in-chief at this station, Admiral Sir David Milne, and by the Lords and Secretary of the Admiralty. The officers were all in full uniform, and the men dressed in blue jackets and white trousers. The Marines were drawn up in line on the poop, and formed the guard of honour, to receive her Majesty upon her coming upon the quarter-deck. Lady Milne, Lady Dobson, and Miss Mary and Miss Euphemia Cochrane, who were on board, were presented to her Majesty, and most graciously received.

THE ROYAL VICTUALLING ESTABLISHMENT.

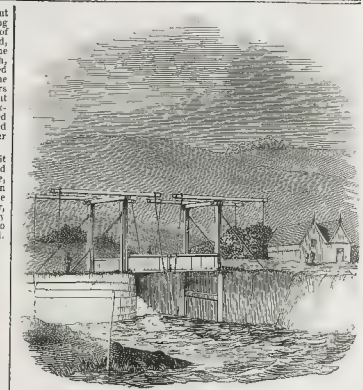
The royal party, attended by Admiral Sir David Milne and Captain Milne, went over the lower, middle, and main decks of the ship, which they minutely inspected, and expressed themselves in terms of high approbation at the admirable state of the vessel. One of our engravings illustrates the royal visit of inspection.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, after inspecting the Caledonia, returned in a barge to the royal yacht, the men-of-war saluting and manning their yards as her Majesty went to and returned from the Caledonia. Between five and six o'clock, the St. Vincent hove to in the offing, and telegraphed with the Caledonia, which was then lying in the Sound. After which the Caledonia and Formidable got under way and joined the rest of the squadron, and the whole of them proceeded over with the royal yacht to Treport, on the coast of France. She was accompanied by a fleet of men-of-war, consisting of the St. Vincent, 120, Captain Rowley, with the flag of Admiral Sir C. Rowley; Caledonia, 120, Captain Milne; Camperdown, 104, Captain Brace; Formidable, 80, Captain Sir Charles Sullivan; Warspite, 50, Captain Lord John Hay; Grecian, 16, Commander W. Smyth; Cyclops, steam-frigate, Captain H. Austin; Tartarus, steamer, Captain F. Bullock; and Prometheus steamer, Lieut.-Commander Lowe.

There were several yachts of the various royal yacht squadrons at Falmouth to receive her Majesty. From the hour of the royal yacht first taking up her moorings in Barnpool, on Wednesday evening, until her leaving, there was an immense fleet of boats laden with well-dressed persons constantly surrounding her, with the exception of a very limited time during the night, when all would be clear; but they would assemble again at daybreak, and remain until a late hour at night.

The two engravings, with which we, for the present, conclude our illustration of "Her Majesty's Marine Excursion," are the Royal Victualling Establishment, and the Breakwater. The Sound is a considerable inlet of the English Channel, three miles wide at the entrance from Penlee Point on the west, to the opposite headland on the east, and extending inland about three miles to the citadel and town of Plymouth. Across the middle of the Sound stretches the Breakwater, or dyke, formed of loose stones, having a total length of 1700 yards, or nearly a mile, viz., 1000 yards in the centre, which runs nearly from east to west, with a continuation of 350 yards at each end, turning more to the north, and forming a considerable angle with the direction of the centre. The efficiency of the Breakwater as a protection to the harbour, has been proved in many severe gales. The splendid range of buildings known as the Victualling-house, was built some years since, under the superintendence of Sir John Rennie, and is, in design, one of the handsomest of the Government establishments.

PLYMOUTH BREAKWATER.



DRAWBRIDGE AT TREPORT.

Annexed is a sketch of the drawbridge which crosses the Brezle, a small river, at the mouth of which the village of Treport is situated. The bridge is of wood; and the only protection at the approach on each side is two chains. It was in attempting to cross this bridge that Louis Philippe and the royal family of France narrowly escaped being plunged into the river beneath. We repeat a few of the details of the accident.

It appears that the royal party had passed the first of the two drawbridges, and was approaching the second, when the salute was fired which caused the accident. Immediately on the cannon being fired the horses plunged and reared, and coming immediately upon the wooden drawbridge, their alarm was so greatly increased that they blindly darted forward. The leaders sprang over the bridge into the water, breaking the chains in their course, and dragging the third horse along with them. At this moment the danger of the royal family was extreme, and it is almost impossible to conceive how they escaped. The wheels of the carriage were within two inches of the edge of the bridge, and, had assistance not been near, and the traces providentially cut, the carriage must have followed. The sluice where the accident occurred is built up on both sides with brick, so that the whole has precisely the appearance of a canal look on a large scale; and the banks being perpendicular for a distance of about fifty yards on each side of the bridge, it is evident that, had the carriage fallen into the water, a very frightful sacrifice of life must have ensued. On Tuesday this bridge was visited by Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, who appeared to take considerable interest in the scene of the providential escape of the royal party.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, September 5, 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—In giving you, this week, some ball-dresses which I have remarked, do not consider that I am committing an anachronism. The month of August, I assure you, has also its balls and soirées, in spite of its fiery sky, its scorching days and suffocating nights. I shall, therefore, make no apology for describing two of these toilettes, which I hope you will think merit the few lines which they will occupy. In the first place I shall mention a white crêpe robe, with a double skirt, the first of which is ornamented with a sort of embroidered pattern in green silk, which surrounds the upper part of the edge, and which is repeated in the second skirt, returning en tablier in the front of it. The sleeves are short, open, and embroidered all round them. The corsage is à la Grecque, and is embroidered round the shoulders. To complete this toilette requires an extremely simple coiffure, without any other ornament than a green and gold ribbon. The next dress is composed of a robe of a rose-coloured barège, embroidered in white silk. The skirt is surrounded by a light embroidery, which widens at the front, where it covers the whole width, returning to a point towards the corsage. The second skirt, which is much shorter, is open in front, trimmed with an embroidered facing, and surrounded with embroidery precisely similar to that on the first skirt. The sleeves are wide, very short, and embroidered with exquisite delicacy, as is also the corsage à tunique. Add thereto a plain coiffure with a bunch of roses, and you will have one of the most graceful ball toilettes you can possibly conceive. I do not know that I can add anything of great importance to my present communication beyond the description of a few things which I have seen in our streets, and which deserve mention for their elegance and good taste. Some of these were exceedingly pretty caracous of embroidered batist; others were in white barège, trimmed with five wide tucks, or with three deep flounces en biais, bordered with a fringe; while others, again, were in white organdy, with two skirts, both of them embroidered, and the second trimmed with lace; and I should here, perhaps, observe, that nothing is more fashionable than lace, which may be observed in every possible variety, and employed in every possible way. As regards headdresses, the generality I have remarked are hats of paille de riz, or of crêpe trimmed with Valenciennes lace, or canotes in puffed tulle, of which those for morning wear have the passe in paille de riz, and the other part in poult de soie. Nothing here strikes me as very pressing. I shall, therefore, say adieu.

GENERAL NOGUERAS.—The following letter from Lord Ranelagh to the Lord Mayor is said to have created considerable embarrassment at the Mansion-house:—"To the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor.—My Lord,—You have invited General Espartero and his suite to partake of the civic hospitality. Are you aware that one of the generals composing that suite is named 'Nogueras,' ex-Minister of War, and that it was the same 'Nogueras' who ordered the execution of the aged and infirm mother of Cabrera at Tortosa, of which deed Lord Palmerston says in one of his despatches:—'It is impossible to express in adequate language the disgust and indignation which this atrocious crime has produced in the minds of all persons in this country?' Your lordship, I am sure, will feel obliged that I have pointed out this fact to avoid the disgrace consequent on the presence of 'Nogueras' at the hospitable board of the first magistrate of the corporation of London. I have the honour to remain, your lordship's obedient servant, RANELAGH.—3, Bolton-row, Sept. 5."

A LONG SHEET OF PAPER.—Mr. Limbird, of the Strand, has a sheet of paper 6 feet 7 inches wide, 600 yards long, and weighing 137 pounds. It is of fine texture, and has been made expressly for the purpose of taking impressions from monumental brasses.

SEIZURE OF SMUGGLED TOBACCO.—On Sunday morning, about eleven o'clock, some officers of the Excise, with assistants, proceeded to the premises of Mr. Toplis, tobacco manufacturer, in Bermondsey-street, Southwark, and on inspecting the stock found a considerable increase, and as permits could not be produced to account for the same, the officers seized the overplus, consisting of several bales of leaf or manufactured tobacco of the best quality, such as is used in the manufacture of cigars, the weight being about two tons, and stated to be worth from £500 to £600. At one o'clock the whole was placed in a van drawn by two horses, and conveyed to the tobacco warehouse at the Excise-office.

WOOD PAVEMENT.—The expense of the wood pavement in Regent-street during the year ending Midsummer, 1843, as ascertained by a Parliamentary return just issued, is stated at £3900. The return states that this amount was paid out of the general fund of the commissions, and without calling on the inhabitants for any special contribution.

BREAD-STREET WARD.—Alderman Lainson has resigned his gown as alderman of Bread-street Ward, owing, we understand, to indisposition. It will be recollected that the worthy ex-alderman declined serving the office of lord mayor during the present civic year from the same cause.

CITY POLICE COMMITTEE.—On Saturday upwards of seventy summonses came on for hearing before Alderman Sir J. Key, against drivers of cabs and omnibuses for furious racing, loitering, and ill-treatment of their horses. The alderman fined two or three of the parties, and then discovered that the clerk at the Mansion-house had issued the summonses under the 1st and 2nd of Victoria, which was repealed by the 5th and 7th of Victoria, which came into operation on the 22nd ult. He was, therefore, bound to dismiss the whole of them (about sixty) for the informality, and ordered the money of those fined to be returned to them.

NEW REVISING BARRISTERS.—Messrs. Walpole, Shadwell, and Arnold have received a joint appointment for Middlesex; and it is understood Mr. Shadwell will revise the city of London lists; Mr. Arnold, the metropolitan borough lists; and Mr. Walpole, the county of Middlesex lists; commencing, on the 18th instant, with the polling district of Brentford. The Tory party have taken from six to seven hundred objections, and the Liberal party nearer two thousand.

BARTHOLOMEW FAIR.—This once-celebrated fair was opened on Monday last by the Lord Mayor, but the fair was but a skeleton of its former self. There were no booths for the exhibition of animals, the representation of "plays," no crowds in holiday clothes, and even very few gingerbread and other stalls. On the outskirts there were a few penny exhibitions to attract children. In a few years this fair is likely to live only in the history of metropolitan antiquities.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO FRANCE.

THE Medallions which we here present to our readers bear the portraits of the respective sovereigns of the two most powerful, most enlightened, and most civilised nations amongst the kingdoms and states of the earth.

The event that has justified, and, indeed, imperatively necessitated, the association of the portraits of these august monarchs within the limits of one little picture, and lead us to hand them down to posterity in this form, is one which may well call forth the reflective powers of the publicist, and give rise to meditations of a far more satisfactory character than could have occupied his mind had the state of Europe remained such as it threatened to be when Louis Philippe first entered on the busy, and then sanguinary and turbulent, theatre of life. Let us look back a little and trace the incidents of his career, such as they have been developed since the period when the present King of the French first fleshed his sword and won his epaulettes under the brave but unfortunate and injudicious Dumouriez.

The tide of revolution followed the footsteps of Rochambeau and Lafayette across the Atlantic, on their return from the war of independence in which those officers took part. Society, demoralized and corrupt to its very core throughout the whole of France, was beginning to exhibit those symptoms of decay and convulsion, which, in bodies politic as well as in the cases of individuals, generally give signs of approaching dissolution. The universal licentiousness, avidity, price, and rapacity of the nobles of France; the sufferings of the people; the tyrannical caprices to which the peasantry were subjected; the enormous and annually-increasing imposts levied upon them in the shape of gabelle and other hateful and most iniquitous taxes; together with the defalcation in the revenue, which was swallowed up by the greedy pensioners of the improvident predecessor of the unfortunate Louis XVI.; all these, and numerous other deep-seated, and, as they proved, incurable disorders, had reduced the kingdom to such a state, in the year 1788, as to render some coup d'état not only expedient, but absolutely necessary, in order to enable the King's Ministers to carry on the Government. The step resolved upon was, the summoning together, in a grand national council, of the three grand divisions of the community, namely, the nobles, the clergy, and the tiers état, or, the representatives of the burgesses and citizens at large. Of the results of this measure, it is not our present business to write—they are matter for the pen of the historian; but we shall confine ourselves to the bare statement of the fact that they led, as a preliminary consequence, to the departure of the eldest son of the Duke of Orleans, the first prince of the blood, for the army of the north; and, ultimately, after the Duke of Chartres (Louis Philippe) had become apprized of the murder of his father, Philippe, surnamed Egalité, to a prolonged exile from his native country, and from the tomb of his ancestors. It was during the twenty years that the present King of the French wandered, a homeless but always honoured emigrant, from the land of his birth, the wonderful and brilliant series of achievements that characterised the wars of Napoleon were accomplished. The Duke of Orleans took no part in them. The Emperor of the French sought assiduously to destroy every trace of the royal family of France, and to substitute his own dynasty in its room; and it was not until the final defeat of that extraordinary man that Louis Philippe again trod the scenes of his youth, and resumed the possession of such portions of his family inheritance as had escaped the rapacity of the revolutionary chiefs and their adherents.

During the early periods of the Restoration, and whilst the nation was recovering from the state of exhaustion into which the constant drain of men and money during the palmy days of the Empire, had thrown it, Louis Philippe confined his attention to the re-establishment of his fortunes, the

CONDITION OF SPAIN.

One of the most humiliating spectacles to contemplate, in the present advanced state of European civilization, is the dire condition of distracted Spain—a country without wisdom, virtue, or national greatness—without art, literature, or science of any modern growth—without status in the respect of nations—evermore plunged into the bloodiest revolutionary conflicts, and wasting its strength, and beauty, and power amid the deadliest commotions of unnatural civil wars. Spain is a truly dreadful picture, rendering no happiness to her own bosom, and no blessing to any other land save that which may be extracted by philosophy from the bitter moral which she is teaching to the rest of the world. Yet does she present a spectacle from which the Christian and the moralist should not turn away their gaze. It is full of interest—full of instruction—full of example, and the deepest and noblest elements of thought.

Spain is one of the loveliest of the Edens of the world—more gifted with natural beauty and function than any other land under the climes of Europe. Her scenery is a picture of blended loveliness and grandeur. Her glorious sierras, her bold passes, her fine far-spreading valleys, her rich gleaming rivers, her luxuriant forest verdure, her magnificent lap of fruit, her mines of unearthed gold, the riches that are beneath her soil: in a word, all the lavishness of nature—have made her essentially a country of most flowing resources, of wondrous and enduring capability of giving waste than the blessings which she has got from God. Yet has she a more narrow harvest, a more restricted agriculture, a more confined commerce than countries that have not a tithe of her resources, or more than a very shred of her dazzling means of wealth. Her literature, once rich and promising as her soil, has, like that soil, gone out of cultivation; while her glowing and glorious art, those deep pictures of poetry with which her ancient artists have wrapped the admiration of mankind, have ceased to be emulated now; the colours have faded from the easel, and the eloquence of the pencil is no more. Science, too, is dead in Spain: she contributes nothing to the philosophical advancement of the world. Her music has passed away, or comes to us only like a voice from the past—the melody of vanished time echoed in the memory of the world. Her drama is prostrate—or only revels in the living tragedy of war. Her race of heroes—fine chivalrous spirits, with honour set as the very jewel in their souls has changed into a race of hireling desperadoes; her soldiers are banditti—her citizens have forgotten their brotherhood—her laws are powerless—her constitution is a farce. Where is her domesticity or where her social affection? where the happiness of her beautiful peasantry? where the sweet presence of innocence upon her soil? Nowhere! Her heart is a desert, whereon have gathered all the black passions of humanity, with no fountain save blood at which to slake their unholy thirst. But of blood, Heaven knows, they drank their full.

And with all nature's beautiful gifts lost upon her—with Heaven's providence wasted with a wicked prodigality by her children with a race of people casting from them the constitutional elements of pride in a virtuous nationality—with the voice of history stimulating her with the loud glories of the past—with the world of living nations teaching her with the example of peace,—she consummates this degradation with a raging of eternal fury—a never-dying struggle within herself, which we can hardly dignify with the name of even civil war.

It really seems as if, in Spain, the causes of internal commotion would never die. Unfortunately selected by the ambition of Napoleon as the land on which to fight the great battle of European destiny, her people became entwined with the fatal web of war. Their homes became barracks, their fields camps, their cities fortresses, their plains the scenes of battle and of blood. Among them sprang up fierce hatreds alike of foreign innovators and of [illegible] the worst very centre of the village. They stressed and broke open the blacksmith's shop close by, after which they tore down the turnpike gate, which is a very stout one and on the main road. Having fired the desk room of the first, the rioters advanced upon them, and command them to desist; instead, however, of doing so, the Rebeccaites fired a volley at them. The latter then ran, the people were ordered to do the same thing, which they did with a will, not stopping even to look behind them. A regular battle took place for a short time, and the police succeeding in capturing six prisoners, three of whom are wounded, two severely. Captain Napier conducted was remarkably the bravest person. While the fight was going during the prisoners the rioters returned to the attack, with the view of rescuing them; but two of the magistrates having risen off for the troops, a party of the dragoons from Swansea, who were out on the road, and some of the 75th Foot, arrived, and the Rebeccaites fled. Three of the prisoners have been sent to Carmarthen, and three are brought into Swansea. They were found in their disguises, with faces blackened, and bonnets and smock frocks on.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO FRANCE.

restoration of the ancient appanages of the house of Orleans, and to the patronage and encouragement of the fine arts and their professors. When, however, the insane perfidiously of Charles X., to his endeavour to restore the ancient state of things, and to enslave the clergy with all their former privileges, as well temporal as spiritual, threatened to overthrow the monarchy, and to throw the kingdom into confusion and anarchy, to the profit of any adventurer who might start up amongst the soldiery, the Duke of Orleans, encouraged by those who were formost among the liberal and moderate adherents of the existing order of things, and prompted by his own decided preference for the establishment of a republic, which would not endure even under the fact of its existence equal consideration to the nations of Europe, seized the opportunity; and, by accepting the proffered crown, at once averted the impending convulsion, and ensured to the surrounding states as long as his own country should remain free, the peace which has since so admirably preserved, notwithstanding the constant and importunate demands of the turbulent and ambitious amongst the French for war.

The accession of Louis Philippe to the French throne was the occasion of bitter animosity and unceasing jealousy on the part of the more [illegible] Europe, which has been the constant exception to the policy of his Government, and the subsequent ratification by other states of the act by which he was seated on the palace of the ex-dear branch of the Bourbons, gave a stability and force to his position, which has been increased every day since his election. The recent cordial interchange of friendly demonstrations, and the mark of unbounded confidence reposed in the King of the French and his subjects by her most Gracious Majesty, cannot but materially strengthen the throne of Louis Philippe, and avert those convulsions which would inevitably result from an attempt to replace the present exiled [illegible] of the house from which he sprung.

We shall in this light, the visit of Queen Victoria cannot but be regarded otherwise than as an event of deep and permanent interest, and we therefore deem it no [illegible] of that event and some illustration which we have given in the preceding and following pages.

First in our picturesque scenes is

CHATEAU D'EU.

In the broadest part of the English Channel, and seated deep in a bend of the coast of Normandy, there was a narrow valley, flanked on each side by bold and elevated cliffs, and crowned in the distance with the pinnacles of an antique church, which rises here barely perceptible above the lofty and thick and well-developed cluster of ancient elms. The foreground of this fine rural spot, as it is seen by the voyager who approaches it from the sea, is occupied by two private houses from the boundaries of the Bresle, a small river that has its embouchure at this part of the coast. The one is extensive, ornamented by a light tower, a battery, a noble ecclesiastical edifice which is seated on the ridge of a hill immediately beneath, embedded in a thick and well-developed cluster of ancient elms. The foreground of this fine rural spot, as it is seen by the voyager who approaches it from the sea, is occupied by two private houses from the boundaries of the Bresle, a small river that has its embouchure at this part of the coast. The one is extensive, ornamented by a light tower, a battery, a noble ecclesiastical edifice which is seated on the ridge of a hill immediately beneath, embedded in a thick and well-developed cluster of ancient elms. The other is the [illegible] houses in the level part of the valley, until [illegible] the [illegible] of the two rocky points already distinguished as bounding the view on each side. The port, or rather [illegible] harbour, the entrance to which has, by dint of human industry, been hitherto preserved with [illegible] of small burden, is Treport. The picturesque [illegible] in the extreme distance [illegible] the spire of Notre Dame d'Eu, and the high [illegible] of the chateau beneath form the most [illegible] of the whole. Philippe, the Sovereign of the French, and recently the scene of the courtly and kingly observances of which our Queen Victoria and her consort were at once the honouring and honoured guests.

The Chateau d'Eu—such is the name of this princely building—has long been celebrated as the spot whereon events of the highest importance have been planned and transacted; and as [illegible] been the favourite residence of the most potent and magnificent of the grandees of the ancient times, as well during the barbarous ages as during the existence of the various institutions of the [illegible] centuries, and the more recent periods when the [illegible] was in full vigour.

The reason to which our readers' attention is especially directed derives its name from the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the palmy times when the bizarre architecture of the sixteenth century still prevailed; but, at the same time, the critical observer will at once distinguish [illegible] and alterations in the details of the edifice that at once [illegible] of a master mind in planning and directing the execution of [illegible] additions, as have been made to the edifice within the last twenty-six years, during which time it has been in the possession of Louis Philippe.

The last scion of the house of Lorraine expired in 1675, at the early age of five years, and the Chateau d'Eu was transferred by [illegible] to the [illegible] the celebrated Mad'le de Montpensier, daughter of Gaston Duke of Orleans, of the royal branch of that name which immediately preceded the founder of the present house.

The traces of the long residence which Madlle de Montpensier made at the chateau are everywhere visible, as well in its internal decorations as in the arrangement of the grounds, and even in the structure itself. At her death in 1693, her favourite residence was transferred to the Duc de Maine, a [illegible] son of Louis XIV. It does not through his line to the collateral branch, in the person of the Duke de Penthievre, maternal grandfather of the King of the French to whom it came by inheritance on the decease of the Dowager Duchess of Orleans in 1821.

The Duke of Orleans, on visiting the ancient seat of the Guises and of Madlle. de Montpensier, in 1821, was so charmed with its situation, and with the historical recollections that [illegible] it, that he determined upon restoring the edifice; and for the purpose called in the aid of the [illegible] architect, M. Fontaine, and the result was the complete restoration of those parts of the chateau that were necessary to render it again the unique and beautiful palace that it formerly was.

In the decoration of the [illegible] the richest costly works of art and of virtu are so lavishly scattered throughout the noble [illegible] of the princely [illegible] that we cannot find room to [illegible] them in detail, therefore, confine ourselves to giving a summary description of the two principal [illegible] and illustrating by the pencils of our artists, Messrs. the dinner-table in France being ranged lengthwise, and the host and hostess always taking their seats in the centre, and not at the head and foot of the board), had Prince Albert at her right, and her son-in-law (the Duke Auguste of Saxe Coburg) at her left hand. The band of the 21th Regiment of Foot was stationed in the court-yard, and played some favourite airs during dinner.

In the evening, the ancient church, dedicated to "our Lady of Eu," which rises in front of the chateau, was illuminated; and a very general display of lights on the principal buildings of Ville d'Eu testified the satisfaction felt by the inhabitants at the presence in their town of the Queen of a nation whom, for so many centuries, they had been accustomed to regard with so much jealousy and animosity. The evening passed over in hilarity and festive joy; and thus ended the first day of her Majesty's sojourn in the dominions of King Louis Philippe. The "Illumination" is engraved at page 185.

The several scenes of the departure of the Queen from Treport, for Ville d'Eu; of the chateau, from the Treport road; and the Queen's arrival at the chateau; are pictured at p. 181.

SUNDAY.

Guided by those innate feelings of piety and religion, which have characterised Queen Victoria from her earliest childhood, her Majesty dedicated the morning of the second day of her sojourn in France to those duties of prayer and thanksgiving which, in common with the humblest subject in her dominions, she is ever ready to perform. Divine service was performed in one of the noble saloons of the palace, which had been prepared for the purpose; and it is a curious circumstance, well meriting record, that three different forms of worship were celebrated in the Chateau d'Eu at the same hour on Sunday the 3d of September, namely, the Anglican service, by her Majesty Queen Victoria and her court; the Lutheran service, by the Duchess of Orleans and her ladies in waiting; and the Roman Catholic ceremonial, in the chapel of the chateau, at which the Queen of the French, her daughters, and attendants were present.

In the morning, after prayers, her Majesty was conducted by King Louis Philippe over the principal apartments of the royal residence, and inspected the rich collection of historical pictures which adorn the walls of the saloons; and which form an almost unrivalled series of portraits of the royal personages of France and their relatives, and of the statesmen, heroes, nobles, and other distinguished persons from the period of 1300 to the present day.

At half past three, the whole of the ladies of the royal party drove out in three carriages, the princes, including Prince Albert, being on horseback. Queen Victoria was on the right of the King, the Queen of the French being near her. Her Majesty was dressed in white. The King was en bourgeois, and wore a white hat. After driving round the park, the party proceeded to the Ferme du Roi, whence they visited Criel, a small village on the Dieppe road, about two leagues from Eu, and the same from Treport, forming the point of an equilateral triangle with those two towns. The royal cavalcade skirted Treport on their return home, but did not enter the town. The royal carriages returned to the chateau a little before six. A considerable crowd was collected all day at Treport in the hope of seeing her Majesty pass. It was delightful to such of her subjects as happened to be there to hear in what favourable terms her Majesty was spoken of. Her dress, her air, her bearing of the preceding day, were all discussed, and all were subjects of encomium. The King's hospitality was also touched on with becoming pride by the loyal subjects of Treport; and one honest-looking sturdy fisherman gave no mean proof of good sense when he declared that, "However the subjects of the two kingdoms might rival with each other for their own interests, no one could deny that the heads of their states were right good friends."

BATTERY OF TREPORT.

At seven o'clock, her Majesty was conducted by the King to the dining-room; the Queen of the French, Prince Albert, the Queen of the Belgians, and the other royal personages following in the same order as on the previous day.

In addition to the guests of Saturday, invitations, or rather commands, to attend the banquet had been sent to the colonels of the detachments on service at the chateau, and to the superior naval officers of the French squadron in the road of Treport. The Prefect of the Seine and the Mayor of Ville d'Eu, together with some of the authorities, also had the same distinction conferred on them. The Earl of Liverpool was honoured by the Queen of the French with an invitation to seat himself next her Majesty at table. The Duke Augustus of Saxe Coburg was at the left hand of Queen Victoria.

The dinner was of a very grand description, partaking somewhat of the character of a state festival; inasmuch as all the civil authorities, as well as the naval and military officers assembled at Treport and Ville d'Eu, of a rank entitling them to that distinction, were invited. Covers were laid for between seventy and eighty persons. Her Majesty wore the insignia of the Garter on her arm, and the blue riband. Part of the Queen's headdress, consisting of a small crown of emeralds, encircling the back of her coiffure, was very much admired. After dinner, their Majesties retired to the grand drawing-room, on the rez de chaussée or ground floor, where the guests of King Louis Philippe who had not already received that honour, were presented severally to her Majesty, whose gracious and affable manner of receiving their obeissances produced a deep and most favourable impression.

Queen Victoria having observed amongst the company the Count de Chabot, principal secretary to the French embassy to the court of St. James, and actual chargé d'affaires, was graciously pleased to distinguish him by some expressions of recognition. It was remarked by one of the royal circle that at the period of the splendid rencontre between Francis I. and Henry VIII., styled the Field of the Cloth of Gold, the French envoy to our monarch was the Admiral de Chabot, who, with the Constable de Montmorency, were pointed out to the King by Francis I. as being the two most distinguished noblemen of his court. The fact that this personage should be represented by his lineal descendant, holding an analogous post, and under somewhat similar circumstances, after the lapse of nearly three centuries, was considered a most remarkable and curious coincidence. At nine o'clock, their Majesties retired from the general reception room to a smaller salon de famille.

SECOND DAY.—MONDAY.

On Monday morning, the preparations for a splendid fête champêtre, which the King had determined upon offering to her Majesty, were commenced, notwithstanding the aspect of the sky was black and threatening. The spot selected for the banquet was the Mont d'Orleans, a spot situated between three and four leagues in the interior of the forest of Eu; and further the population of Treport, Ville d'Eu, and all the neighbouring villages repaired as soon as the weather had cleared up and given assurance that the royal excursion would not be deferred.

The drive from Eu to the Mont d'Orleans is exceedingly picturesque. The road passes at first through an open country, bearing a considerable resemblance to an English scene, being tolerably sprinkled with groups of trees, whilst patches of plantations, scattered about, contrast pleasingly with yellow fields of oats and barley, ripe for the sickle. Close to the town, gardens run along the country for some little distance; but farther on corn-fields and meadows only are to be seen. The valley of the Bresle, the little stream that finds a refuge in the sea at Tréport—is on the left of the road; whilst another declining ground is perceptible on its right, from whence the road passes on the summit of a ridge which separates the two valleys. Nothing could be easier than to carry the road through the low grounds on either side, particularly on the right; but the old passage is allowed to remain in all its primitive steepness of ascent. About half a league from the town, the road enters into some young plantations; and here the forest of Eu may be said to commence. The brushwood here is deep and strong, and the trees far between; but as the road advances, the wood thickens, until at last the traveller passes through a fine glade of lofty foliage, which the heat of the sun rendered most grateful.

As the collation was to take place when the sun had commenced his descending march in the horizon, and when his rays were most oppressive, the whole of the eastern side of the tent was thrown open, whilst the other, being firmly closed, opposed an impenetrable barrier to the heat. A delicious breeze refreshed the air, and there was just enough of occasional cloud above to cast a passing shadow on the hill which swelled along the other side of the valley, and to vary the appearance of the scene. The platform in front of the tent was of considerable extent, and at its farthest extremity was stationed the fine band of the Carabineers, who played during the repast. The tent itself was the same as that used on the Queen's landing. It was ornamented with gilt minarets along the sides, about six inches in length, whilst four larger ones (about eighteen inches high) crowned the upper edge of the roof. It was lined inside with buff-coloured merino, handsomely trimmed with a furniture-patterned edging. A dark-coloured drugget was stretched over the green sward, and the feeling to the foot was that of the softest velvet. Along the middle was placed the table, set out for seventy-two persons. In the centre of it stood eighteen mahogany chairs for the royal party, whilst the other guests were placed on camp stools furnished with backs. Forty decanters of wine, alternated with carafes of water, were set on the table in English style; whilst down the middle was placed the collation, composed of meats, pates, confectionary of the most recherché description, in fact everything that the most exquisite taste could suggest, and wealth provide. With the exception of a very few dishes, the whole of the repast was [illegible] summer dinner in the open air.

The servants in the royal livery amounted to about 100, whilst about a dozen maitres d'hôtel, in black, completed the number of attendants. About a dozen carriages, of a peculiar description, were employed in conveying the various articles required for the occasion.

A few minutes before three o'clock, distant shouts announced that some of the royal family were approaching. One of the Duchess of Orleans's carriages immediately after drove up; and from it descended the Count de Paris and the Duke de Chartres, with the young Count de Chabannes, the companion of the princes.

At a quarter to four o'clock, not ce was given of his Majesty's approach. The princes arrived first, on horseback, all in coloured clothes; and, after a few minutes' delay, the loud shouts of the multitude announced that the royal carriage was close at hand. The next moment the carriage wheeled round the platform amidst great cheering. The Queen of England sat, as usual, on his Majesty's right, and immediately behind her Majesty the Queen of the French; whilst the Queen of the Belgians sat behind her royal father. The other princesses occupied the other benches. The ladies and gentlemen of the court were in the other carriages. These were six in number, four being drawn by six horses, and two by four. All the horses to the carriages and the outriders were dark bays. M. Guizot sat in the second carriage, between the Earl of Liverpool and the Earl of Aberdeen. His Majesty at once, on alighting, led his royal guest to her seat in the centre of the table, facing the open country. Her Majesty took her ordinary place, at his right. On his Majesty's left sat the Duchess of Orleans; on her Majesty the Queen of England's right was placed the Queen of the French, Prince Albert, next the Princess Clementine, next the Princess Adelaide, then the Princess de Joinville, and by her side Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg. Towards the other end of the table the Duchess of Orleans had on her left the Duke de Montpensier; next him was one of the ladies of honour; and after her came Lord Cowley. The princes sat opposite their royal relatives.

In order to display to the Sovereign of the British people as much as possible of the royal magnificence which appertains to the French monarchy, Louis Philippe had commanded the attendance, in full costume, of the foresters in charge of the royal domain of Eu. At various intervals along the route pursued by the corteje, the Garde Champêtre offered themselves to her Majesty's view in their picturesque garb, armed with short haches and swords, and wearing across their breasts a broad belt with a silver plate, inscribed, "Eaux et Forêts, Domaines Royales."

The Queen of England wore a puce satin dress, black mantilla, yellow bonnet and ribands, with a circle of roses des bois in front: similar flowers

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1843.

There are some curious anomalies in our law which cannot fail of striking the careful observer of what is passing around him in the external world. It is appalling to find how many culprits get away from the just consequences of their crimes by reason of the curious construction put upon offences by legal technicality. Political offenders generally escape from a carelessness, perhaps intentional, on the part of the prosecution —a solitary flaw sets them free, and justice is deprived of her retribution. But, apart from this intentional omission, there are every day a number of delinquencies committed which slip through the fingers of the law with an oily intangibility, and act at nought the power which the wisdom of the community is supposed to have raised up for their especial castigation.

A case of striking feature was a few days past brought before Mr. Broderip, the magistrate of the Thames police, which curiously exemplifies our position. A sailor had been inveigled into some house of evil notoriety, and had given a sovereign to a woman, with a desire that she should get it changed. The woman, being as dishonest as she was otherwise abandoned, took the sovereign, and with a peculiar adhesiveness of nature—in the language of slang, "stuck to it"—walked away with the gold, and left the seafaring sinner to "wish he might get" his change. The woman being subsequently apprehended, and brought up on the charge of theft, Mr. Broderip declared that—common robber as she was —anywhere-woman of the town, and nothing less—she must be discharged, and she was discharged accordingly. The reistanship between the person robbing and the person robbed not being that of servant and master, there was no case of embezzlement. It had been decided by the judges that there was no larceny, and the magistrate was too good a judge to go against the judges, so he discharged a common thief. The woman, on leaving the office, thanked him, and said that his lesson in the law would be of "particular use to us gals"—that was, as an example of the fact that, if any inveigled dupe should give any amount of monrality in whatever form it may describe, they might "go of their errand," and save themselves legally from any necessity to return. Possession would be more than nine points of the law, and restitution might be out of the question.

Now, we are quite ready to admit that persons plunging themselves into an abandoned society deserve to take the consequences of their imprudence and immorality in whatever form it may please Providence to visit them with punishment of their moral guilt; but there is a wide difference between this admission and the granting of an impunity to the act of a thief. Mark the applicability of the doctrine that there is no larceny in the monstrous iniquity of the theft described. Then, if we go into Howell and James's and purchase some trifling article, tendering a note for change, it is no larceny for the primcravatted shopman to put the note into his pocket and tell you to whistle for the money! It is no embezzlement, in fact, to keep anything that is given you for a special purpose and benefit of another, unless, indeed, you be servant to the party concerned. This is monstrous, and we have no doubt that the law (without the aid of another) affords proper means of redress; but how much more monstrous still is it that a thief with the act of theft proved against her should be openly let loose upon society without the slightest punishment, and only just so much of the law taught her as may encourage her to thieve on to the end of time!

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

BRIGHTON, Saturday.—At half-past seven o'clock on Saturday morning, Prince Albert rode to Kemp Town, unattended, and bathed in the sea, taking one of Cheesemann's machines. Between eleven and twelve o'clock Mr. C. Cooper, clerk to the Chain Pier Company, received a communication from the master of the household, informing him that it was her Majesty's pleasure to embark from the Chain Pier, for a short cruise in the Royal yacht. At three o'clock the cliffs and beach were crowded by thousands. A flag was hoisted on the Albion Hotel as a signal of her Majesty having left the Pavilion; and the gaily, white one, manned by twelve seamen in white, immediately left the yacht and made for the landing place at the pier. In a couple of minutes, two carriages, the first containing the Queen, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and Viscountess Canning, the second, Lady Charlotte Dundas, the Hon. Miss Hamilton, Lord C. Wellesley, and Sir E. Bowater, drove on the Pier Esplanade. At the end of the Suspension Bridge, the Queen and Prince Albert and the royal party left their carriages, and the high constable of the town, to clear a passage, the party, preceded by the Queen and Prince arm-in-arm, walked to the end of the pier. On the platform her Majesty was received by Sir Samuel Brown, the projector of the pier, who had the honour of assisting the royal party into the boat; and Prince Albert law no taken a seat by the side of her Majesty, the galley left the pier, Lord A. Fitzclarence taking the helm. Hitherto the homage to the Queen has been silent, and unaccompanied merely by the cheers of her Majesty, who graciously bowed in return as she walked along the pier; but as the boat left the pier the spectators joined in a loud hurra. At the same moment the Talair rowers accustomed to give a royal salute. All the other vessels in the roads, among which there were five steamers, were dressed out in colours, and their yards were manned, forming a very animated scene. Among the rest of the vessels in the bay our eye met the revenue steamer Vulcan, the war steamer Cyclops, the Prometheus, the Emerald yacht, tender to Sir C. Rowley, the Mercury steamer, the Princess Royal steamer, and various others. The royal yacht, followed by the other steamers, went westward till off Worthing, and then returned to near the pier, where her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the royal suite proceeded to the pier in the galley. The cliffs and the side of the pier end of the Grand Guards was playing) were crowded with thousands of the inhabitants and visitors; but a line was speedily formed, through which the royal carriages passed. They reached the palace soon after six o'clock. The Queen and the whole of the party were attired in plain dresses, and we understand that her Majesty expressed her entire satisfaction at the arrangements of the Pier Company for her convenience. The Hon. Miss Liddell took her departure for London at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon. Sir R. Peel arrived in the evening, and had an audience of her Majesty. The Premier was the only addition to the royal dinner party.

SUNDAY.—Divine service was performed in the music-room on Sunday morning by the Rev. Archdeacon Wilberforce, before her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the whole of the suite and household. Immediately after the service a royal salute was fired from the yacht, had moderated, and the day was fine. About seven o'clock the royal yacht got under way, and stood out to sea, and was followed by the other steamers with each from the squadron attending her Majesty, and also by the Penelope, which has been ordered to form one of the royal squadron. Her Majesty, it was expected, would be at Ostend about twelve o'clock.

[It will be remembered that, on the occasion of her Majesty's visit to Walmer Castle last year, we gave a series of engravings illustrative of the various points of interest connected with this chosen and distinguished spot, so rich in the historical recollections of the country. It were unnecessary for us therefore, on the present occasion, to do more than refer our readers to the 30th number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS for that series of engravings, which comprises a view of the village of Walmer, a spirited sketch of Walmer Castle, with Deal in the distance, and the royal squadron firing salutes in the offing.

OSTEND.—The ordinarily very quiet little town was in a high state of bustle and excitement during the greater part of the week, in consequence of the expected visit of the Queen of Great Britain and her illustrious consort to their uncle the King of the Belgians. On Monday forenoon the municipal herisman read a proclamation that her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain was expected to do the good city of Ostend the honour of a visit on Wednesday afternoon, and, at the same time, enjoined the inhabitants to do honour to their illustrious visitor and themselves on the occasion, by setting their houses in order, and cleansing the streets, which, sooth to say, on ordinary occasions, stand particularly in need of cleansing. The hint was acted upon with an alacrity which did credit to all parties, and evinced the sincerity of the satisfaction with which the good-hearted people of this ancient port participate in the pleasure which this event affords to a Sovereign whom they have a very fair occasion to prove a good one. On the part preparations on an equally magnificent scale were being made. Two temporary landingplaces were built—the one nearest the mouth of the harbour being destined for the Queen and her immediate suite; the other, a little further on, for the rest of her attendants. At the top of the former has been erected a handsome pavilion, consisting of a triumphal arch, supported by eight Corinthian pillars, and ornamented with the arms of Great Britain, with those of the royal crown and initials of the King of the Belgians; in which the royal visitors and their royal host and hostess will make their first mutual greeting. From the pavilion to the principal street of the town, a triumphal arch was erected, extending the whole way across the street, and being about thirty or forty feet in height, under which the royal procession was intended to pass, on the way to the royal palace in the Rue Longue, which will, with the gallantry always conspicuous in King Leopold, be entirely appropriated to the use of Queen Victoria and her household. The palace consists of two ordinary-looking white-washed houses of five windows each in width, in a very narrow street, without porte-cochere, or entrance court, or any other line of demarcation to interrupt the curious gaze of the profane vulgus. Two sentries of the line keep watch and ward before its two doors, a tricolour flag floats over head, and at the first floor window and that is all the parade that marks the abode of the King of the Belgians at this watering place. There is a comparative drawback necessarily attaching to an abode so limited as it is in point of accommodation for such a handmaid, scatched and hugged away, as it were, from the grasp of the sea, by quays and other artificial defences; every inch of ground within these limits occupied by buildings, and, except in the Jardin Public, an inclosure similar in shape to that of Horton-crescent, and about half as large, where some few planted shrubs struggle through an amphibious existence, not a green leaf is to be seen for miles around.

His Majesty King Leopold and his royal consort, having thus given up their accustomed abode for the accommodation of our most gracious Sovereign, have taken, temporary, a house for themselves within a few doors in the same street; and another nearly en face for the infant princes, the Duke of Brabant and the Count de Flandres.

The Queen of the Belgians arrived by railroad from Brussels about half-past one o'clock on Monday evening, and proceeded without any sort of parade to their residence in the Rue Longue. Nothing, in fact, can be more free from ceremony than the whole course of her Majesty's late journey, proceeding, and yet he suffers in nothing thereby in the respect and esteem of his subjects.

On Tuesday the bustle throughout the town assumed a really London-like character. Carriages rolled through the streets conveying ministers, or persons of distinction, from all quarters; and carts, piled with plate chests from all parts of Brussels, Ghent, and provinces of adjacent parts, followed them at a slower pace. Troops also, in considerable numbers, came in from Brussels, and other military stations throughout the kingdom. There is not artillery, and one of the living arms, a regiment of lancers, to all to four hundred men, came into the town at about twelve o'clock, a great part of the way having marched from Liege during the night. They immediately took up their position on the various fort ifications and ramparts, with which the town is bounded on the sea-side. A sort of rehearsal in salute firing took place at about half-past three o'clock, when the fine fleet of belgian brig-of-war, the Louise Marie (so called after the Queen of the Belgians), which had been cruising about the station for some days upon matters connected with the interesting occasion, came into the roads and fired a royal salute, which was immediately returned by the two batteries, &c. The King and Queen were walking on the Digue at the time the port and shore were crowded with people, and the effect of the whole scene was enlivening.

About half past five o'clock the young princes, the Duke de Brabant and the Count de Flandres, arrived from Brussels with their attendants. They royal carriages of the rai ways station to convey them to the palace in Belgians to the Palace. Two fine or more intelligent and pleasing looking children do not exist. They have fine curling light hair, and seemed to enjoy hearing the cheers which they had caused.

The general impression which prevailed was, that her Majesty and Prince Albert, after making a brief stay in this town, would proceed to Brussels to their capital, which, by indulging in speculating on the score of precedent, might ask, "How could they go to the courts of Belgium, without having gone to the capital of France?" But then it should be recollected that King Leopold has no Chateau d'Eu, nor, indeed, any royal residence, except at Laeken and Laeken. If her Majesty goes to Brussels, she could not but visit the neighbouring field of Waterloo. The incident would be one of remarkable interest.

LANDING OF HER MAJESTY.

OSTEND, Sept. 13, 20 minutes past 3 o'clock.—Her Majesty has just landed. At a quarter past two precisely the royal cortége left the quay, in happy, fine royal yacht was, by the unfavorable state of the tide, enabled to enter the port before the arrival of the Belgian squadron, and she took a station in an open carriage. Opposite them sat the Queen of the Belgians and her Royal Highness Prince Albert. Her Majesty looked even in better health than when I saw her at Windsor Castle, and all were in excellent spirits. Throughout the whole line of march the Queen was saluted with the most rapturous cheering, and acknowledges it with that grace, kindness, and ease which is unique to describe. Immediately after the distinguished persons who were in attendance on their Majesties of Belgium to receive our beloved Sovereign were General Goulet, Minister for Foreign Affairs; Count Renesse, Grand Marshal of the Palace; Baron Holwaij, Intendant of the Civil List; the Burgomaster, M. Servaij; the Consul of Great Britain of the United States; the Sheriffs (Echevins), the Town Council or Aldermen, several generals and military officers of distinction, and a considerable number of elegantly dressed ladies. The entire population, abroad, and displayed as much enthusiasm as a similar number of the most loyal and affectionate of our Queen's own subjects could have testified.

As quickly as could be arranged, after the arrival, in the Hotel de Ville, by his Majesty the King of the Belgians. The royal party sat down at eight o'clock. The King of the Belgians entered the ante-chamber with her Majesty, and Queen Victoria leaning on his arm. He was followed by the Queen of the Belgians, who was on the arm of Prince Albert. Lord Aberdeen conducted the Countess d'Aerschot (the lady of the Grand Marshal of the Palace), who followed Lord Liverpool and Lady Canning. The rest of the suite of her Britannic Majesty, and the Belgian Minister, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Miss Hamilton, and the remainder of the guests followed in their respective ranks.

The royal party were but a few minutes in the saloon which they first entered, when the folding-doors were thrown open, and they came into the dining-room in the order just described, and took their seats at the table. King Leopold sat in the middle seat opposite the windows; on his right hand was Queen Victoria, next to her the Queen of the Belgians, and next to her Prince Albert; on the left hand of King Leopold was a lady, who we believe was the Countess d'Aerschot, and next to her, Lord Liverpool. The rest of the company were arranged according to their ranks.

King Leopold was dressed in plain clothes, but wore the ribbon of the Garter, as did also Lord Aberdeen. Prince Albert was in plain clothes, and wore the ribbon and cross of the Bath. Several others of the company wore ribbons, and most of them were in splendid uniforms, decorated with stars and orders.

Queen Victoria, who looked remarkably well, was dressed in a white lace and muslin dress, with a white bonnet, and took her seats at the table bound with a ferronier of brill ants, Her Majesty had on a brilliant necklace, and across her shoulder the blue ribbon of the Garter. The Queen of the Belgians was in a pale blue silk dress, with a spencher of brilliants, and had on her head a cross connet of white lace with feathers. The appearance of the whole party, from the brilliancy of uniforms and stars, was magnificent

During the dinner and dessert, which lasted about an hour and a quarter, the band of the regiment Des Guides, a very good one, played the following airs, the orchestra being placed at the end of the room and concealed by a screen of chintz erected for the occasion :—

March, composed by the Duchess of Kent.
Overture, "Le Duc d'Olonne."—Aber.
Duo, "Les Huguenots."
Cavatine de l'Opera, "Eleonora."—Donizetti.
"La Reine Victoria."—Manuel.
Duo e finale de "Robert d'Evreux."—Donizetti.
"Nouvelle Aurore," valse.—Labitsky.
Chœur des Moines de "Robert le Diable."

The royal party retired from the dinner table at a quarter past nine o'clock, and partook of coffee, &c., in one of the smaller saloons already mentioned, and in about half an hour afterwards returned to the palace in the carriages of his Belgian Majesty. During the whole of the entertainment a Belgian Queen Victoria was in the best spirits, and talked to the King and Queen of the Belgians with great animation of manner. The town was brilliantly illuminated during the night.

BRUSSELS, Sept. 13.—Preparations are making at Antwerp, Ghent, and Brussels, to receive the Queen of England; all these preparations, however, are, of course, dependent on the determination of the Queen, whose intention is not yet known. Her Majesty will embark on the Scheldt at Ostend. A letter from Antwerp says that the Queen's yacht will after landing her Majesty at that port come to Antwerp, where her Majesty will embark on her return from Brussels.

NEXT week we shall have the pleasure of presenting our readers with a number of engraved illustrations of her Majesty's visit to Belgium, executed by the most eminent artists.]

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE DONCASTER CUP.—The following letter from Mr. Baily, the distinguished artist, to the editor of a morning contemporary, in reference to the splendid statue of the Duke of Wellington which occupies the Doncaster Cup, will be read with some degree of interest by the curious in those matters. It is clear that Mr. Baily thinks the gallant colonel would be better employed in compiling his grace's despatches than dabbling in the fine arts:—" Sir, I see from a statement in your paper of to day that my name is coupled with the miniature equestrian statue which is to be run for to-morrow. Now, though his grace did me the high honour of sitting to me for that purpose, justice requires me to state, lest so very many alterations have been made in my model, under the directions of Colonel Gurwood, that the present composition belongs solely to that gentleman. Candour, therefore, will not allow me to take the merit, if there is any; and, should there be none, my reputation cannot afford to be blamed for errors which I never committed. The original, as modelled by myself from the life, is now being cast in silver by Messrs. Mortimer and Hunt, where it may be seen in a few days.—Your humble servant, E. H. BAILY, R.A.—10, Fitzroy-street, Bedford-square, Sept. 13."

DADD, THE PARRICIDE.—Richard Dadd, the young Englishman, who, after cutting the throat of his father, escaped to France, and has been near committing another crime, has been transferred from the prison of Abbeville to that of Fontainebleau. It appears by inquiry that the young man states himself to be the son and envoy of God, sent to exterminate the men whom he encountered with the demon. He enters with the greatest coolness that in the park of Lord D—— he was seized, being with him who is called to be his father, with a divine inspiration, which commanded him to sacrifice him; he immediately plunged his knife into his breast, and, as death came not fast enough, he made deep wounds in his neck with a razor. Dr. Leblanc, who was commissioned to examine him, asked what he thought of such an action? when Dadd replied that he considered it a good one, since he had destroyed an enemy of God. After committing that crime, Richard Dadd proceeded to the nearest port, embarked, came to France, crossed Paris and Fontainebleau, and was arriving at Bonneresa, when he was taken, says he, with another inspiration, and attempted to commit another crime. He considers this also a good action, and has but one thought, which is the extermination of a large part of mankind. Richard Dadd has now but one object in view, that of being sent to London, where he has, in the eyes of men, committed the greatest of crimes, in order to explain himself before those whose duty it is to judge him.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.—On Monday a deputation waited on the Mayor of Birmingham, with the requisition requesting him to call a public meeting to petition the Queen to dismiss her present Ministers. The requisition was signed by nearly one thousand merchants, manufacturers, and shopkeepers of the town. There was not the name of a working man attached to it The mayor, however, declined calling the meeting, observing that, although he might not act in accordance with the wishes of many most respectable individuals in the town, he had made up his mind not to call the meeting. There was a meeting of the requisitionists in the evening.

THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.—The labours of Father Mathew on Monday, at Birmingham, resulted in 1000 persons taking the pledge. This announcement was made at a meeting in the evening, at which the same mayor presided. On Tuesday morning a breakfast was given to Father Mathew in the Roman Catholic school room attached to the cathedral in Bath-street, by the Roman Catholic clergy and many ordinary members, to attend in reference to the proceedings, as it was pretty generally known that the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, the Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese, would be present (of the opportunity of the meeting he has viewed as the object of the present temperance movement -The right rev. doctor acted on the most ag in an eloquent speech, in vindication of the mission undertaken by Father Mathew. He said, a great outcry had been raised against the word "pledge," as being administered in the form of a vow. Some would like to substitute the words "I resolve" instead of "I promise," from the fear of the pusillanimity of the latter. Now the word resolve disgusted upon to whom this promise was made. A vow was a solemn promise made to God alone. Were the words of the pledge such as to express this, then indeed, this day brought the jelly pan. "I promise you, my friends," he said, "you do not promise A mighty God, you promise yourselves, you promise your wives, your families, society in general, and those whom you degraded by intemperance you promise to the Father duty to elevate to the proper standard of humanity." The promise may, therefore, be made to all, and they well knew the effect produced in Ireland, where upwards of three millions had taken the pledge. He considered the promise one to society, and if any violated it, it was felt as an injury not cited upon the community at large. He appealed to Father Mathew whether there was not the same duty in England, as in Ireland, to stand? (Father Mathew, "Precisely so.") Now the effect of this had operated in such a way as to show its character to belong, not as it was considered to belong, to the sacred tribunal of the confessional, but to the open tribunal of society. (Cheers.) But they might ask, has religion nothing at all to do with it? Yes, he replied, religion would lend its sanction to it by which virtue could be opposed, or vice repressed. (Hear, hear.) Dr. Wiseman next referred to the temperate habits of our forefathers, and the practices of our continental neighbours, and said that during the 23 years he resided in Rome, he did not recollect seeing three instances of drunkenness; and if such habits had continued in their own country, it necessarily would have arisen for the present movement. He then referred to the state of Ireland, and the extraordinary change which had been effected in the habits and moral character of the people, which he had had ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with during his recent visit to that country; and the consequence was, that it persevered in for a few years longer, Ireland would become the happiest and most moral of all the nations of the earth. The rev. doctor concluded his address amid the enthusiastic applause of the meeting. Father Mathew afterwards addressed the meeting, and returned thanks for the reception he had met with that day, and particularly for the kind approval of the distinguished and eloquent prelate who had addressed them; and stated as full concurrence in every sentiment which he had expressed in reference to the cause in which he (Father Mathew) was engaged.

COLCHESTER.—The ceremony of laying the first stone of the new Town hall, Colchester, Essex, took place on Wednesday, at one o'clock. At twelve o'clock precisely the procession met at Colchester Castle, and proceeded, including a large number of freemasons in masonic costume. The mayor laid the stone with a beautiful silver trowel and mallet (also silver). The vast assembly was then briefly addressed by the mayor and the recorder, the latter reading the inscription on the stone, which was as follows:—"This stone was laid by Roger Nunn, Esq., M.D., mayor, September 13, 1843." After the ceremony a splendid dinner was given at the George Hotel, High-street, to which upwards of 300 of the nobility and gentry of the town sat down—Sir G. H. Smyth, Bart., in the chair.

HEREFORD.—THE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—The one hundred and twentieth meeting of the choirs of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester, terminated at the first-mentioned town last Thursday evening. The purpose of these festivals is briefly but eloquently described in the prospectus:—"These musical meetings," it states, "were originally established to raise funds for the benefit of the widows and orphans of the poorer clergy within the dioceses of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester; aided by the Dorcesan Clerical Charities, the proceeds have, of late years, averaged to each widow £30, and to each orphan, £15. That such institutions stand in need of immediate encouragement is unhappily too manifest, from the present number of applicants, sixty three orphans and twenty-nine widows; while the necessity of future support is equally evident from the positive fact, that there are, within the three dioceses, 147 benefices, having an income below £100 per annum. The festival was under the especial patronage of her Majesty, the vice-patronage being Earl Somers, the Rev. the Lord Bishop of Hereford, and Lord Rodney. Lord Bateman, the Lord-Lieutenant of Herefordshire, was the President; and Earl Fitzwarrine, Lord Lyttelton, the Bishop of Hereford, Gloucester, and Worcester, Vice-presidents. The stewards of the festival, on whom the deficiency of the receipts to meet the outlay falls (the whole of the money collected at the church door being presented to the charities), were the Bishop of Hereford, Sir Rd. Geo. F. F. Lewis, Hun. G. F. Hamilton, J. Bailey, Esq., M.P., R. B. Phillips, Esq., and the Revs. Messrs. Johnson, H. M. Pemberton, and S. Penoyre. The conductor was Mr. Townshend Smith. Mr. Clarke presided at the organ, and Mr. Arnott at the pianoforte. Mr. Cramer led the band at the morning performances, and Mr. Loder at the evening concerts. In the orchestra were Dragonetti, Howell, Lindley, Lucas, Card, K. Card, G. Cooke, Keaung, Williams, Egerton, Baumann, Godfrey, Harper, Irwin, Smithies, J. Smithies, Albrecht, Chipp, Jarrett, C. Harper, Moralt, Hill, Ribbon, Jones, W. Cramer, Blagrove, Seymour, Wily, Calkin, Adams, Barclay, Cotton, Reeve, &c. The principal vocal performers were Misses Clara and Sibella Novello, A. and M. Williams, M. B. Hawes, Messrs. Phillips, Machin, John Parry, Hobbs, and Shoobridge. The cathedral being under repair, the sacred music was given at All Saints Church. The concerts were at the Shire Hall. On Tuesday morning the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Johnson, M.A., Prebendary of Hereford Cathedral. Although no novelties were introduced at this festival, yet there was much that was excellent in the selections, and their execution, solely by English artists, was most creditable to the reputation of our country. The choral portions were most admirably gone through. Indeed, it was remarked how often as the Dettingen "Te Deum" has been done, it had never gone better off than on this occasion. The total receipts were £860, which was more than was expected, but, of course, the stewards will have to supply a gap for the outlay.

LIVERPOOL.—Early on Tuesday morning the house of Mr. Archer, flour and provision dealer, Eggehill, took fire, and was in the course of a few hours entirely destroyed. The flames were first observed to break out at the top of the house, and before water could be got, or the engines had time to arrive, the whole house was one mass of fire.

REPEAL DEMONSTRATION.—A repeal meeting took place in the Amphitheatre, Liverpool, on Tuesday night, when Mr. Dan. O'Connell, jun., accompanied by Mr. Thomas Steele and Mr. O'Neil Daunt, attended to deliver speeches on the occasion. It should be mentioned, that when the intention of the Repealers to hold a meeting in the Amphitheatre was made publicly known, a deputation from the several Orange lodges held in the town waited upon Mr. Entwisle, the manager, with an urgent request that he would prohibit the meeting, alleging that if it were permitted to take place the proceedings might be interrupted, and possibly a disturbance follow. The manager declined to depart from his original intention of opening on Monday; and when they did he informed them that he had no power to stop the meeting, but that there should be ample police force in attendance to repress any attempted breach of the peace. By seven o'clock upwards of 4000 were present. Shortly after the doors were opened, it appeared evident that a considerable body of Orangemen were dispersed in different parts, from partial sounds of the Kilmainham fife, and other circumstances. Mr. O'Connell, and the gentlemen accompanying him, arrived about half-past seven, and the chair was taken by Mr. James Lenon, who was described as an "inspector of repeal Associations in Liverpool." He delivered a short speech in favour of repeal, during which he was repeatedly interrupted by the Orangemen, and some confusion followed. Mr. Fitzgerald moved the first resolution; after which Mr. O'Connell addressed the meeting amidst frequent interruptions, which, when he sat down, broke out into violent uproar. There appeared an evident determination that the proceedings should here be brought to a close. Two speakers different parts, many of the benches were torn up, and a sort of attack was made on the stage by a few Orangemen who were in the pit. In the confusion to table at which the reporters were stationed was destroyed, and they had to effect their escape as well as they could. The police were very active in endeavouring to secure the assailants, several of whom were seriously hurt, and a few of them having been removed from the building, order was eventually restored, and, with a few trifling exceptions, it was preserved to the end of the proceedings.—Mr. O'Neil Daunt then delivered a very long speech in support of a resolution to the effect that, in demanding a repeal of the legislative union, Ireland sought only to restore the constitution, not to alter it, and to confine the exercise of a right which was only placed in abeyance, but which never could be extinguished.—The resolution was adopted.—Mr. G. Smyth moved the third resolution, which acknowledged the great services of the Liberator; and in the course of his address he handed in £41, as the week's rent for Liverpool.—Dr. Murphy, of Dublin, and Mr. Town-Councillor Raby, also of Dublin, with several others, delivered speeches in support of the remaining resolutions (four in number), and the proceedings terminated about eleven o'clock, with the adoption of a petition to the House of Commons praying for immediate repeal.—A public dinner was given to Mr. O'Connell, jun., in the Queen's Theatre, Christian-street.

WILTS.—DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT FIGHELDEAN.—On Thursday evening a destructive fire broke out in the farm of Mr. Mills, at Figheldean, near Amesbury, which is said to have originated from the circumstance of a child playing with lucifer matches in a barn. Several ricks of corn were destroyed, also of Dandin, with several others, delivered speeches in support of the remaining resolutions (four in number), and the proceedings terminated about eleven o'clock, with the adoption of a petition to the House of Commons praying for immediate repeal.—A public dinner was given to Mr. O'Connell, jun., in the Queen's Theatre, Christian-street.

POSTSCRIPT.

RE-OPENING OF ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.—The reopening, on Thursday, of this sacred edifice for divine worship, after having undergone, for several months past, the most extensive renovations and magnificent embellishments, was attended by all the distinguished families of the royal and aristocratic circles, and a great portion of the clergy residing in the vicinities of Windsor and Eton, and by many persons who had arrived in the course of the day from the metropolis and other parts of the kingdom. The whole of the ceremonies connected with the chapel were present. The service was chanted by the Rev. W. Butterfield, the minor canon in residence. The strength of the choir was considerably augmented by the addition of gentlemen connected with St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. Dr. Elvey presided at the organ.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—On Thursday next, being St. Matthew's Day, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Governors of the several royal hospitals will attend Divine service at Christ's Church, Newgate-street; after which they will repair to the Great Hall, in Christ's Hospital, where orations on the benefits which royal hospitals will be delivered by the four senior scholars, who are proceeding to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.—The steamer Great Western, Capt. Hosken Pascoe, from New York, arrived at Liverpool at four o'clock on Thursday morning, with 71 passengers, a full cargo, and the mails on board from New York, the papers she brings are anticipated by those brought by the Caledonia, which arrived on Wednesday. We learn by a remark in the extracts from the log that this vessel has not had justice done to her powers this voyage, being supplied with coals of such inferior quality that it was difficult to keep steam to a greater part of the voyage.

STATE OF SOUTH WALES.—The following being a rumour on Monday night at Llanelly that a "demonstration" of the people was intended to be made in Carmarthen next day, and it being apprehended the object might be to attack the union workhouse, the magistrates sent information to Col. Love, at Carmarthen upon the subject, on receiving which that gallant officer immediately proceeded to Llanelly, with his troop, and arrived there at an early hour on Tuesday morning. The rumour however, turned out to be unfounded. An express arrived at Carmarthen on Tuesday, stating that upwards of 60 wheat and barley-the property of E. Adams, Esq., of Middleton Hall, had been fired, and were then burning.

PORTSMOUTH.—A court-martial sat on Wednesday on board her Majesty's ship Victory, to try the officers and ship's company be going to relieve Lieutenant Lloyd, which, it may be remembered, was to the Bay of Gibraltar, by coming in contact with a French steamer of war. The commander, Lieut. Castle, and six of the company were fully acquitted of all blame in that occasion, and the Hon. Capt. Pleydell Bouverie, Mr. Slaughter, paymaster, who, having had charge of the first watch, left the deck before he was relieved by the officer of the middle watch; the court, therefore, adjudged him to lose six years of his time. The court was composed of Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, President; Captains Henderson, C.B., Sir Thomas Hastings, K.C.B., Sir T. K. T. Thompson, Bart., and Colin Andrew Hutcheson. The Judge Advocate was Captain Charles Rowley, Bart., and the Deputy Judge Advocate Mr. Kingsley. The Helena and sea ark are daily expected to be commissioned at Spithead: Admiral Colin Campbell to be Admiral Superintendent.—Sir Harbour: Victory, Excellent, and Fanny, tender.

SPAIN.—LATEST NEWS.—PERPIGNAN, Sept. 12.—Another entered Barcelona yesterday, with two Revolutionary battalions and free corps and 300 soldiers of the regular troops. The other regular troops are ordered still when the action proper is to be known. One battalion went to Monjuic; others remained in the city. The 10th being there one.

BAYONNE, Sept. 12.—On the morning of the 10th Madrid was perfectly tranquil. Lieut Colonel Colonge, Secretary of the Minister of War, left for Madrid on the night of the 8th and 9th, being the bearer of instructions from the Government.

THE LEVANT MAIL.—The Levant Mail reached Paris on Thursday with Marseilles of the 8th. It was thought that the monsoon had driven back the Bombay steamer. Reshid Pacha was also shortly to come to London. Riza Pacha being determined to get rid of him.

A copy of the Monde Vidas Reporter of the 26th of June has been received at Lloyd's, and contains the following account of a fight obtained by General Rivera, of which the following is the bulletin :—"Ensign Bustos, who has just arrived with the official news of the glorious triumph of General Rivera, states that at the moment of his departure the number of killed was calculated at upwards of 400, and that parties of prisoners were arriving every moment. The enemy's army, disorganized and totally defeated, will soon be buried under the soil, which it profanes with crimes."

IMPORTANT IF TRUE.—The Paris papers of Wednesday contain an account of a pretended conference between Lord Aberdeen and the Prince of Joinville on the affairs of Spain, at which the marriage of the young Queen is said to have formed the chief topic of discussion. It was agreed on both sides, that the immediate marriage for the young Queen was the means and end of securing the tranquility of Spain. The position affirmed, M. Guizot is said to have named the Duke d'Aumale, and Lord Aberdeen the son of Don Carlos the junior, but opposition having been announced on both sides, the respective candidates were withdrawn, and a sort of juste milieu husband, in the person of the son of Don Francisco de Paul, was agreed to.

ROYAL CAVALCADE TO THE HEIGHTS OF ORLEANS, THE SCENE OF THE FETE CHAMPETRE.

LOUIS PHILIPPE AT THE FETE CHAMPETRE, PRESENTING THE QUEEN TO THE VISITORS.

were underneath. The Queen of the French wore a lilac bonnet and feather, a cross-barred silk with wide stripes; the Queen of the Belgians, a striped silk, with garlands of flowers represented on it, and white bonnet; Madame Adelaide, a bright yellow shawl, dark silk gown, and white bonnet; the Princess Clementine, a silk écossaise, with wide squares, and chapeau de paille. Her Royal Highness also bore the portrait of her husband on her bracelet clasp. The Princess de Joinville wore a chapeau de paille, with a marabout feather; a striped silk gown, and a heavy gold bracelet, with a huge cadenas clasp. The King of the French wore a brown coat, dark trousers, and white hat. Prince Albert was in nearly the same attire as when he first landed. "God save the Queen" was played when the royal party made their appearance.

The people were admitted close to the royal table during the collation, and every opportunity was afforded to allow them to observe narrowly the illustrious guests. During the greater part of the repast, the Count de Paris stood at the left corner of the tent, outside, observing his relatives. As soon as the rôties adendi was seated the party rose from table, and advanced towards the small tent. The King here took Queen Victoria by the hand, and led her round the circle of spectators, presenting her to his subjects with evident gratification. Loud cheers, waving of handkerchiefs and hats, greeted this royal progress. Her Majesty returned those marks of respect and affection by repeated obeisances. The cheers of the spectators were redoubled as these Majesties advanced. The rest of the royal party followed in the rear, Prince Albert following the King of the French and the Queen of England. When the presentation was concluded, the party returned to the small tent, and the carriages were ordered round. The Queen of the French having recommended the ladies to wear their shawls, a general wrapping up took place, the wind having become rather sharp. The crowd were then admitted as close to the royal party as might be done with safety, when so many spirited horses were prancing about. In fact, every possible opportunity was seized of admitting the French population to see the royal visitors. Every tongue was loud in praise of Queen Victoria's grace and good looks, and her Majesty again "won golden opinions" from the French people. The cortége then drove off amidst loud cheers, and every manifestation of enthusiasm on the part of the people. The crowd was exceedingly great, and consisted chiefly of the better classes of society. A great number of English were present, the chief part of whom came over from Brighton in the Dart the preceding day. They were justly gratified at the reception which their Sovereign had met with. "God save the Queen" was again played, but very inefficiently. The half devotional, half exulting character of this fine composition was lost. The whole effect of this delightful fête was that of a happy family meeting without ceremony and without restraint. Nothing of state was apparent beyond the proper degree of form which ought always to encircle royalty, even in its hours of amusement. Every one remarked the vigorous appearance of the King. He looked 20 years younger than he did a few months ago, and his Majesty refused an outer covering, when pressed to put on a cloak or great coat at the moment the ladies wrapped themselves up in their shawls.

The dinner party in the evening at the chateau comprised the same distinguished individuals that had partaken of the King's hospitality on the preceding days; it was augmented by the presence of Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, commander of the naval squadron in attendance upon her Majesty. The Admiral's arrival that morning in the St. Vincent off Treport having been notified at the chateau, his Majesty was pleased to command that a special invitation to join the royal circle should be conveyed by a small steamer in the port to the gallant officer, who accordingly joined the royal party. At page 184, are engraved three picturesque scenes from this very charming entertainment.

THE CONCERT IN THE GALERIE DES GUISES.

paired, together with the regal, princely, noble, and distinguished persons assembled at the château, to the grand saloon on the principal floor, designated the Galerie des Guises. Louis Philippe, in order to afford his august visitor every satisfaction during her stay, had previously commanded the attendance of his private band from Paris, the members of this fine orchestra being the most celebrated professors on the different instruments of which it is composed, perhaps, to be found in Europe. The director of the King's music is Mons. Auber, the talented composer of "Massanillo," the leader was M. Girard of the Opera Comique of Paris. The orchestra played "God Save the Queen" as their Majesties and Prince Albert entered the concert-room; and after they had taken their seats in the order designated in the admirable representation of this splendid réunion given in our engraving, the following pieces were successively performed:—

1. Overture to the "Gazza Ladra" .. .. .. Rossini.
2. Andante of the symphony in "La " .. .. Beethoven.
3. Chorus. "Que de Graces; que de Majesté" .. Gluck.
4. Overture to "Zanetta" .. .. Auber.
5. Minuet and allegro of the symphony in "La" .. Beethoven.
6. Overture to "Iphigenie in Aulide" .. .. .. Gluck.
7. Air from the "Siege of Corinth" .. .. .. Rossini.
8. Chorus. "Jamais dans ces beaux lieux" (Armide) Gluck.
9. Overture to the "Magic Flute" .. .. .. Mozart.

Whilst this admirable selection of music was being performed, her Majesty's attention was occasionally directed to the portraits of the powerful and haughty line of princes which adorn the walls of the splendid apartment in which the royal party was assembled. The engraving of this magnificent scene at page 185, is from a spirited sketch by M. Morel Fatio.

THIRD DAY, TUESDAY—THE REVIEW.

The morning of this day was ushered in by the sound of trumpets, the beating of drums, and the universal movement of the busy population to a spot about four miles distant on the road to Dieppe, where it was understood Prince Albert was about to review a squadron of about 600 men of the 1st Regiment of Carabiniers à Cheval, shortly after six o'clock. The squadron took up its ground on a large plain in one of the extensive valleys with which this part of the country abounds, where they awaited the arrival of the d stinguished party at the chateau, when they were to perform their evolutions.

At seven o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Dukes d'Aumale and Montpensier, Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg, and the French generals and staff, Col. Wylde, &c., came on the ground, and the military band immediately struck up "God save the Queen." His Royal Highness was dressed in the costume of an English field-marshal, and rode a very beautiful white charger: he looked remarkably well, and sat his horse with the grace and skill of an experienced horseman. The French Princes and Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg were in their national military costume. Colonel Wylde was in regimentals; the French general officers and aides-de-camp in their respective uniforms. The appearance of the cavalcade was noble and imposing.

The regiment was formed without delay, and went through a variety of manœuvres with the precision and rapidity for which this branch of the French service is distinguished. They are a very fine body of men, and are mounted on excellent horses. Their accoutrements, brass cuirasses, and brazen helmets, are very splendid; and, when formed in line, their whole appearance is grand and warlike.

At the conclusion of the review, his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the French princes and generals dismounted. His Royal Highness then expressed his wish that the officers of the regiment should be introduced to him; his request was, of course, complied with, and the officers having dismounted, advanced on foot to the place on which Prince Albert stood, when the introduction took place, and his Royal Highness thanked the gallant band in the person of their Colonel, (a fine-looking soldierly officer with a manly voice for the word of command,) for the satisfaction they had given him by their display of military tactics, and the gratification he had received by this representation of the art of war. His Royal Highness and the rest of the party then remounted, and returned to the town.

A little trait of the condescension and affability of Prince Albert on this occasion should not be forgotten. Seeing the cantinière (suttler), who in the French service is attached to each regiment to supply refreshments to the troops, and who wears a very becoming though somewhat masculine uniform, and also receives regular pay and rations, his Royal Highness received to partake of the good things of her canteen, and was accordingly supplied with a small glass of eau de vie by the hands of the military Hebe of the Carbineers, whose attention to his wants was rewarded by a golden offering from the pocket of the Prince. The lady was, of course, highly delighted at the adventure, and expressed her gratitude in a very becoming manner, by offering his Highness any little civility in her power to grant.

On entering the town, on the return from the review of the cavalry, the royal cavalcade rode into the infantry barracks, Caserne de Montpensier, a large pile of brick building, recently erected, and very commodious; in the court-yard of which a regiment of the infantry of the line was drawn up to be inspected by his Royal Highness, the band, as on the former occasions, playing "God save the Queen." The regiment having gone through the military exercise, the princes and generals retired, and the cavalcade returned to the chateau, which they entered about half-past nine o'clock, and where a déjeûner was prepared, to which the royal party sat down.

LOUIS PHILIPPE ON THE BALCONY OF THE CHATEAU, PRESENTING THE QUEEN TO THE TROOPS AND THE PEOPLE.

GRAND CONCERT IN THE CHATEAU. SKETCHED BY MONS. MOREL FATIO.

THE VISIT TO THE CHURCH OF NOTRE DAME D'EU.

The afternoon was dedicated to a visit of inspection to the fine old church of Notre Dame d'Eu, Queen Victoria leaning on the arm of the King of the French, who pointed out all the most remarkable objects to her Majesty. It was known but to a few that their Majesties were about to visit the sacred edifice; and, consequently, there were not half-a-dozen persons therein when they arrived. The party, consisting of nearly all the members of the French Royal Family, Queen Victoria, Prince Albert, Lords Aberdeen and Liverpool, M. Guizot, and suite, entered by the side door on the western side just at four o'clock; the Queen of England walking with the King of the French, and the Queen of the French with Prince Albert. Her Majesty wore a tartan dress, with black mantle, and white silk bonnet; the King was in plain clothes, the princes in undress. The Duchess of Orleans appeared, on entering the church, to be affected by some sudden recollection, and was about to retire, when the Queen of the Belgians, taking her by the hand, led her towards the great altar. Her Royal Highness, the Queen of the French, and the Queen of the Belgians then kneeled, and continued a short time in prayer, on rising from which it was apparent that the Duchess of Orleans had shed tears.

During this interesting scene, the King was explaining to Queen Victoria the subjects of the noble windows of stained glass, with which his royal munificence has endowed the venerable edifice, and the narrative was listened to with evident curiosity by our sovereign. (See page 189.)

On leaving the nave of the church, her Majesty was conducted to the entrance to the crypt, wherein the tombs of the royal branch of Artois are contained. During the troubles of 1793, the revolutionary mob broke open these receptacles, and scattered their mortuary remains; confiscating the heavy leaden coffins which contained them to the service of the state, and reproducing them in the shape of musket bullets. On his taking possession of his inheritance, the King, then Duke of Orleans, caused the bones of his predecessors, which were lying in fragments about the vault, to be carefully collected; and a tomb was sunk beneath the floor of the crypt, wherein they were deposited. At the same time, he gave directions for the restoration of the monuments, together with the effigies of their former tenants, and for the renewal of the inscriptions indicating who they were and the date of their demise. Some of the mutilated remains of the former tombs were made available for this purpose, and the vault now presents a complete, though somewhat patched and unequal, series of monumental mementoes of the power and wealth of its tenants.

Into this vault, her Majesty, in company with King Louis Philippe and the royal party, descended, and was conducted round the whole area, which is very spacious. On reaching the upper end, the Queen stood for a few minutes close by the altar (whereon a mass for the repose of the dead is celebrated at stated epochs in the year), and took a sort of general view of the gloomy receptacle. The principal object that met her eye was the tomb of Jean d'Artois, first Count of Eu, whose effigies are the best preserved and likewise the most richly ornamented in the whole series. The King Louis Philippe, as represented in the truly picturesque woodcut that accompanies this description, stood by the side of her Majesty, and gave a brief outline of the career of this haughty and unprincipled nobleman, whose crimes, however, were considered to be amply atoned for by his fidelity to his sovereign, John of France. It was not one of the least interesting of the facts brought to Queen Victoria's recollection, when her Majesty was reminded that she was then regarding the tomb of the indisputably brave and loyal knight who, at the battle of Poictiers (fought on the 19th Sept., 1356), performed prodigies of valour in defence of

LITERATURE.

ROME, AS IT WAS UNDER PAGANISM, AND AS IT BECAME UNDER THE POPES. Two vols. London: J. Madden and Co., 1843.

We have read this work with an interest commensurate with that with which we should peruse a production of Sir E. L. Bulwer or the author of "Letters from Palmyra." The writer displays great tact and great erudition. We do not often find a labourer in the field of antiquity of such deep research, so profoundly speculative, or so vividly and eloquently descriptive. Had the ancient counsel been addressed to him—"antiquam exquizite matrem"—it could hardly have found a more willing, able, or compliant disciple. In the words of the preface—the writer, (whoever he may have been,) seems to have aimed at giving a vivid idea of the revolution, by which the Rome of the Cæsars was reduced to its prostrate state, and in which the Rome of the Popes had its beginning. With this view, he labours not only "to fill up, as it were anew, the gaps of centuries," but, completely to rebuild the imperial city; to restore the Palatine, the trophies and temples of the Forum, the Capitol, and the Campus Martius; to re-open the Thermæ, the Amphitheatre, and the Circus; to repair the aqueducts, replenish a thousand glorious fountains with their limpid treasures; not only to replace the furniture and priceless embellishments of the palaces, and rebuild the altars of the "immortal gods," but to throng the Appian and Flaminian way with the concourse of the nations, and awake, from the sleep of centuries, the Roman people and the Senate, with

> The dead, but sceptred sovereigns, who still rule
> Our spirits from their urns!

In the first and second books, the scene lies in Rome, from the second year of Claudius to the close of the first persecution in the reign of Nero. The third book opens with the spectacle of the great city reduced to irremediable desolation—just as it was beheld by Belisarius, the great captain of Justinian, when he visited the place where Rome had stood, forty days after the departure of Totila, the Goth, who had been the instrument of so much destruction. "Nothing human," says the historian, "did he suffer to remain behind, but only wild beasts and birds of prey." As by the development of the plot in the first and second books, the reader is made to witness the series of events through which Rome attained to the empire of the world, so in the third book and the following to the end of the fifth, does he behold in the same vivid portraiture, the decline, fall, and utter destruction of the seven-hilled city, and of the Roman empire of the West. In the fourth book, the standard of the cross is triumphantly borne by Constantine and his legions through the heart of the pagan city, and planted on the Capitol. In the opening of the fifth, all Rome is in the Coliseum, and the gladiators are on the arena, when Telemachus, the Greek monk, rushes between the combatants, and is stoned to death by the spectators. "Meanwhile, two barbarian kings, Alaric, an Arian, and the heathen Radogast, are both descending upon the city. The world is in suspense as to which of the two shall fall; and amidst the awful pause, the voice of St. Jerome, from his cell at Bethlehem, is made to resound through the golden palaces, warning many to fly from the wrath that is impending. The Gothic sieges, famine, humiliation of the Romans, follow; the surprise of the ancient queen of empire, at dead of night; the wonderful procession of Goths and Christians bearing sacred vessels, of immense price, to the temple of St. Peter, amidst conflagration, pillage, and horrible scenes of outrage and massacre on every side; Attila turned back by Leo the Great; Rome taken and plundered by the Vandals under Genseric, by the Herulians under Odoacer, by Theodoric; recovered from the Ostrogoths by Belisarius, and defended during a protracted siege; devastation of Italy; Rome, Totila's other sieges of Rome; direful sufferings of its unfortunate inhabitants; from their walls they see Belisarius defeated in his attempt to bring them succour; city surprised, for the last time, by the Ostrogoths under Totila, at dead of night; again, left a desert; St. Benedict, with a procession of his monks, comes along the Via Sacra, as Belisarius is rising to depart from the ruins of the Temple of Fortune, where he had been seated; and his interview with St. Benedict closes the fifth book. In the sixth book, we have a general view of Christendom, as it was in the year 800, the canonization of St. Switbert, an Anglo-Saxon missioner of the preceding age; and finally, Rome assisting at the crowning of Charlemagne on Christmas-day A.D. 800, which was the birthday of modern Europe.

The materials of this interesting and entertaining work have been arranged and cast together, we are told, under the auspices of Imagination; but they are, nevertheless, selected for the most part, we will not say wholly, from genuine and authentic sources.—The performance reminds us not a little of the "opus tumultuarium" of Belisarius, who seized upon whatever came next to hand,—whether column, statue, entablature, or altar, in his hurry to repair the walls which he had to defend against the impending assault of the barbarians.—Gibbon and Tacitus, Sallust and Sismondi, Arrighi, Strabo, and particularly Sir William Gell, Plato and Paley, Cicero and Dr. Warburton, Seneca and Sewell, Machiavelli and Polybius, Virgil and Thomas Moore, Hobhouse and Pistolesi, Aundus Flaccus and Dr. Lingard, Pliny the elder and Pliny the younger, are laid under contribution, indiscriminately; Jews and Gentiles, Greeks, Romans, and Barbarians, moderns as well as ancients, writers on civil not less than on ecclesiastical history, are pressed into this service; St. Jerome is as little spared as Procopius; Gaizot, Burnham, Schlegel, Lebrun, and Giannone, much less than Eusebius, St. Gregory the Great, Muratori, the Acta Sanctorum, or the Cardinals Baronius and Orsi. Each, however, gets credit for the quota he contributes; there are not only references, sufficiently copious, even for matters of trivial import, and for details; but generally speaking, the foot-notes will be found to contain, in extenso, the more important authorities.

The story, as we are informed in a general outline of the scope and character of the work, which is introduced to us by "two lowly wayfarers from Palestine,"—the one an aged, the other a mere youthful traveller; the former being St. Peter, the latter, his neophyte disciple and amanuensis, St. Mark. By the way, the author, fearful of the slender ground he was treading on by pursuing this plan, anticipates objections from Protestant writers who are at issue with him, and therefore ventures to state at once a few of the Protestant authorities for the fact of St. Peter's having preached the gospel in Rome, and there fixed his see. We will not stop to discuss the point with him, as to whether St. Peter ever was at Rome, at least in the manner here represented; but we admit there are some respectable authorities for the statement, such as Pearson, Basnage, and the erudite German Neander.

Like Anacharsis in Greece, the two travellers as they pass along, encounter various sights and scenes; and this gives occasion as they arise respectively, for the writer to dwell at some length on each. We are first introduced to the funeral processions of the Romans, and the honours paid by them to the dead.—Their ideas of the present and the future life are eloquently described, a belief that was interwoven with the songs and poems of Homer and Hesiod, as well as in the more recent productions of Æschylus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes. Both philosophy and history were indebted to the same tenet for their liveliest charms. From it the poet derived the machinery and moral of his verse; the lawgiver depended on it for the sanction and stability of his institutions; the magistrate for the maintenance of order and probity in the state.

The "mysteries" of religion come next under notice. The author dwells on the ancient system of a double worship, the exoteric and esoteric doctrines, upon the supposed enviable advantages of initiation, the modes of it, and the particular classes who were introduced to its higher stages. "The great secret revealed in these higher mysteries was," says our author, "that the entire system of the popular religion, so emphatically inculcated in the lesser mysteries, was an imposture and delusion. * * As a leader of the oligarchy, Marcus Tullius Cicero is a zealot for the superstitions which he ridicules in his intercourse with his own order; and Varro, the most learned of the Romans, professed without disguise that 'things were many times truths which it was not advantageous to the state to be generally known, and many things in religion which, though false, it was expedient the people should believe.'"

"It was on this iniquitous political expediency, against which the apostle denounces 'the wrath of God,'" continues the writer, "that all the grinding tyrannies of Pagan antiquity, whether administered by one, or by an oligarchy, (whether patrician or demonocratic,) were erected and sustained. The inferior and slave casts were held in profound darkness and degradation by a hardened and selfish ascendancy in each state, who kept within their own narrow circle the monopoly of all knowledge, and, therefore, of all power; nor will it be found easy to thread the labyrinth of Pagan politics, unless with this clue in hand."

Socrates was the great reformer of this system, inasmuch as he attacked the strongholds of it in the sophists;—then came Plato, combining the infallible authority of Pythagoras with the free-thinking principles of Socrates, his master;—after him came the doubters, Arce-laüs and Pyrrho; and thus everything conspired to prepare the way for Epicurus, of whose delightful garden, Moore, in his "Alciphron," thus writes:—

> "Where bliss, in all the countless shapes
> That fancy's self to bliss hath given,
> Came clustering round, like ripe sad grapes
> That woo the traveller's lip at even."

"Under the enervating despotism of Augustus and his successors, now protracted beyond half a century, the philosophy of concupiscence" (i. e. the Epicurean,) observes our author, "was universally embraced; and the hymns which so aroused the sympathies of the venerable pilgrim [St. Peter] as he journeyed along among the tombs, were but a partial echo of the sentiments which then prevailed through the entire length and breadth of the Roman empire. And yet, it would seem as if the primeval dogmas of the soul's immortality, and of an all-ruling Providence, had remained firm and in full integrity beneath the ruins of the impostures which had been constructed on them. Humanity still clung to them by its instincts, after the shipwreck of its faith. The barren idea that there was no heaven, no bright, blissful, intermingable home hereafter, had rendered Hope insane; nor could she be induced, even by the blandishments of Epicurus, or by any brutal satiety of the passions, to relinquish her sublime and immemorial aspirations without regret. Oh, how sordid and odious 'the sty' in which she was now taught by Philosophy to imbrute herself, compared with that pure and celestial region of immortality to which the inspired longings of her bosom had been so loudly and so long directed! * * * Yet, it was in the vehemence of her desperation, that the venerable pilgrim discerned the overtures of her cure. It was the object of his own mission to preach to her, and give her the tangible guarantees which neither Plato nor any of the philosophers or sages of Greece had been able to give, that 'One who had passed through the gate of death had returned to his brethren, with tidings the most ineffable and peremptory, that there awaited them beyond the grave, not an elysium such as the poets sung, or the pagan creed represented, but such a heaven as neither eye hath seen, ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to picture.'" Here we must stop in our brief analysis of these elaborately learned, but at the same time most interesting, conscientious, and eloquent volumes. The writer, whoever he be, whether Protestant or Catholic, is entitled to our thanks for the wholesome instruction and entertainment they afford; and we can assure the reader who is curious in ancient matters, that he will not find many works better calculated to satisfy his most ardent curiosity than the one we have here so imperfectly attempted to bring before his notice.

AN ESSAY ON THE WORKS OF FREDERIC CHOPIN. Wessel and Co.

> He was a mighty poet, and
> A subtle subtle psychologist.—SHELLEY.

This is surely the production of some enthusiast, who, thinking himself "high spher'd in heav'n" by the adoption of a balloon (we mean inflated) style of composition, the very worst desecration of a goose quill we ever met with, has beaten Macpherson hollow; for if Goldsmith thought that the ovi-distant translator of "Ossian" deserved the severe one of

> Macpherson write bombast and call it a style,

what would not this professor of "verbosity and froth" deserve at the hands of any body who has a respect for the purity of his native language? Gentle reader! Judge of the author's manner yourself: we give an extract:—

We now come to the "Tarantella," Op. 43, which, for sparkling animation and deliciously characteristic gaiety, has no competitor among the smaller works of Chopin. We can liken this charming sketch to nothing so appropriately as to one of the delicate pictures of our inspired Cuyp, whose pencil the tarantella has been so often rendered poetical, in its purest sense. As we proceed with the "Tarantella" of Chopin we are seeing all the while, mentally, on the canvas of Cuyps, and our doubt is only with whom to adjudge the preference,—a doubt which merges into certainty of the same size entire equality of painter and musician. A greater compliment than which could scarcely be paid to either. The piece is in the key of A flat major, of which a new feature, for, till now, we never heard of a "tarantella" in other than a minor key. However Chopin shows us that he can render the major mode as suppliant and bewitching as the minor—as tarantulan and fat at about alike—as mournfully gay and sparklingly melancholy—the true characteristics of the singular national dance. The tune is presto, and the theme, in melody as simple as the first axiom in mathematics, is rendered piquant and soi-disant by the assistance of the most tasteful, savoury, and piante-tickling harmonies conceivable. The course of this simple motivo lies through a world of evolving progressions—among the intricacies of which it is conducted or led step-ah-vance of a ruling accompaniment or light-footed triplets, which bear away their delicious burden with all the delight of a lover carrying his mistress to the world's end—when carrying it, and hasting it tenderly away, coquetting with it, and leaving it to its own guidance—then rushing back to it as rapidly

> "As comets to the sun"—

anon embracing it, and hugging it with close amplectitude, exemplifying musically the ancient and popular amatoriana—the epithalmics of intense and comprehension—till joyfully and fleetly they bear it to the end of its journey, on the wings of an irresistible and inflammable pedal passage which is enough to stir you off your feet with sore excitement. We could play this "Tarantella" for ever; and yet—ought we not to be ashamed to confess it—until we heard it interpreted by the master finger of Mr. Henry Field (of Bath), we distrusted and misapprehended it. All hail to thee, Henry Field!

Boileau, who was the best satirist since the latest of the Romans has some good lines, which we will venture to quote here:—

> Soyez plutôt maçon, si c'est votre talent,
> Ouvrier estimé, dans un art nécessaire
> Qu'écrivain commun et sans Art.

But the author of this essay does not come under the last denomination!

The General Steam Navigation Company's packet the Dart, which arrived at Brighton on Tuesday morning from Dieppe, brought information of the departure of Louis Philippe from the Chateau d'Eu for Paris. His Majesty left the chateau at ten o'clock on Monday night.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO A SLEEPING INFANT.

Young stranger! in a cold and heartless world!
Why doth thy spirit come
To make this earth its home?
Thou look'st like one whose wings
By the undying springs
Of Immortality were erst unfurl'd,
To soar an angel's flight
Through realms of boundless light,
Like those rare birds
Which Poets' words
Have call'd the Pride of Paradise,
That never quit the skies,
But in eternal heav'n float on!*
From that fair flock art thou a wand'ring one?
Or art thou with the cherub smile
Mortal the while?

Say—Wilt thou like the woodland roses,
That in Autumn's ripening closes,
Change their sweet flow'rs
To bitter sours,
Berries red and rank?
Wilt thou forego
That innocent carnation glow,
(So like an evening sunbeam upon snow!)
When on the bank
Of Time's cold river
Age may make thee shiver,
And for thy present loveliness
Put on the livery of the world's distress,
Turning thy infant sweetness to old bitterness?
Forbid it Angels! in whose care
Buds like thee, so young and fair,
Beauty's blossoms, are consign'd!
May thy face, and form, and mind,
Be as like thy guardian spirit's
As the child of earth inherits,
Or is here, with us below
Permitted man to be or know!

May thy pathway be through flow'rs,
Lighted up by sunny hours;
In thy cadence down the vale
Of life, and in the twilight pale,
Let the stars of Heav'n be o'er thee,
Showing the bright way before thee;
Till when call'd at last above,
Thy day may close in peace and love!

One kiss, sweet baby! I'll not break
The slumbers of thy vermeil cheek! W.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

NEWS FROM CHINA.—This is the title of a farcetta which was produced at the Haymarket Theatre last week. The intelligence which it conveys is not of much importance to anybody unconnected with the representation.

TERPSICHOREANS.—Fanny Eissler, Mdme. Proche Giubilei and M. Silvain (alias Mr. Sullivan of Cork,) have had a most successful reception in Dublin. With regard to Silvain, who is a most accomplished dancer, we must say that it is hard an artist cannot obtain notice in his own country without foreigning his patronymic.

HEREFORD MUSICAL MEETING.—This festival, which took place last week in All Saints Church, in consequence of the cathedral being under repair, we regret to state did not exhibit the union of the three choirs in their accustomed splendour. On the other hand, it is to be hoped that, as the expenses have been less, the profits resulting from his conjunction of charity and enjoyment may prove to be considerable. The collections after the three services amounted to £865.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

"What is sport to you, is death to us."
The Philosophy of a celebrated Frog.

It is said that the relation between pleasure and pain is so intimate that it is impossible to define where one ends and the other begins. If this be true in a physical sense, it is doubly so in a moral; and he who should desire to prove both propositions, could not do so more effectually than by add ping laughing and crying in a sentence of the first, and winning and losing of the last. If the reader could see us as we write, he would understand how pat to our purpose came these illustrations. We are sitting in the subscription-room at Doncaster and the people about us are paying and receiving on the past Leger—and wagering away on the coming Great Yorkshire Handicap. See, there is a wretch with his eloquent cheeks still moist after the parting with his gold, but already red hot with hope and the undicap. Money is passing between those two father Whitehalls—which is the payer, which the payee? But all, though there be, accord ng to Byron, as much pleasure in being cheated as in cheating, we consider that he gentleman should have the privilege of erection between them. Wherefore we say this more emphatically just now than usually, perad venture, may be caused from the sequel.

Having introduced ourselves to the reader in the rooms at Doncaster, he will understand that the time is during the race meeting of 1843. Now, when he calls to mind that Lord Eglinton was not present at Epsom races, as we various sporting papers, by Mr. Bowes's Cotherstone, he (or she) will not be surprised to hear that a great many went down into Yorkshire to see it canter over for on the Doncaster course. Having arrived there, these gentlemen in search of the forgone conclusion, found that there was to be a race of a race after all: something was to be got up to amuse the spectators—but it was a 10 to 1 on Cotherstone, of course: "He could carry four-teen and win." The first thing at eight mustered at the post—to see the eger disposed of as the Derby had been—announced to nine, (" Here's nick to odd numbers," cries Harry O'Brien,) Cotherstone, Priz ighter, Lucetta colt, Norwith, Retreat, Tarnsetz, Arsinides, Manta, and Dumpling: none, however, even mentioned in the betting save the favourite. Prizeighter (5 to 1), and Lucetta colt (6 to 1). Every body, except a few desperate ages, were on the favourite—for small amounts, it is true, but £ s. d. £ s. d.; and, therefore, they were anxious for him to finish his canter, and, when the attempt was commenced with regularity, in fair starts, that they could "lose off their d——ned horses and begin." When they did begin, Prizefighter jumped off with the lead closely attended by Norwith, Cotherstone (for the pace was unusually tell ing a ter them far from certainly—the luck of outsiders at this book, in this fashion, Prizefighter being the speed ruinously—("Is it an enemy hath done this thing?")—they approach the Red House, where the race is, with the three named, Arsinides and Manta. Before they come to the distance, however, Arsinides is ished, and, lo! the leader gives way, and Cotherstone goes to the front? "By the Lady! but he takes it easy! Look, Norwith is first; Butler, where are your spurs, where is your whalebone?" Heard he to orders, or why does he at all?" Thou who asks the question RIDES not—thou art laughing at the other side of the mouth! "Norwith wins." "Cotherstone is left—he's done!"—"Prizefighter!"—"uncommon do,"—" playing with a race!" thus ejaculated the raging layers of the odds as the crack of Marton returned to scale—one at our side, as and but more sober than the others, soliloquising—as did the injured frog in the fable—" Ah, Mr. Bowes, what is sport to you, is death to us!"

From the hour that they brought forward Cotherstone for the Leger at 2 to 1, we have never ceased to warn our readers how they ventured on such speculation—we told them he couldn't win—at the odds—that no horse ever did. Will they not take us on all future occasions of the sort, as their "guide, philosopher, and friend?"

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

DONCASTER RACES.

These far famed races commenced on Monday last, rather inauspiciously as it turned out, with a match, in which Blue Bonnet, the winner of the St. Leger last year, showed temper before she had run a quarter of a mile, and got rid of her jockey; her opponent was thus left to canter over. The following is a description of the racing:—

Match, 300 sovs. Half forfeit. St. Leger course.

Mr Payne's f. Maula, 3 yrs, 7st 4lb (Neal), beat Lord Jermone's Blue Bonnet, 4 yrs 8st 9lb. (Lye).

5 and 6 to 1 on Maula. The non favourite made slow running to the gravel road, where she united against the rails, and pitched Lye over her head, leaving Maula to canter home by herself. Lye escaped without injury.

Her Majesty's Plate of 100 guineas for three yrs, 7st 9lb; four yrs, 8st; five yrs, 8st 9lb; six yrs and aged, 9st. Four miles.

Mr D Cook's Tredrake, 4 yrs	(Lye)	1
Mr Chaplin's Queen of Trees 4 yrs	(Mann)	2

6 to 4 agst Wee Pet; 3 to 2 agst Treebay; 5 to 1 agst Queen of Trees, and 8 to 1 each agst the others. Queen of Trees made a fine running to the second oval, and then fell behind Queen of Trees, who made the pace good, and was never disturbed in the lead until within the distance of the second round, Treebay, who had been lying off, then set off and her, left several lengths in front, and won cleverly by a length. Wee Pet was beaten at the stand, an, finished a bad third. Queen of Trees broke down at the Red House.

The Champagne Stakes of 10 sovs each, h ft, for two-year old colts, 8st 7lb; fillies 8st 5lb. The second saved his stake. Red House in. (32 subs)

Mr Williamson's The Cure	(Hesseltine)	1
Mr Osbaldeston's Sus to Martingale	(Pearce)	2
Mr Irwin's Frog o Baldago	(Nat)	3

Betting -2 to 1 agst the Cure, 5 to 2 agst Fanny Eden, 3 to 1 each agst Sus and Thread, The Princess, Epilogue, and Con. Black Rose, and 10 to 1 agst Frog o Baldago.

The first start was badly managed, and proved a failure, in the second, in which all got off well except Sister to Martingale, The Curé took the lead, made running from end to end, and won in a canter two lengths. Fanny Eden, who coughed several times before starting, ran second to the second, and was then passed by the Irish colt, and the latter, being caught half way on the distance by Sister to Martingale, was beaten out of the second money half a length. Con. Black Rose was a bad fourth, All round my Hat fifth, and the others beaten off

A Plate of £50 for horses, &c., that never Plate or Sweepstakes. Heats. St. Legr Course

Lord Exeter's Revocation, 4 yrs	(Darling)	1 1
Mr Mostyn's Lucifer, 4 yrs	(Marlow)	2 2

Revocation was the favourite, and won by a neats cleverly.

THURSDAY.

Wee Pet's defeat sent the Lucetta 6 to 5 to 1 (inserel), and caused a reaction in favour of Priestfighter to the extent of a couple of pollers, Contraetour, meanwhile, became a greater favourite, standing at the longest at 7 to 1, 14 to 1 each was offered aget Manks and Nutcutts, and 25 to 1 taken about Arstides. The betting at night was progressing in the extreme. a "sudden impulse," arising from a rumoured lameness, sent Priestfighter to 2s to 1; the supporting party, however, bore up stoutly, and in the course of an hour and a half reinstated him at 5 to 1. The outlay on the field was considerable. The Lucetta colt was backed for £200 at 6 to 4, and for various smaller amounts at 7 and 8 to 1. The changes amongst the other horses were of a trivial nature.

TUESDAY.

The closing the all important day of the meeting, considerable excitement prevailed in the town, in consequence of a rumour that Priestfighter had thrown a colt, and it was not until after the arrival of Contraetour and his second in command that the violent fluctuations in the betting began to subside. About seven o'clock the betting room assumed its natural centre, and continued with some spirit until near one; its chief, indeed its entire interest centred in the two animals, Priestfighter's backers bearing up with no much energy that before the doors were closed three to one was taken, in a moument, of course, affected the result, but from to one, laid at one time and three to one, refused to accept in four, with plenty of takers. Business was read and at the Grand Stand, and with a different effect, Priestfighter was, and large sums coming into the market in support of the Lucetta colt, in consequence a sudden change in the betting, which had the front of the betting at the Grand Contraetour suffered a further decline, and Nutcutts, Manks, and Arstides were only backed for small sums, at about the actual business was confined to the three principal favourites.

The first event in the last game in a walk over; the next afforded a splendid race between the Lucetta colt and Blue Bonnet, in the second the Lucetta colt was again victorious; but with a little "soft sawder" on his behalf, with a little "soft sawder" on his behalf, and within five minutes of the time fixed for starting for the Derby Stakes, the horses were again at the post and the next manœuvring having been better managed on all sides, two race commenced equitably for all, engaged in it.

The Cleveland Handicap of 70 sovs each, 10 ft, but 5 on y if declared, with £50 added; the second saves his stake. One mile. 23 subs, 5 of whom declined.

Lord Chesterfield's Ko ghi of the Winnie, 5 yrs, 8st 12lb	(Nat)	1
Lord Exeter's Blue Bonnet, 4 yrs, 7st 7	(M. Nicol)	2

Betting—Even on Pussy, 7 to 4 agst Knight of the White S, and 6 to 1 agst Blue Bonnet.

The Knight of the White Winnie jumped off in front, and with a lead of three or four lengths carried it unerring to the distance, when Blue Bonnet challenged him; at the same moment Pussy had a little of the best of it, but was collared near the end and beaten by a head; Philip a bad third. Haverscroft did not go a yard.

The Great St. Leger Stakes of 25 sovs each, h ft; for three yr old colts, 8st 7lb; fillies, 8st 5lb; the second to receive £300 out of the stakes, and the third to save his stake. the winner to pay 500 sovs towards the expenses of the Stand. St Leger Course. (137 subs)

Mr S Weather's Naturelt, by Touchby	(J Marson)	1

Mr Sowerby's Reviewer, by Romulus	(W. Noble)	0
Major Yarburgh's Dumpling, by Muley Moloch ..	(Temp emans)	0

Betting.—After several fluctuations the odds closed finally as follows:—6 to 4 on Contraetour, 6 to 4 agst Priestfighter and 5 to 1 agst Lucetta colt. 7 to 1 each against Naturelt, Manks, 20 to 1 agst Arstides; 25 to 1 agst Dumpling, 40 to 1 agst Treebay.

(For description of the race, see "National Sports.")

The Selling Stakes of 30 sovs each, with 60 added. The winner to be sold for £200, if demanded. The Final Stakes of the St. Leger course. (2 subs.)

Mr Gibbs's The Ace, 3 yrs, 8st 12lb	(Simpson)	1
Mr Wilson's The Rodd	(Cartwright)	2

Even on Ace, who won easy by two lengths, and was claimed.

The Corporation Plate of 50 sovs. Heats two miles.

Sir G. Mosely's Diamond, 4 yrs, 7st 12lb	(Cartwright)	1 1
Mr. Palmer's f by Voltaire, out of Zephyrina, 3 yrs, 6st 7lb ..	(Abdale)	2 2

WEDNESDAY

Match 200—Lord Chesterfield's Joan of Arc beat Lord Glasgow's f out of Snowball. The Final Stakes of 150 each.

Sixteen ran. A splendid race; won by a head, the third only beaten by a neck.

DONCASTER CUP.

"THE DONCASTER CUP.—It will be admitted that the subject chosen for the racing cup at Doncaster this season is rather a novel one. It is not an imaginative illustration of racing or field sport, but a bona fide equestrian statistic—and an admirable likeness, moreover—of his Grace the Duke of Wellington. It has been moulded in silver from the models of Messrs. Bailey, R.A., and Macdowell, and, in indeed, an exquisite piece of workmanship. The Duke, who, we have been informed, sat on this occasion to the artist, is represented in a plain military surtout, and wearing the Waterloo sword; his air is very soldierly, and his striking features—modelled in form they now have an highly expressive of the great qualities of the hero's mind. His charger is a spirit-ed one—all fire and spirit, as he paws the air, and seems impatient for the fray. While the utmost attention has been given to the details of the noble animal's formation, the freedom which gives him to it as a who e has been happily caught—and is no less happily transferred from the original model to the silver cast. The value of the prize is 105 guineas, and one of the most which belongs to it, as a finished work, is we understand due to the suggestions and superintendence of Colonel Gurwood, the faithful friend and historian of the noble duke.—(A sec.er from Mr. Bailey on this subject will be found elsewhere).

GRAN FER. Lord Fanshawe had a strong party this season of sportsmen in Glen Fek, the cover for which was in excellent condition, and well stocked with game for the season. Hunter had a 300 brace of grouse rewarded their toil The first four days the average of the bag was about 80 brace a gun. Sir Thos Monteriffe was the most successful.

CRICKET.—A grand match, which terminated on Wednesday, has been played at Slough between the county of Sussex (with A Mynn, Esq.), and All England. The in first innings, excited general admiration The Sussex players were defeated by 1 Darling for three runs were only obtained a considerable number of persons present to witness which we have been furnished with the names of the eleven on each side, but distinguished ourselves, but the appearance of our columns will, we trust, be an ample apology for not doing them any more elaborate notice.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

MADEIRA.—Beyond the accustomed arrivals and departures of packets, we have had but little occurrence. Her Majesty's brig Savage (Brower, Lieutenant Commander) put into this port on the 8th inst., and proceeded to Tripoly, whence she arrived on the 22nd inst. On the 20th her Barcelona, having six months' provisions on board. She sailed on the following day for Gibraltar, and passed the Savage on the 22nd, when the latter was under way to the ports and anchored. She sailed this morning (Sept. 1) for Portugal and Arcachon with, having on board Mr. Niven Kerr and his wife, and the Rev Mr Maloney. The former gentleman has been appointed to succeed the late Dr. Ashburn, her Britannic Majesty's Consul at Oporto By our last advices we find that her Majesty's ship Dwarf had been on a trip to Barbary, where some differences had arisen between her Majesty's Consul, Wilmsen, and the governments, which appear to have been arranged. It is, however, reported in Oporto that the part of the Consul will be submitted to the Foreign Office for investigation The captain of l'Aigle (Brazy) was dangerously ill at Oporto. There is a report, which requires some degree of consistency by the preparations making, that the admiral will shortly visit this island with the frigate he commands, but not in person. Her Majesty's steamer Vesuvius, which for some time past has been at Algiers, arrived here on the 27th inst. from Constantina, to which place she had probably proceeded in order to avoid quarantine here. The Pique, which arrived here on the 31st inst., continues her voyage to the Cape of Good Hope, with a full cargo of goods and several passengers. She is expected to sail from Madeira about the 17th inst. Lord Exmouth, with the Queen Charlotte, arrived on the 26th ult. for Syracuse Her Majesty's ship Belvidera, the Hon. G. Grey, arrived the 31st ult. from Gibraltar, and will sail again early to-morrow morning. Her Majesty's ship Spartan, though frame is her repaired anchorage. Our last Levant advices state the Devastation was at Constantinople on the 14th. The Turkish fleet was lying at Mytilene. Admiral Walker is expected to visit the island with the frigate he commands. The Spartan, performed quarantine, will proceed to her to England, which country he has permission to visit on a three months' leave of absence. Her Majesty's ship Rodney sailed from Gibraltar for Malta, as she may be therefore duly ordered for. On board are Lord Clarence Paget, of her captain, who will on receiving the command succeed the Marquis of Ormonby, Captain Stewart as Flag Lieutenant, the late commander of the unfortunate Isaac, and his officers generally. The Rodney will probably be laid aside on his arrival, to inquire into all the circumstances of the case. Her Majesty's ship Vernon, being about to be relieved by the Tyne, may be expected from Lisbon on the 10th inst. Her Majesty's steamer Acheron arrived from Gibraltar on the 29th ult. Her Majesty's steamer Hecla, which arrived from Lisbon on the 30th ult., left the harbour again on the 31th for the same destination. The French fleet being there now consisted of the Jemmapes, admiral, and the Suffren, but two more were soon to join. Her Majesty's steamer Arrogant has passed on to the Levant, bound to Constantinople, charged by the Admiral's government to register the powers of the Sultan's Government, receiving from on board one will return again to the Atlantic. On the arrival of the Spartan from Lisbon we learn that the United States brig Fairfield was lying there on the 24th ult. By the arrival of the Neapolitan mail boat on the 1st, we received a letter of that date from Naples, dated the 24th ult. Her Majesty's ship Dwarf, 26, being in the Bay of Naples, bound to Palermo, on the 29th ult. She left the Bay of Naples on the following day, and proceeded to Palermo. Bonaparte, Ceylon and Victoria Company's ship Mary Wood, French; the Leonidas and Tancredo Neapolitan; the Britannia, N.S. &c. &c. ships had been placed under arrest, with the exception of the Leonidas. William Mainwaring, assistant surgeon of her Majesty's steamer Acheron, has been promoted to that rank in her Majesty's service, his commission having been granted him by the admiralty commanding

The Royal Adelaide, a steam vessel, Master Samuel B. Cook, which left the river on Tuesday, the 5th inst., with Admiral Sir George Cockburn, first naval lord of the Admiralty, on board, Lady Cockburn and daughter, for Antwerp, returned to Deptford on Saturday, and was paid off. The Royal Adelaide, although [illegible] has proved a very swift vessel, and the alterations made in the vessel under the immediate superintendence of Mr. Lang, jun., by inspecting her 13 feet, and introducing engines of 30-horse power for 80 horse power, have produced a great improvement, and she is now decidedly the fastest sailing and most comfortable vessel in the [illegible] with the single exception of the Ariel and the Victoria and Albert.

The Erebus, Captain J. C. Ross, and the Terror, Commander F. R. M. Crozier (captain), recently returned into the south polar regions to Woolwich, after discovering a portion of [illegible] were ordered to Chatham to be paid off, and were towed down the river by [illegible] and another, preparatory to being paid off immediately, as the services of their commanders will be shortly required to proceed on a similar expedition.

DEATH OF GENERAL W. BROOKE. Intelligence of the death of the above gallant general has been received at the Horse Guards The melancholy event occurred at Jamaica, where general Brooke had arrived with distinction throughout the Peninsular war, and upwards of 50 years in the army, his commissions being dated as follows:—Ensign, April 25, 1793, Lieutenant, October 1, 1795; Captain, December 1, 1795; Major, December 28, 1797; Lieutenant-Colonel, January 1, 1800; Colonel, July 25, 1811; Major-General, June 4, 1813; Lieutenant-General, May 27, 1825; and General, November 29, 1841. He retired from the 3rd Dragoon Guards many years back.

DEVONPORT, Sept. 12.—The only arrival at this port this week is that of the Belleisle, Capt. Augustus Kempthorne, R.N., and had also a number of passengers on board. Early on the morning of the 7th inst. during a sharp gale of wind, the ship struck on the southwest rock off Rodrigues, and in the course of the day became a total wreck. Most of the passengers, Capt. Black, the commander, and some of the crew, were saved; but Mr. James Scott, the first officer, Mr. Robert Pankett, a passenger, and nine seamen, were drowned in a hasty attempt to reach the shore.

WRECK OF THE ANNSIA THOMPSON.—The loss of this valuable vessel, the property of Sir John Pirie, happened about eighty miles east by north of Madras, on the morning of the 3rd of May. She was suddenly overtaken by a squall, which threw her on her beam-ends. Part of the crew were saved, but seven met with a watery grave. Their names are Mr. Charles Quarry, chief mate; John M'Neil, third mate; J. Gibson, ship's carpenter; A. M'Nab, seaman; R. Wills, cook; J. Lowe and J. Palmer, seamen, drowned in consequence of their inability to swim off to the boat, which could not be reached by any other means. Mr. Dawson, the commander, did not leave the vessel until she was nearly under water, and he only saved himself by clinging to the mast he was afterwards picked up in an exhausted state, about a hundred yards from the spot where the vessel foundered. The ship was about 250 tons burden.

NEW YORK, August 21.—The Bermudian brig Rebecca, from St. Jago de Cuba, for Halifax, drove ashore on Egg Island, near Cape Harrison, on the 5th instant, and is expected to become a total loss. Crew saved, cargo washing ashore The Princess Augusta, bottom up, was taken in tow on the 25th instant, fifty miles west of Cape Sable, and one man taken from her by the Margaret, arrived at Gloucester; the remainder of the crew were drowned. The George Stevens, from Liverpool, and the Ocmi, from St. John's, New Brunswick, to London, were in contact, Aug. 10th, off Cape Sable, and both received considerable damage. The Louis Philippe, from Havre, encountered, off the east end of St. George's, a heavy gale at S.E., lost sails, shipped seas, which carried away quarter-boat, caboose, shifted ballast, stove bulwarks, &c

LOSS OF THE MISSOURI STEAM FRIGATE.—This fine vessel, allowed to be one of the finest belonging to the United States, was discovered at eight o'clock, P.M., on Saturday, August 26, to be on fire in the Bay of Gibraltar, and the discovery was immediately followed by flames issuing from the engineers' store-room, where it is supposed it originated amongst the combustible spirits and oils deposited there. The large pipes were put into operation without a moment's delay, but the nature of the ignited article rendered it impossible to stop the progress of the flames. The moment the fire was discovered, Captain Sir George Seymour, of the Malabar, 74 guns, then in the bay, self-steered and commenced under his own immediate superintendence, and the Locust steam-vessel, Lieutenant Commander John Lean, got up her steam, and on coming across, one of the vessels endeavoured to tow her into deeper water, but she had unfortunately already grounded, and could not be moved from her position at the time the fire broke out. Finding it impossible to scuttle the vessel, and great danger and loss of life being apprehended should the fire which was progressing rapidly, have communicated with the two powder magazines, it was resolved to flood them, which was done, and only a trifling explosion took place about three o'clock on Sunday morning. General Sir R. T. Wilson, the governor of the fort, on the fire breaking out, proceeded personally to the wharf leading to the Waterport gate, and requested two fire engines under the charge of the Royal Sappers and Miners, but their united efforts, with others, and the crew of the vessel, proved unavailing to check the progress of the flames, and it was only when all hopes of their being conquered the noble ship to destruction; but it was not until eleven o'clock a.m. that Captain Newton and his gallant crew left her, burned to the water's edge and in one mass of reserved wood and cinders.

SOUTH SEA FISHERY.—Sydney, New South Wales, May 4, arrived the Genil, Aldrich, from the South Seas, with 850 barrels, out 18 months; Scamander, of Sydney, Nov 9, 1841, out 3 months, with 100 barrels, which had spoken the Mary, M'Donald, out 18 months, with 400 barrels; Nimrod, of Sydney, New South Wales, Feb. 6, 1843, out 14 months, with 850 barrels. Of Redmond—the Jane, of Sydney, New South Wales, Feb. 8, 1843, out 3 months, with 200 barrels, same day, Nerzad, of London, out 24 months, with 700 barrels.

The total number of vessels which passed the Sound from the 1st of January to the 1st of August this year was 7618; in the corresponding period of 1842 the number was only 7068, which shows an increase of 550 vessels. A material decrease may be noted notwithstanding in the progression of shipping under the British flag. In 1841 British vessels passed the Sound in 842, but this year no more than 1579, being a fall off of 291. The vessels under the Prussian flag, which in 1842 numbered 421, fell in 1843 to 33 this year. There was also a decrease under the Hanoverian and Lubeck flags. The increase will therefore be almost exclusively under the Swedish, Danish and Prussian flags, although no reports have yet been stated. The increase under the Russian flag was the total number of 351 vessels this year against 341 last year.

HEREAFTER MASSACRE AT SEA.—By the St. George, Captain Norris, arrived from Sydney, New South Wales, papers have been received up to May 6, and from the Sydney Herald of May 6th, by which we are informed of the horrid details of a massacre on board the English whaler Columbine, Captain Bampfylde, in which the most of the crew were barbarously butchered by eight natives of the Isle of Pines, who were left on board. The captain and Mr M Leod, a passenger, were on shore at the time. It appears that during the affray Finnie, the mate, fired into the magazine, thereby causing an explosion to which the vessel was shortly after consigned to the deep. The following is the list of the dead. On the captain getting on board the scene is described as forming an image of treachery never before paralleled, and almost too shocking to relate. With great difficulty the famous were extinguished, and the vessel got off to sea, when, after a few days, they fell in with the Norman of London, Captain Baker, with 1400 barrels of oil, from whom the necessary assistance was obtained.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

It is said that there are at present upwards of 2000 visitors congregated at Harrogate; and all the other watering-places in the north of England, Scarborough, Seaton, Carew, Redcar, Tynemouth, Shotley-bridge, Gilsland, as well as the Lakes, are teeming with gay and fashionable company.——The Admiral hoisted his flag next week at Plymouth, in honour of her Majesty, are said to have been heard of.——It is now understood that there will be no immediate vacancy for Sheffield, and that both Mr. Ward and Mr. Parker will retain their seats.——Captain Hamilton has issued an address to his constituents of Ayrshire, in which he announces that he intends to be says it is his intention to return as soon as the severity of the ensuing winter has passed, and to resume the discharge of his parliamentary duties.——The restoration of York Minster is proceeding in the most satisfactory manner. H. Hewing, Esq , in the chair. The report having been received and adopted, resolutions in conformity with the objects were agreed to, and a vote of thanks being passed to the chairman, the meeting separated.

THE HERRING FISHERY.—The Aberdeen Herald states that the fishing there, now about to finish, has not been, on the whole, successful, none of the boats having got the length of 200 crans, the average of the season being 70 crans. The week's landing at Peterhead, however, seems to have been good, and there the general average for the season is 183 crans per boat. The quantity already caught at Peterhead, including Bodham and Buchahaven, will be fully 70,000 barrels. At Aberdeen the fishing has ceased so suddenly as it set in, and, after the 23rd inst., no herrings were got on the ground where so many had been but a few days before.

MELANCHOLY OCCURRENCE.—A dreadful accident occurred to a fine lad named Baton, twelve years of age, at Fulham, a few days ago, when casually meeting with another and manly Bagnard, who was armed with a gun with a percussion lock, with which he was going to shoot sparrows, some conversation took place, and in striving to fix on a percussion cap, the contents of the gun were discharged into the body of Bolton, who died immediately.

UNITED STEAM FLEET OFF TREPORT. ST. VINCENT, 120 GUNS, IN THE DISTANCE.

his king, and suffered himself to be taken prisoner with him rather than desert the monarch who had so richly endowed him. John of Arton accompanied the royal captive of our Black Prince to London; he formed part of his cortège when, with a sort of proud humility, the victorious son of Edward III. entered publicly into London, riding by his prisoner's side on an undersized pony; and in the evening had the mortification of witnessing the still more imposing self-abasement of the conqueror, who, barehead and on his knees, offered the services of an attendant to the powerful prince who was then at his mercy. On quitting the vault the royal party mounted the char-à-bancs which were in attendance, and took a lengthened drive, returning to the chateau through the garden-gate on the Treport road, and taking a turn round the pépinière, previous to dressing for dinner. In the evening, a concert was performed in the Salle des Gardes; and a party to visit the royal yacht as she lay at anchor in the road of Treport was proposed, and partly agreed upon.

In the course of this day, (after breakfast) an agreeable surprise was offered to her Majesty, which gave occasion to many complimentary reflections on the admirable tact and taste displayed by King Louis Philippe in whatever he does. Two very magnificent specimens of the invaluable products of the Gobelin manufactory were ordered by the King to be sent down from Paris, and on their arrival they were suspended in the great gallery on the rez de chaussée of the palace. When ready for inspection, Queen Victoria was conducted by the King to the apartment, and requested by her host to accept them as a souvenir of the memorable occasion on which they first met her view. Several other gorgeous and truly regal gifts were at the same time offered to and accepted by her Majesty: the most remarkable of which were some savonnerie carpets (likewise the production of the royal looms) of exquisite beauty; and a coffer containing some of the most lovely and rare échantillons of the celebrated porcelain of the royal manufactory of Sevres, which were not only most divinely painted, but which had also the merit of being what is termed by the connoisseurs in these articles of virtu, of the old pâte tendre, a species of porcelain that can no longer be made, as no earth can be procured fine enough to supply the material for it.

THE ST. VINCENT SALUTING THE STEAM FLEET.

The subjects of the Gobelin tapestry presented to the Queen are the two grand pictures by Le Brun, representing the Death of Meleager and the Chase of the Calydonian Boar. These celebrated compositions, which are in the Royal Gallery, are admirably reproduced by the workmen, or rather the series of workmen, who wove the tapestry; and it could not but add to the interest which these splendid productions raised in her Majesty's mind when she was informed by the King that sixty years had elapsed since they were first commenced; and, consequently, that the unfortunate Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette might have issued the orders in person which led to the beautiful results then before the Queen's eyes.

The pair of engravings, towards the middle of page 180, represent two very interesting episodial scenes from the incidents of Tuesday. It appears that the Duchess of Orleans was at the chateau, but, being in weeds, French etiquette did not allow her to dine in public. The Duchess was, however, one of those who went to Treport to welcome the Queen; and her Majesty visited the Duchess after dinner, and saw "the young people," to whom she paid such gratifying attentions, that she speedily became a favourite with all of them. These endearing attentions were often renewed, more especially on Tuesday, when Queen Victoria and the Duchess of Orleans promenaded for some time with the young Comte de Paris and the Comte d'Eu in the gardens of the chateau. This charming scene of domestic affection is the subject of the first engraving; and in its companion are portrayed the Queen and Princesses promenading in an allée vert of the gardens—a picture of the unalloyed enjoyment of "the pure pleasures of the rural life," at variance with the generally received notions of royal state. The Duchess of Orleans, on the occasion of Queen Victoria's visit, appeared in public for the first time since her bereavement; and her presence at the promenade and luncheon was in compliment to our beloved Sovereign. It was her Majesty's attention to the Princess Clementine of Coburg which suggested to King Louis Philippe the idea of inviting her Majesty to visit him. It appears that the Queen's kind and endearing reception of the Comte de Paris, (and the other grandchildren of his Majesty the King of the French) made such an impression on the Duchess of Orleans, that she broke through her resolve to remain secluded for yet some time, and she joined the fête champêtre, the banquet, and other festivities of the court.

Of the young Comte de Paris, a highly finished engraving, from Winterhalter's celebrated portrait, appeared in the 381h number of our journal.

FOURTH DAY—WEDNESDAY.

The state of the weather deterred the royal revellers from making their proposed marine excursion, and a déjeuner aux bois, preceded by a drive in the avenues of the forest, was improvised by the King during breakfast, and willingly accepted by his guests as an agreeable and sufficient substitute for the visit to the yacht.

The royal party chose a road through the extensive woods which Queen Victoria had not yet seen, and from many points of which some delightful prospects, over an enormous range of country, are to be commanded. The cortège left the chateau by the gate of the cour d'honneur shortly after two o'clock, and passed along the road to the village of Madeleine, on its way to an opening in the forest, called St. Catherine. It consisted of the same carriages in which their Majesties and the royal party were conveyed to the forest on Monday. There were also the same led horses, &c. The Dukes d'Aumale and de Montpensier, the Prince de Joinville, and the Prince Augustus of Saxe Coburg, were on horseback; but Prince Albert was in the char-à banc with Louis Philippe, and sat beside monarch on the first seat. On the second seat of this very commodious carriage were the Queens of France and England, and the Queen of the Belgians; and on the other seats the princesses, &c. Lords Aberdeen and Liverpool, and M. Guizot, were all seated together on the first seat of the second carriage; and the other carriages were occupied as at the former fête.

[PRINCE ALBERT AT THE CASERNE MONTPENSIER.

The entire party did not arrive at the spot chosen in the Forest for the déjeûner until near four o'clock. Here the tent or marquee used on the former occasion was erected, and preparations made as before for the amusement of the royal and noble guests. The whole party appeared highly delighted with the scene, and the noble prospects presented to their view. There were but few spectators, for it was more a private party from the chateau bent on their own amusement than an affair of state and ceremonial. The royal party having partaken of the refreshments furnished from the temporary kitchen in the recesses of the forest, took their departure, and reached the chateau at half-past six o'clock; Prince Albert riding the beautiful white horse which he rode at the review the day before.

In the evening, there was performed at the chateau a vaudeville, which passed off without any occurrence requiring notice. The royal party separated at an earlier hour than on any night since the arrival of her Majesty. The fatigue of the excursion to the forest, and the necessity of rising early next day, to sail with the morning's tide, rendered this step expedient.

We should here mention, that about noon, a dozen British naval officers arrived at Eu, from Treport, and were invited to view the chateau and grounds. They were received by the gallant commander of the royal yacht, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, with his lordship's usual good feeling; and a merrier, and perhaps a finer body of young men never entered the precincts of the palace. As his lordship had kindly given permission to visitors to go on board and view the yacht, the officers of that vessel, and of the three other British steamers on the coast, after seeing the chateau (which is a most beautiful bijou) and the grounds, left for Treport. Altogether, this was a day of considerable bustle at Eu. At page 188 are engraved the united steam fleet off Treport; and the flag-ship,'St. Vincent, saluting the fleet.

FIFTH DAY.—THURSDAY.

This was the day of departure; and was, accordingly, clouded with regret. Early in the morning, indeed by daybreak, the drums of the troops assembling were heard, and all persons were hurrying to Treport to witness the embarkation.

By seven o'clock, a squadron of the Carabiniers and a division of a regiment of infantry of the line were formed on the quay of Treport; and a large circle closed to the place of embarkation was kept clear for the arrival of the royal carriages. On the verge of the quay was placed the marquee which had already figured in the forest of Eu at the fêtes champêtres. The marquee was on this occasion open on both sides, and formed merely the place of alighting of their Majesties and suite. The elegant pinnace of the King's brig, the Reine d'Amelie, was alongside of the little yacht, the Reine des Belges; and from the quay a flight of steps, made for the occasion, and covered with a rich Aubusson carpet, led down to the deck of the Reine des Belges, over which the Monarchs were to pass on their way to the pinnace. The pinnace is a very elegant boat, white, with blue and gold bends, with an awning and curtains of crimson silk, rowed by twenty men in the costume of the boatmen of a French admiral. From the flagstaff at her stern floated the standard of England and the tricoloured flag, blended together in friendly union. Close to the point of embarkation were placed the band of the Carabiniers

By half-past seven o'clock, the crowd of persons on both sides the entrance to the basin or inner harbour was very great. At twenty minutes to eight, the Prince de Joinville arrived on her coach to receive the Queen. Admiral Mackau was also in attendance, and superintended the proceedings. At a quarter to eight o'clock the sound of the guns at the chateau announced that the royal party had left Eu; and at five minutes to eight o clock, the cortège came into the town of Treport, and drove at a fast trot to the marquee. Prince Albert and the French Princes were on horseback. The cortège consisted of seven carriages; that in which the King of the French, Queen Victoria, the French Queen and Princess s rode, was drawn by eight horses. Louis Philippe was in regimentals, Queen Victoria in a purple silk dress, silk bonnet, and Paisley shawl. Prince Albert was in plain clothes. It was precisely eight o'clock, when the royal party embarked, amidst a roar of artillery from the batteries at Treport and Mers, which was answered by the guns in the steamers in the roads; the spectators cheering and crying "Vive le Roi de France, vive la Reine d'Angleterre," as the pinnace was rowed out of the harbour. There were on board, King Louis Philippe, the Queens of England, of the French, and of the Belgians; the Duchess of Orleans, as usual, in deep mourning; the Count de Paris, also in mourning; Madame Adelaide, the Princess Clementine, Prince Albert, and the French Princes. Louis Liverpool and Aberdeen, Mr. Anson, Colonel Wylde, M. Guizot, and the great functionaries, military and civil, went off in other pinnaces. The distance rowed by the royal and the other pinnaces was about two miles, before they reached the royal yacht. It was reached in a quarter of an hour, when two royal salutes announced the going on board.

The fleet of steamers in the roads, consisting of the Castor, the Prometheus, the Tartarus, and the Polyphemus, forming the English escort, the Pluton French steamer, and the other steamers and vessels, were all dressed in colours and streamers, and made a very gay appearance.

The whole of the French royal family went on board the royal yacht, together with the officers of state, the staff, and suite. After an interval of about half an hour, the royal party went on deck, whereon had assembled all the high personages and the officers who accompanied the royal barge to sea. The Queen of England approached them, and graciously thanked them for the part they had taken, by their personal zeal in the sumptuous hospitality of the King. The Marquis de Boure, who had performed the functions of chevalier of honour to the Queen, and the Count de Chabannes, who had accompanied Prince Albert, had each received on the preceding days, from her Majesty and his Royal Highness, a noble and magnificent proof of their kind remembrance. The Queen had also thanked, in the most gracious manner, M. Vatout, first librarian of the King, who had got bound splendidly, and laid upon her table, several copies of his "Histoire du Chateau d'Eu." "It is a chateau truly rich in reminiscences, and a very interesting history," said the Queen to him. "Your Majesty," replied M. Vatout, "has just added its finest page." A few moments afterwards, the Queen condescended to send to M. Vatout a magnificent ring in diamonds. Time, however, was advancing. It was important for the Queen to leave the roadstead of Treport early enough to arrive at Brighton before night. The King, seeing the necessity of interrupting this exchange of friendly demonstration of word and feelings, which retarded the departure of her Britannic Majesty, gave the signal for his return, at the same time addressing his adieux to the Queen. The King embraced her cordially, and afterwards shook hands with Prince Albert. The Queen of the French, the Queen of the Belgians, the Duchess of Orleans, and the Princesses, successively embraced Queen Victoria. The Princes bowed to her, and the royal family then retired, accompanied as far as the ladder by Prince Albert, whose emotion was visible. At this moment, a steamer of the squadron, the Courrier de Dieppe, came up to the Queen's yacht, and the King and all his family immediately went on board her, whilst the Victoria and Albert was getting ready to start. A few minutes afterwards, the royal yacht was under full steam. The King followed in her wake for an instant, as if to perform towards her Britannic Majesty a last act of royal courtesy, and the Queen recognised to this by ordering the yacht to be stopped. She then waved her hand in a last adieu to her step-father of France, and resumed her route. The Prince de Joinville remained with the Queen for the purpose of accompanying her as far as Brighton. We quote this very interesting account of "the parting moments" from the Journal des Débats.

The two impressive scenes at page 193—the Queen leaving Treport; and the parting salute, have been engraved from sketches by M. Morel Fatio.

The French royal family, on reaching land, returned to the chateau in the same state and ceremony in which they arrived. They were cheered by the people: they reached the chateau at half-past nine o'clock, apparently cast down by the departure of the illustrious guests.

THE ARRIVAL AT BRIGHTON.

It being generally known that our beloved Queen would return to the shores of her kingdom, at Brighton, the authorities of the town made preparations to receive her Majesty with honour befitting the occasion; and all their efforts were most cordially seconded by the loyal populatoe of the place. It fortunately happened that the weather was most propitious. The morning broke beautifully; there was no wind stirring, and the sky was without a cloud; and the smooth sea reflected the brilliant rays of the sun with a dazzling effect. Though the fine and favourable weather now precluded all doubt that her Majesty would land at Brighton, yet the precaution had been taken of forwarding relays of horses from the royal stables to all the stations between Brighton and Portsmouth, where detachments of the Queen's Own Hussars had been previously sent to serve, in case of need-for an escort. The reason for making these arrangements was because it was anticipated that, in the event of the weather proving unfavourable, her Majestymight possibly land at Portsmouth, and thence proceed by land to Brighton.

As her Majesty had intimated her desire to land at the pier, the directors of the Pier Company, to prevent confusion, excluded the public from the pier until after the landing of the royal party and their arrival at the Palace. The landing-steps and the whole of the pier-head along which her Majesty walked were covered with crimson cloth, and various parts of the pier were decorated with flags. As the morning advanced, the inhabitants of Brighton took their station on the beach, and maintained it, despite the intense heat of the sun to which they were exposed, until their eyes were gratified by the sight of their gracious Queen; and the beach and the Marine Parade were occupied before one o'clock by thousands of human beings. On the pier the guard of honour was composed of the Coast Guard, to the number of about 36, under the command of Lieutenant Watt. The Grenadier Guards, under the command of Colonel Home, took up their position on the esplanade of the pier in front of Penn's Bazaar

Two or three times during the day the expectations of the multitude were raised by the report of guns fired at a distance. At length, at a quarter to three o'clock, a single steamer hove in sight, probably some five miles off, coming in the direction from Treport. It was not long before this steamer was discovered to be the royal yacht; and immediately a royal salute was fired from the pier head, and the splendid band of the Grenadier Guards on the esplanade struck up a martial air. In about half an hour more, the royal yacht was off the pier; but, as the tide did not permit the yacht to come close to the pier, one of the boats was lowered, quickly manned, and pulled towards the landing-place, followed and surrounded by various small boats and pleasure yachts. About half-past three o'clock, the royal barge, in which were seated her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Prince de Joinville, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lady Canning, the Hon. Miss Liddell, &c., reached the pier. A sort of sliding platform had been fitted to the pier steps on the west side, to assist her Majesty in landing; but the contrivance did not appear to please the Queen, and it was removed In the meantime, the exuberant loyalty of the crews in the various pleasure boats induced them to press around the royal barge, and almost to bear it in; which her Majesty observing, and, perhaps, fearing that some accident might occur, signified, by waving her hand, her desire that they should keep at a greater distance; an intimation which, it is needless to say, was as promptly obeyed as possible. The platform having been disengaged from the pier steps, her Majesty then stepped from the barge, and was received by Captain Sir Samuel Brown. The royal standard was immediately hoisted at the pier-head, and the Vernger Trinity yacht, the Tartar revenue cutter, and the Tartarus steamer, were dressed out with various flags, while salutes were fired in different directions. Her Majesty, who, it was gratifying to observe, seemed to be in the enjoyment of the best health and spirits, walked along the pier to the esplanade with Prince Albert on her right hand, and the Prince de Joinville on her left; and then stepped into her carriage, which was in waiting, amidst the most hearty cheers from the assembled thousands. Nor must we omit to mention that the women belonging to the bathing machines manifested their loyal feelings in a most striking manner; for they actually ran into the sea as the Queen was walking to shore, being seemingly desirous to meet their Sovereign halfway;

MAP OF THE WINE DISTRICT OF THE ALTO DOURO.

This map has been most opportunely issued by Mr. Wyld, at a moment when our commercial relations with Portugal are under the consideration of Government; and the publication must be important to all who are interested in the settlement of this momentous question. The execution is clear and satisfactory; in the right hand upper corner of the map is a table of the principal places of the wine districts of the Alto-Douro; and the position of any place will be found to be upon a line drawn from the centre of the indicator to the extremity of the line passing through the number in the indicator corresponding to that on the first column of the above table, opposite the name of the place. Throughout the map are clearly indicated the parishes of the district of the old Wine Company of the Alto-Douro; together with the high roads, oaks, chesnuts, olives, pines, Roman or Moorish remains, terraces of the vineyards, chapels, stone bridges, fields, farms or quintas, waste lands, parish churches, by-roads, &c.

Appended are a few interesting "Observations," from which we gather that the extreme length of the wine district is eight leagues, and its extreme breadth three leagues, the whole being very unwholesome and thinly populated. The soil about the vines is tarned, and the grapes are trodden entirely by gallegos, of whom about 8000 are employed at each season; but they remain only during the period of their labour. The grapes are cut by women and children from the ancient country: great numbers find employment during the vintage; the only work done by the resident farmer being the pruning of the vines. The vintage generally begins about the end of September, and concludes about the 20th of October. During July, and August, and September, the river is rarely navigable, owing to the drought; and in December, January, and February, the navigation is rendered difficult by the freshets when usually take place at that season. The map is dedicated to E. J. Johnston, her Majesty's consul at Oporto, by Joseph J. Forrester. The size is 36 by 16 inches.

CHURCH UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD.—A writer in the Standard states that W. Lockhart, Esq., B.A., of Exeter College, has become a convert to Popery, after residing as an inmate at the house of the Rev. Mr. Newman. It is stated on the same authority that a number of similar conversions have taken place during the last few months.

His Grace the Duke of Sutherland has appointed the Rev. William Barrough Canon, M.A., of Magdalene Hall, Oxford, rector of Monkton Farleigh, Wilts, to the vicarage of Berry Pomeroy, Devon, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. E. Browne.

The Rev. William Lindley, M.A., curate of Guiseley, near Leeds, has been licensed to the perpetual curacies of Tarnk and Sandhutton, in the county of York; patron, the archbishop.

NEW COLLEGE NEAR OXFORD.—It is intended to establish at Littlemore, near Oxford, a college, in which young men holding the high and distinctive principles of the Church of England may be trained for missionary labour. The Right Rev. Dr. Coleridge, formerly Bishop of Barbadoes, will be principal of the institution.

Circumstances have compelled the Lord Bishop of Llandaff to postpone the ordination intended to be holden on September 24, until the following Sunday, October 1.

The Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol consecrated a new church at Ashley-road, on Tuesday, and another near the cotton works, St. Philip's, on Wednesday morning. During the next week his lordship will be occupied in a course of confirmations, and on the 29th instant will hold a general ordination in the Cathedral Church of his diocese.

The Rev. J. Topham, M.A., rector of St. Andrew's and St. Mary's, Droitwich, has been instituted to the rectory of St. Nicholas, in that borough,—patron, the Crown.

THE CHURCHWARDENS OF WARE.—The churchwardens of Ware, finding that the Bishop of London refused to aid them in their quarrel with the vicar, on account of his strict adherence to the rubrical directions of the Book of Common Prayer, determined on appealing to his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury. The archbishop has replied, and has declined interference. The parishioners have therefore resolved on holding a meeting, when measures will be adopted for the presentation of a memorial to her Majesty the Queen.

IRELAND.

THE IRISH ARMS ACT.—At the Head Police-office, on Saturday, a young gentleman, highly connected, was charged with having in his possession an unregistered arms. It appeared that the policeman on duty, in a printer's shop, in Christchurch-place, to speak about the printing of a pamphlet, and showed the snapman a "walking-stick gun," and said he would leave it with him to be called back for it. Once out of the shop prosecuted at once (as soon as he saw the weapon) to the head office of police, and gave notice of it, and could tell the gun to the magistrates, who immediately gave directions to have the case brought before them as soon as the guild could meet. He was accordingly brought before Sir N. Fitzsimon and Mr. Magee, who held him to bail for having unregistered arms in his possession. The gentleman is the son of a highly respected gentleman in this county.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—At the usual weekly meeting of this body held on Monday last, the week's rent was announced to be only £32.

A report meeting took place at Ballinasloe, a town in the county of Galway, about 80 miles from Dublin, on Sunday last, at which Mr O'Connell attended. The chair was taken by Mr Bodkin, M.P. The meeting was numerously attended; but a heavy and protracted shower of rain coming on, the proceedings were curtailed, and the multitude soon dispersed. From all appearances the repeal agitation is decidedly on the wane.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Fane.)

IN RE GODWIN AND LEE.

The bankrupts were shipowners in Hill upgate street, and this day came up to pass their final examination. The debts are upwards of £40,000, and the realisable assets between £8000 and £9,000, principally consisting of shares in ships, which were the property of the bankrupts. A Mr. Brown proved to prove for £292, upon a bill given by the bankrupts for the purchase of a share of a ship. The claimant complained that this bill had been given by the bankrupts when they must have known themselves to be in a state of insolvency. The bankrupts denied the accuracy of this statement, and after a few observations from the learned Commissioner, the bankrupts having sworn to the truth of their balance-sheets, and answered the usual interrogatories, were declared to have passed their final examination.

IN RE OLLIVER, YORK, HARRISSON, AND CO.

The previous proceedings in this case have been fully reported by us as they occurred from time to time. In the Stratford Bank the balance sheet shows assets to the amount of £20,000 had been a ready dividend (6s 8d in the pound), and a further dividend of 3s 4d in the pound is expected.—Messrs. Oliver and Harrisson, of the iron-works, passed their final examination today, Mr. York being unable to attend from illness.

MIDDLESEX QUARTER SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. Serjeant Adams.)

MAGISTERIAL PUNCTUALITY.—The chairman took his seat on the bench exactly at ten o'clock, but another magistrate being necessary legally to constitute a court, business could not be proceeded with. After the lapse of half an hour, the names of the jurymen summoned were called, and those who did not answer to their names were ordered to be fined. The chairman apologised to the bar for the delay. Mr. Payne (they knew that he (the chairman) was not to blame. He should have thought that some of the new appointments would have been in attendance, as new brooms commonly swept clean. After another interval, it was a surprise to all that the chairman should proceed with the business of the day, by consent of parties, which was agreed to. After the diligence had been used by the officials, a magistrate who was fined at home was forthcoming, and the court was regularly constituted. Another justice dropped into court in the course of the day.

Dennis Coakley, Thomas Hagee and James Harrigan, were indicted for riot, and assaulting Mr. Gould near the workhouse, and upon a second count stood charged with assaulting the police in the execution of their duty.—Mr Wylde conducted the case for the prosecution. Mr. Payne appeared for the defence.—It appeared that the riot took place at the Roman Catholic burial-ground in the Commercial-road, on the occasion of Father Mathew preaching his farewell sermon, and that it had arisen in consequence of the procession, who is a jolly-looking personage, being mistaken for a publican.—The jury returned a verdict against Hayes for an assault only. The other two prisoners were acquitted of the charges of riot and assault against the prosecutor.—Hayes was sentenced to imprisonment for six weeks in the House of Correction.

SURREY SESSIONS.

(Before Mr. T. Puckle and a full Bench of Magistrates.)

On Tuesday James Brake, a confidential clerk to Messrs. Everest and Wantrooper, solicitors and clerks to the bench of magistrates at Epsom, was indicted for feloniously embezzling the sum of £27 and upwards, received by him in his capacity of clerk. The prisoner, against whom there were three indictments, is a young man of respectable appearance and connections.—Mr. Locke appeared for the prosecution, and the prisoner's defence was conducted by Mr. Charnock. Having been convicted on the first indictment, the prisoner, on the recommendation of Mr. Charnock, pleaded guilty to the second, and the other was not proceeded with.—The Court then asked Mr Everest whether he had obtained a character of the prisoner?—Mr. Everest said he had, but the character, unfortunately, turned out to be a fictitious one. Moreover, the prisoner had introduced another clerk to the office, to whom they had also been seriously robbed. The prisoner had also given a fictitious character to a clerk who obtained a situation in a solicitor's office of extensive practice, but who had been prosecuted for robbery and received a sentence of transportation. The prisoner belonged to a set who gave each other false characters, and so skilfully did they make their arrangements that detection was almost impossible. By some artful means and cunning contrivance they obtained a character of the prisoner, and in every instance they had commenced a system of wholesale plunder against their employers.—The Chairman called the prisoner up for judgment, and observing that the sentence was about to pass upon him one not severe enough, and pointing out the enormity of his offence, sentenced him to seven years' transportation.

POLICE.

CLERKENWELL.—STABBING.—ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.—Winifred Cummins, aged 24, and Blanchick Belgie, aged 25, were charged with stabbing James Furze, and attempting to murder Stephen Leach. Leach stated that about [illegible] minutes after 12 o'clock on Monday, he and his companion Furze went to the [illegible]'s shop to purchase some three cocks from the house of the provision merchant, in which they wanted to have some dinner. The prisoners were then at the [illegible]. Witness and his companion called for some [illegible] and meat. Whilst witness was eating the meat, Cummins said, "Give me three times." "Give me some;" to which he made no answer. Cummins, without receiving any provocation whatever, took up a knife from the table, and made a plunge with it at his mate; and if he had not stopped her by the wrist, he felt confident the thrust would have been fatal, as the knife was sharp and pointed, and she used all her strength on the occasion. After a struggle, he succeeded in wresting the knife from her hands. The other prisoner (Belgie), whilst he was struggling with Cummins, also seized a knife and was making at him, but his mate Furze, who had been out for a few moments, returned just in time to prevent him. Furze, however, flourished the knife about, cutting at Furze several times, and it was not until after he had succeeded in inflicting a severe wound on the latter above the wrist, that they succeeded in disarming her. Some constables being called in they were given into custody. Both prisoners were the worse for liquor.—Mr Broughton remanded the prisoners for the pro forma evidence of the surgeon. Shortly after the prisoners were brought up, Serjeant Scudder, G 2, informed the magistrate that the prisoner Belgie had almost succeeded in strangling herself in the cell, by tying her apron in a running noose round her throat. Mr. Broughton directed the gaoler to pace a constable in the cell, to prevent her from laying violent hands upon herself.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—Tuesday having been appointed for the further examination of Thomas Jenkins, alias Dunaway, a well-known member of the swell mob, upon a charge of being concerned, in the plate robbery at the late Lord Fitzgerald and Vesey's residence, in Belgrave-square, on the 18th of May last, the court was crowded by persons desirous to hear the evidence in this extraordinary case. Several persons having been examined, the presiding magistrate adjourned the case, for the produce on of further evidence, unavoidably absent. Inspector Pearce informed the bench that he was prepared with several other cases of felony against the prisoner; but, the evidence not being complete, these were also ordered to stand over.

LAMBETH-STREET.—Michael Connery, an expert thief, was brought before Mr. Henry for final examination, and was fully committed to take his trial on the following charge:—Miss Emma Symonds, who lives with her father, a veterinary surgeon, residing in East Smithfield, stated, that on Saturday last, between the hours of two and three o'clock, while proceeding upstairs, she observed some person in her brother's bed-room on the second floor. Thinking it was the errand boy, and that it was strange he should be there at that hour, she went to see what it was she was doing. She could not at first see any one, but on looking under the bed, saw some person there, and on asking what he wanted, the prisoner crept out at the foot of the bed, and replied, as his face was down, that he was very sorry, and he had called in to get a blister applied to them. (Laughter, in which the prisoner joined.) He then instant y hastened down stairs, and witness followed, and finding her mother in the dining-room, told him what she had witnessed, and sent him in pursuit of the prisoner. On subsequently examining the room in which she had found the prisoner, she discovered that various articles of wearing apparel and bed-clothes had been thrown down stairs, and a gentleman, an intimate acquaintance, pass by the house, having observed a light flitting from room to room, properly surmised that there were thieves there, and immediately proceeded to the front door, when the prisoner endeavoured to escape at the back. After a long chase he ran at length into the arms of a policeman. On examining into the cause of the house were found to have been ransacked, and a pure set of skeleton keys and "jemmies" were found on the premises. The prisoner, during his chase, was observed to throw something into an area, which turned out to be a quantity of jewellery belonging to Mrs. Watts. The prisoner's defence was, that he heard the cry of "stop thief!" and commenced running, like others, until he was stopped and taken for the thief. He stated, that after he was taken into custody, the whole subject of Mr. Hadoway having distinctly identified the prisoner, the magistrate said he should commit him for trial, but that he should be brought up again on Monday next.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FIRE AT WALWORTH.—Shortly before twelve o'clock on Saturday night a destructive fire broke out in the premises belonging to Messrs. Cleaverley, floor cloth manufacturers, in Grove-street, Walworth Common; the result was, the almost total destruction of the premises.

FIRE AT BRENTFORD.—On Tuesday morning, at 11 the before one o'clock, a destructive fire broke out on the premises of Mr. Cropper, hatter, Brentford. It was happily soon extinguished.

FIRE IN PATERNOSTER-ROW.—On Tuesday morning a fire broke out on the lower part of the extensive premises now nearly rebuilt belonging to the Religious Tract Society, but having been discovered by the policeman on duty, the alarm of fire engines were speedily procured, and fortunately no great damage was incurred.

COACH ACCIDENT.—An alarming accident took place at Bagshot last week, when the coach belonging to the Swan inn, after coach hemg it without any person at the head, started off at full speed. Mr. John Turner, who was a passenger inside, contrived to scramble on the roof and from thence to the footboard, from which he contrived to get hold of one of the reins, and so directed the furious steeds so that he at length succeeded, after various hair-breadth escapes, in running them into a ditch, with no man damage. A young lady named Attride, who jumped out of the coach, was dreadfully injured, and is not expected to recover.

EXTENSIVE ROBBERY.—On Tuesday information was received at Bow-street, and was forwarded from thence to the various metropolitan [illegible] the house that on the night of Monday the 11th instant, the premises of Messrs. Trumble and Co., pawnbrokers and silversmi hs, in Gaudy-street, in the city of Exeter, was burglariously broken open and robbed of no less than 83 hunting lever, gentlemen's and double-cased silver watches, a gold watch with a consul gold p ate; a large number of table, dessert, tea, and salt spoons, and cream ladles, of the finest and shel pattern; a gold watch chain with long links and a variety of other articles of value. A reward of £20 has been offered for the detection of the thieves.

A SERIOUS EXPLOSION OF GAS.—Between six and seven o'clock on Wednesday evening an alarming explosion took place in the shop of Mrs. Boulton, dress maker, 26, Yardley street, Clerkenwell. The fire was soon extinguished, but not until a considerable portion of the shop stock had been destroyed.

FATAL SCAFFOLD ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday afternoon, an Irish labourer, named Dennis Sullivan, fell from a scaffold which is erected outside a house opposite the Shot pulpit house, Holborn, for the purpose of repairing that house. The unfortunate man pitched headforemost on the curb beneath, and the concussion was so violent as to scatter his brains in every direction. The unfortunate man was taken up in a senseless state and conveyed to St. Margaret's workhouse, to await an inquest upon his remains. The deceased has left a widow and five young children. An inquest was held in the evening at the Feathers, Dean-street, and a verdict of "Accidental death" was returned.

ACCIDENT TO LORD GRANTLEY.—Between three and four o'clock in the afternoon of Friday last, Lord Grantley, on returning to his residence in Harley-street, in a cabriolet with his groom, the horse shyed at some scaffolding erected in Cavendish-square, and, plunging furiously, dragged the cab against a lamp post at the corner of Wigmore-street. His lordship was thrown out; and his head coming against the pavement, he was stunned for the moment. The groom was also thrown out, and was greatly cut and bruised. Lord Grantley received one severe wound in the inner arm, three and legs, but the skull was not fractured. Medical assistance was soon after obtained, and the noble lord is going on favourably.

THE MARKETS.

Notwithstanding we have to report the arrival of a very moderate supply of English wheat up to Mark-lane this week, the demand for that article was ruled extremely inactive. However, as the few parcels have come to hand in middling condition, the finest old qualities have mostly sold on full as good terms as of late; but the out of condition sorts have suffered an abatement of from 1s to 2s per quarter. In free foreign wheat a steady business has been transacted, and prices have ruled about stationary. Barley and malt have met a slow sale, but no concessions rather cheaper. The oat trade was ruin to sterling. But but we have no improvement to note in the value of beans, peas, and flour have [illegible]

Flour, American 22s to 24s; Baltic, 23s per barrel.

The Seed Market.—For linseed and rapeseed we have had a fair demand; but canary has declined 2s to 4s per qrt. In other kinds of seeds scarcely anything is doing.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing 56s to 60s, Baltic, crushing, 42s to 44s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 40s to 42s; Hempseed, 35s to 36s per quarter, coarse, 16s to 18s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 11s; white ditto, 10s to 12s 6d per bush.; 9s to 9s 6d per bushel; Rapeseed, new, 46s to 47s per last of ten quarters Linseed cakes, English, 6l0 to 6l10 6s; ditto foreign £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed [illegible] per cwt.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 52s 0d; barley, 31s 11d; oats, 19s 7d; rye, 31s 3d; beans, 34s 9d; peas, 34s 6d.

Imperial Average of Six Weeks ended 25th August. Wheat, 57s 7d; barley, 32s 8d; oats, 20s 10d; rye, 34s 6d; beans, 35s 0d; peas, 35s 6d.

Prices on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 40s; barley, 0s; oats, 0s; rye, 0s 0d; beans, 0s 0d; peas, 0s 0d.

Tea.—There has been a fair demand for most kinds of tea this week, and full prices have been quoted. Common congou, 1s 1d to 1s 2d per lb.

Sugar.—For raw sugar we have had a steady inquiry, and full prices have been readily paid. Refined goods are heavy.

Coffee.—Privately, a fair business is doing, at extreme rates.

Rice.—The market is dull for Bengal, at from 11s 6d to 14s 6d for good to middling white. Rum.—Sales of proof Leewards have sold on terms near the following: Good Leewards are quoted at 1s 8d.

Oils.—The market is improving, and, in some instances, the currencies are improving.

Hops.—Owing to the favourable accounts from the plantations, the demand is very heavy, and prices from 2s to 3s per cwt. lower. A few packets of new hops have been delivered at Sussex at £2 to £2 10s per cwt. The accounts relate to 1842.

Provisions. Prices of Irish butter have again decayed, the finest parcels not producing more than 84s to 86s per cwt. Butter in Leith has declined 2s per cwt. Bacon goes off freely, at 52s to 54s for heavy to prime. Lard is dull of sale. Hams have been taken ready, and prices are higher.

Metals.—Very large quantities of Irish iron have been disposed of, at improved rates.

Cotton.—Several public sales being declared, the market for cotton is heavy, but at full prices.

Coals.—Chamber Main, 14s 6d; New Tanfield, 14s; Hilda, 15s; Lambton, 18s 6d; Harraton, 18s 6d; Adelaide, 17s 6d per ton. Ships coming, 24.

Hops.—Owing to the favourable accounts received from the plantations, the demand is very heavy, and prices from 2s to 3s per cwt. lower. A few packets of new hops have been delivered at Sussex at £2 to £2 10s per cwt. The accounts relate to 1842.

Wool.—In the absence of public sales, there is a steady business doing in both English and foreign wools.

Potatoes. At Bruges the supply of potatoes is large, the demand continues steady, at from 3s 6d to 4s 0d per cwt.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The demand for money has [illegible] during the past week in the London money market, [illegible] in all the departments of trade. The manufacturing districts also complain of want of employment at present date. On the continent, we may truly say that prosperity prevails in all of them. For raw cotton and sheep's wool [illegible] Germany, and the [illegible] Belgium, France, and Germany, are in a state of [illegible] to consume to the extent of their means. Large quantities of cotton goods are annually exported to Asia, and also to the United States of America, chiefly by the way of Canada, to save duties. To [illegible] there is a very [illegible] demand, [illegible] Asia, the foreign and home demand is rapidly on the increase, and in value the exports [illegible] £40,000 per week. THE QUEEN LEAVING TREPORT. DRAWN BY M. MOREL FATIO.

while they welcomed her home with boisterous huzzas. The appearance of the shore at this time was truly impressive and picturesque. On reaching the esplanade, the band of the Grenadier Guards struck up "God save the Queen," and the royal party, amidst the cheers of the people, then drove towards the palace, which they reached at a quarter to four o'clock. The very effective engraving of the landing at Brighton Pier is from a sketch by Mr Nibbs, the Marine artist, of Brighton.

The royal yacht, it appears, left Treport at ten minutes past nine o'clock in the morning, and, according to the time kept on board, arrived off Brighton at twenty minutes past three o'clock, having done seventy-three miles of sea-way in little more than six hours. This is a pretty good proof of her powers of speed, at least in calm weather; and it appears that she out-steamed the other vessels of her escort, as she arrived at Brighton alone and the first. Subsequently, the French steamers Pluton, Archimède, and Napoleon, and the English steamers the Fearless, Cyclops, Prometheus, and Ariel, as well as the St. Vincent and the other vessels of the fleet appeared, and being dressed out, the roadstead of Brighton presented an appearance of gaiety, such, perhaps, as it has never before exhibited.

EU.—FRIDAY.

The last public display consequent upon the visit of her Majesty took place this day in front of the chateau—namely, a review of the Carabiniers and 1st Light Infantry, before their departure for the quarters they occupied previously to the royal visit; and the distribution of decorations of the Legion of Honour to the officers and soldiers who had most distinguished themselves since the arrival of her Majesty. The troops were reviewed by the King, habited in the costume of a marshal of France, and mounted on his superb white charger. This spectacle, as well as the distribution of the decorations, was a very beautiful and impressive ceremony. Having thus narrated the most striking scenes in the visit of our beloved Queen to the royal family (and not to France as her Majesty herself said), we conclude with an official record of the compliments paid by the Sovereigns of England and France to the suite of each respectively. Her Majesty Queen Victoria has caused to be presented to General the Baron Athalin a very magnificent snuff-box, set in diamonds; to the Marquis de Rosre, a similar cadeau. Her Majesty has left for the attendants of the chateau at Eu £1000 (25,000 francs), besides 1000 francs each to every person connected with her Majesty's personal service. Her Majesty's bounty was not, however, confined to largesses in the royal household, for the curé of one of the churches of the town received a £50 Bank of England note from our gracious Sovereign, through the prefect of the department, in aid of the funds of an orphan school established in the neighbourhood.

[The rings set in diamonds, and presented by her Majesty and Prince Albert to the Count de Chabannes and M Vatout, have been mentioned.]

Finally, the King of the French, on his part, presented to her Majesty two of the finest specimens of the Gobelin tapestry extant, and a matchless casket of Sèvres porcelain.

His Majesty has conferred upon his Royal Highness Prince Albert the Grand Cordon of the Legion of Honour.

Here terminates the account of her Majesty's visit to France, an event that bids fair to produce most important and beneficial results, not merely to Great Britain and France, but perhaps to the whole world.

THE PARTING SALUTE. DRAWN BY M. MOREL FATIO.

It is stated in Galignani's Messenger, that Louis Philippe "intends founding what is to be called the Victoria Gallery. In it will be placed a series of pictures connected with the proceedings of the Queen of England's visit. It is at present intended that the number shall be about 30, of which six will be of a large size, 9 feet by 6, and 14 of smaller dimensions, the remaining 10 being portraits. A special building is to be erected at the Chateau d'Eu for this collection in the course of the ensuing spring."

HARVEST HOME.

The close of the "London Season" brings with it an almost total cessation of public business. The pulse of the "mighty heart" of the empire, though it cease not to vibrate, beats more faintly than it was wont to do. Though the "wheel at the cistern" go its accustomed round, there is less note taken of its revolutions. The places of mart and traffic exhibit their usual activity, but the resorts of opulence and rank and fashion present a visible diminution of their frequenters. The scenes of legal and political contention are deserted by the actors in both. The courts of law are silent, and no noise awakens the echoes of the Houses of Legislature; and, to those whose views are limited to the contests of party, the conflict of interest with interest, or of man with man, there is a difficulty in finding subjects of observation and remark. But not so with those who look beyond laws and institutions, on the great mass of society, the great family of man, for whom both were made. They continue unaltered, while the others are liable to continual change. The living stream rolls by for ever, though the wheel it turns must stand still at the convenience or necessity of him it serves. And in what affects all there is an abundant and never-failing source of interest when a temporary respite is given by circumstances to the public labours of the exalted few. True, that the repose of the world of politics confines the politician to reflections on the past or speculations as to the future. But, happily, we are not all politicians; and even those who are may with advantage turn occasionally from the arid soil and the flinty path to wander with interest more pure, if not so exciting, among far different scenes. At the moment we write, the Harvest Home has been sounded over the greater part of the broad fields of England; the "kindly fruits of the earth" have been gathered in; the sun, and the dew, and the showers have seconded the industry and skill of man; the hopes and fears of the seed-time and the spring, and the prospects of the teeming summer, have been converted into certainty, and let the fulfilment be hailed with grateful thanks to the "God of harvests," that the assurance it brings is one of plenteousness and abundance. The most important crisis of the year is passed, and we may look forward to the seventies of the winter with apprehensions diminished in degree, if not entirely removed. The accounts from all parts of the kingdom agree in describing the harvest as a successful one. By contemplating the direful consequences of the reverse can we alone estimate the magnitude of the blessing. There may be some cold speculators who regard plenty and dearth as mere circumstances to be turned to their profit, or managed for the avoidance of loss, and whose thoughts of the "fruitful field" are linked only with estimates of prices and duties; but these are the ideas of individuals, not of the mass; they are created by custom, and not spontaneous or natural; the general feeling created by the intelligence of a "good harvest" is one of gratitude and thankfulness, for men feel more than they calculate, whatever the Utilitarians may say to the contrary.

"Harvest home!" What pleasing associations are called forth by the very words! They are so thoroughly English, and withal so eloquent, that the ear is never tired of hearing, nor the tongue of repeating, them; they appeal to the best of human feelings, and they seem to us rich in a music and poetry of their own, which, if the reader do not feel, we shall probably not be able to make him comprehend. They suggest grateful reflections of abundance, comfort, and security; labour hath got its guerdon, and toil its reward. Anxiety is stilled and hope is crowned, and the promise of Him "whose word passeth not away" has received another fulfilment, as another confirmation of the divine assurance that, while the world endures "summer and winter, seed time and harvest shall not fail." The more material images connected with it are also of the most pleasing kind. We know too well that the rural life of England is not Arcadian, either in innocence or ease—that there is want and suffering and hardship far beyond the reach of "the harsh sounds of the Factory Bill." But if ever the condition of the labourer be alleviated, and his heavy burden lightened, it is during the harvest, and yet more at the "Harvest Home." True, it brings additional toil, but it is not of that that he complains: his greatest sufferings spring from his enforced idleness. Rural life has been shorn of most of the customs that gave some periods of it a sort of festive character, that mingled something of rejoicing with the toil, and seemed to tell the labourer that the "sweat of his brow" was not all bitterness: they had, too, this better effect, that they removed from the life of poverty the sting of degradation, so often made, so keenly perceptible. But the change that has passed over the face of things has affected the harvest home less, probably, than any other rural celebration. The vintages of France and Italy, and the harvests of England, are still gathered in with something of the old feeling of congratulation and rejoicing that mingles the voice of song and gladness with the toil, even though those who fill the barn, and pile the stack, and work at the wine-press have for their own portion but little of the produce of either. The greater merit is theirs, for it proves that their emotion is disinterested.

The harvest home has been often celebrated by the poets among whom we cannot linger, though we remember Bloomfield and the "Farmer's Boy," and the sleeping soldier of Campbell, who, by the "wolf-scaring faggot" still in his dreams, "heard the sweet strain that the corn-reapers sung," and the yet more pathetic picture of Keats, when speaking of thoughts, such as, he says,

> "found their way
> To the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
> She stood in tears amid the alien corn."

Still less may we dwell on the lessons of wisdom which have been drawn from the fields of harvest; we need not recal to the reader the parable of the sower, nor of the tares cast among the wheat, nor of the incident of the plucking the ears of corn which gave occasion for the rebuke to the Pharisee, nor of the sublime illustration of man's immortal being drawn by St. Paul from the grain "sowed in corruption."

Every association connected with the harvest home is pleasing; it is even a refreshment to turn from the common topics of the day—the intrigues and plots of foreign politics—to even a passing consideration of such a subject. Its interest is universal, for "the profit of the earth is for all;" the King himself is served by the field." The gladness which its assurance of abundance brings is unalloyed, except by the fear that there will still be too many who will have to endure the pangs of want. Let there be thankfulness, then, for the propitious season, and for whatever evils may afflict us during the ensuing winter, consoling ourselves with the thought that they would have been terribly aggravated but for the blessings of the harvest home.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SPAIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—PARIS, Sept. 19.—The insurrection in Catalonia is fast spreading, and, although few pronunciamientos have been publicly made, it is well known that the majority of the people are in favour of a central junta. I mentioned in my last that the authorities of Girona had declared in favour of the insurgents. On the 17th the following document was published in Barcelona:—

"This morning, at nine o'clock, the city of Girona declared that it would support the pronunciamiento of heroic Barcelona in favour of a central junta and the liberties of the nation. A central junta has been named: it will occupy itself in consolidating the rising of the people. Everywhere the greatest enthusiasm reigns. We are sure of success. Liberty—Isabella the Second—Constitution—Central junta—and hatred to tyrants;—this is our device."

This proclamation is dated "Girona, Sept. 7, 1843," and is signed "Ramon do Cabrera, President." A letter from Figueras, dated the 11th, says, "This province is ready to organise troops and fly to the assistance of the patriots of Barcelona. The lampoordan only waits for arms—refused by the Government—but the people are now determined on getting them. In Barcelona both parties seem prepared for a desperate struggle, but nothing of importance has occurred since my last. The central junta has named Ameliar captain-general of Catalonia. In his address to the army and people the general denounced Christina, Narvaez, and Concha as traitors to their country, and as such worthy of death. On the 10th a patriotic banquet was given in Barcelona to General Martel and his aide-de-camp Febres. After dinner Martel harangued the people from the balcony. He thus concluded:—"People of Barcelona! union is impossible with the enemies of liberty; they wish to tyrannise over us. Let all honest men join in the bond, and our liberties are secured. Long live the central junta! National independence!—the constitution!—reign of Isabella the Second!—and the sovereignty of the people!" The latter part of the speech was most enthusiastically applauded.

The insurgents have got themselves into a little trouble with the French Government. On the 13th they fired on a boat belonging to the French man-of-war Méléagre, coming on shore for water, and severely wounded one of the men. The French consul immediately demanded satisfaction; he also demanded satisfaction, which was immediately given, for an article which appeared in the Constitutionnel of the 10th, in which the French were accused of an attempt to set fire to Barcelona. The French consul, some what alarmed, has invited all the Frenchmen in Barcelona, who were not at the head of mercantile establishments, to embark on board men-of-war. The French Government have a strong force before Barcelona; independent of the Méléagre, there are four frigates and the steam-boat L'Asmodée. The commissioners sent to Madrid have returned to Barcelona, and on the 14th joined the insurgents.

Madrid is in state of great excitment; secret societies hold nightly meetings, and the existence of the Government is seriously compromised; in Mr. Isturiz themselves are strongly divided in opinion—Means Ayllon and Caballero are opposed to the Christinos, whilst Serrano is only a tool in the hands of Narvaez. Many of the leading men are in favour of a marriage between the Queen and the eldest son of the Infant Don Francisco de Paulo; but the violent conduct and extreme ambition of his wife, "La Carlota," as she is generally called, frighten all her partisans, and greatly diminish the chances of success.

On the evening of the 9th, the Government having received information that a society of Freemasons assembled nightly at No. 3, Rue de las Conchas, sent several of the police, and arrested a great many persons, amongst others a lieutenant-colonel and the C. Magnan. Narvaez declares that Freemasonry is only a cloak for conspiracy. What greatly alarmed the Government was, that during the night the streets, and even some of the public offices, were plastered with large bills, some of which were printed, "Long live Espartero." The agents of Narvaez are actively engaged in spreading the most wild reports; amongst others, they assure the people that a division of great merit for Madrid on the 11th to demand an armed intervention from Louis Philippe, that a congress was about to be held in Paris, and the Lonesties and Christinos protected, that large sums of money were sent to Valencia and Catalonia; in short, no report, however exaggerated, is spared to keep the National Guards from rising. The Government have acted very impolitically in naming Urbiztondo Commandant-General. Urbiztondo is a man devoid of all military talent: he has neither strength of mind nor firmness of character; besides, the inhabitants of the Basque provinces consider him a traitor to Don Carlos—a man prepared to sell them at times when they have the misfortune to employ him. The last accounts from Madrid are to the 14th. The Government had published a manifesto respecting the insurrection in Catalonia; in it they give their reasons for not having declared martial law, and call on all good Spaniards to support them until the Cortes shall have decided on all questions in the general interest of the country.

"Perpignan, Sept. 17.

"Upon the 14th the Junta had replied to the demand of the French Consul with respect to the sailor belonging to the Méléagre who had been wounded whilst going for fresh water, that the sentinel at the Port-du-Mer had been forbidden to fire upon every unarmed individual."

"Bayonne, Sept. 18.

"The elections began at Madrid on the 16th. The Opposition had arrived seven of the bureaux out of twelve, but the total of the suffrages on the first day were in favour of the Parliamentary party. Madrid was tranquil on the 16th. According to the latest intelligence received, the other provinces were tranquil, with the exception of Catalonia."

Mr. Aston, the British Ambassador, left Madrid on the 10th, and Bayonne on the 12th, for Paris. In all probability by this date Mr. Aston has safely arrived in England.

On the 8th of September died at Madrid, the Marquis de Heredia, Count d'Ofalia. This nobleman is well known in the diplomatic circle, and was many years ambassador to the court of the Tuileries. I may as well here mention the death of the celebrated Count de Toreno, which melancholy event took place at Paris on Sunday last. The count was considered the best Spanish financier, and was one of the chiefs of the Christino party.

ITALY.—The accounts from Rome are satisfactory. Knowing the interest this part of Europe excites in England, I cannot do better than give you extracts from letters describing the real state of affairs. A letter from Palermo of the 31st of August says, "Within the last few days our police is very active, and the greatest severity is used as regards passports. Every person leaving for Naples is not only obliged to give an object of business, but find securities for his good behaviour." "Rome, Sept. 5.—The Government are daily sending troops to the northern provinces, where the insurgents are daily increasing in numbers." "Fo, Sept. 6.—It is generally believed here that the Government intends calling in a foreign intervention. The insurgents are in strong force, and have formed themselves into guerilla parties. They are well armed, particularly in the Apennines to the side of Pistoya, and de Negro del Foretta." "Leghorn, Sept. 8.—Letters from Bologna, of the 5th, state that the insurgents have again appeared at Calderano, Savigno, and Vargato. The Papal Government greatly alarmed, is marching troops in all directions; as the Fo has no bridge, the village and towns through which they pass are obliged not only to feed them, but to pay them." The latest accounts give as certain that the insurrection was getting ground, and that the roads were infested with armed bands. A letter from Florence, dated the 8th, states "that the Count de Spaur, Bavarian minister at Rome, had arrived at the court of Tuscany, with the intention to demand of the Grand Duke the hand of the Princess Augusta for Prince Leopold of Bavaria, born the 12th of March, 1821. The Princess Augusta, born the 1st of April, 1825, is the daughter, by his first marriage, of the Grand Duke Leopold II. The marriage will soon take place."

PRUSSIA.—It is generally reported in Berlin that the King had sent a pressing invitation to Queen Victoria and Prince Albert to pay him a visit during the continental season.

FRANCE.—The police has discovered a species of conspiracy for upsetting the Government. The conspirators are of the lowest class—have been arrested —and there I will let the matter rest, for it is not worth while now noticing. The King and all the royal family—with the exception of the Duke and Duchess de Nemours, on a visit to Lyons—are at St. Cloud. I am informed by a person of the chateau, that almost every day since the return from Eu, the subject of conversation has been, expatiating on the amiable qualities of our beloved Queen. Louis Philippe, particularly, seems to have forgotten his age; and speaks in the raptures of youth. The visit of the Queen will long be remembered, not only by the royal family, but by the whole of France.

The Grand Duchess Michael of Russia has quitted Baden with the young Princesses for Berlin; she passed through Francfort on the 2nd. The Grand Duchess Anne of Russia, travelling as Countess de Romn, passed through Strasbourg on the 15th.

General Bertrand, the friend and faithful follower of Napoleon, has made a present to his native town, Chateauroux, of the sword worn by Napoleon in Egypt; the grand and undress decorations of the Legion of Honour, worn also by Napoleon; his cross of the Iron Crown; the dressing-case used by him whilst in campaign; part of the books forming his library at St. Helena; and a full-length portrait of Napoleon. The whole of these precious articles have been placed in the Hotel de Ville.

Our fortifications are proceeding with great activity; eight of the forts are nearly finished, namely, Mont Valérien, to the east of St. Denis; Noisy-le Sec, Rosny, Nogent-sur-Marne, Vincennes, Alfort, Ivoy, and Issy; six are already advanced, namely, Fort de la Briche, Saint Denis, Romainville, Bicêtre, Montrouge, and Vanves. Aubervilliers was commenced this spring. Meudon, Virofray, Asnieres, and Point Saint Maur are traced out. All these forts, as well as the great wall, will be commanded by the citadel Mont Valerien, intended to be armed the same as Vincennes.

The Chantilly races commence the 7th and 8th October; they are expected to be well attended.

The tourists have experienced a great loss. The man who since his infancy had not ceased to be attached to the Chateau de Ferney, the gardener, who had been in the service of Voltaire, and preserved of the illustrious writer many relics, which he only gave to enthusiastic travellers—Mathieu Balladoure is no more—he died on the 1st of September: he was born in a small corner of the domain of Geneva.

The 5th Scientific Italian Congress was opened on the 15th, at Lucques, under the presidency of the Marquis Mazzarosa.

The temperance societies have made great progress at Osnabruck, in Hanover: there are three societies, and they reckon 6970 members out of a population of little more than 100,000.

A letter from Constantinople of the 28th of August says, "On the 19th the pisnaste Leopold Mayer had the honour to perform in the palace of Begler Bey, in the presence of the Sultan. The pianist was received by Rosa Pacha, grand master of the ceremonies; he was accompanied by the Austrian ambassador and an interpreter. The Sultan had his chair placed close to the instrument. The Sultan was highly delighted, and desired the artist to play a third piece. M. Mayer immediately played one of the favourite airs of the Sultan, and great was indeed his highness. An organ was then introduced, and several airs were performed. The Sultan kept his eyes constantly on the hands of the artist, and after hearing him many differing compositions, took from his finger a ring, and presented it to Mayer.

Young Dacre was last night elected Member for Lincoln, by a majority of Mr. Monson, Conservative, has returned to Lincolnshire this morning, and leaves for London, in order to embark for Spain. He will be accompanied by Arcot the violinist.

A new opera, the music by the late M. Monpou, the libretto by Scribe and Mélesville, has been performed at the Opera Comique, and received with great applause. In my next I will enter more fully into the merits of this opera, likely to become very fashionable in Paris.

Rossini never being heard Duprez sing, requested the celebrated tenor to pay him a visit. Duprez consented, sang several pieces, and received many bravos from the illustrious maestro

"A Night in Granada," by Conradin Kreutzer, is amongst the first operas that will be brought out at the Italian Opera. Maestro Frederic Ricci has arrived in Paris to superintend the getting up of "Corrado d'Ammenstein" for the Italian Opera. Meyerbeer will be in Paris on Saturday next.

A provisional theatre has been built at Havre, and will be opened this week It was only thirty days building. We are very dull in the musical world, and I have sent you all the news stirring.

The German papers give an account of a serious fire, which broke out on the 7th, at Stuhlweissenburg, eight miles from Pesth, 700 to 800 houses were destroyed.

THE WEST INDIES.—The Royal Mail-steamer Dee, Commander Hemsley, arrived at Falmouth on Tuesday morning, and proceeded for Southampton without sending her mails at the former port; her dates of leaving are, from Jamaica the 23rd, Hayti the 25th, and from St. Thomas's the 31st ult., and from Fayal the 13th instant; she has brought 23 passengers, and on freight 68,000 dollars, 300 ounces of silver, and 100 ounces of gold. The Royal Mail-steamer Clyde had arrived at Grenada, with mails from England of the 1st of August. The Royal Mail-steamer City of Glasgow was at St. Thomas's, having brought the Leeward Island mails to that port. Her Majesty's ship Albatross was at Jamaica, and the Ringdove was expected from Carthagena. Her Majesty's ship Scylla was in the Gulf of Mexico. Her Majesty's ships Pique and Hornet were at Bermuda; the latter was on the look-out for a steamer expected; and her Majesty's ship Wasp at Tobago. The ex-President Boyer and suite are among the passengers by the Dee from Jamaica. The dates from Hayti, on their arrival, are to the 25th of August, at which time it was in a state of insurrection between the negroes and mulattes; the latter had driven the former to the woods. The Dee fell in with, and spoke, on the 17th instant, in 46 49 N., long. 13 17 W., the ship Alnera, from London, out 150 days; and, at that time of speaking, the vessels unfortunately came in contact, when the latter lost her maintopmast. The Dee received on board her mails, and brought them to Southampton.

Field Marshal Count Bertrand was at Dover on Saturday, for the object of examining the system of fire [illegible] about; on which he would report to the French Government. It is said that he would make a tour throughout the British West India colonies.

A steam-boat had been set on to ply from Kingston to Port Henderson, and thence to Spanish Town.

The transport ship General Palmer had been saved from destruction, on the reef near Plumb Point, by the seven steam ship.

We regret to learn that the Ringdove had put in at St. Jago de Cuba when the Dee left that place. Several persons are said to have fallen victims to that direful disease; nor were the crews of the several ships lying in the harbour exempted from the fatal effects of the fever, many of whom lost nearly the whole of their crews. Besides St. Jago de Cuba, we learn that the fever prevailed at all the other ports along the coast. We trust our health officer will be on the look out, and that he will visit all vessels coming from those ports.

Dr. Spencer, Bishop of Newfoundland, was expected to be appointed to the vacant diocese of Jamaica.

We learn that the Albatross, vessel of war, which arrived at Kingston, reports the landing of several cargoes of slaves on the coast of Cuba, previous to her leaving that part of the coast, that her orders were to watch, to go under her taking any decided step as to securing any of them.

THE MARKETS.—Sugar [illegible] Messrs John Fowler and Co.; ditto at [illegible] Messrs Wilson, Wright, and Co.; ditto at [illegible] Messrs. M'Whinney, Hendrick, and Co.

The new Superintendent of Honduras had arrived at Belize, and assumed the reins of Government. His predecessor had also arrived at New Providence, on his way to England, and been received and treated with all the attention due to his rank, &c.

LISBON, Sept. 11.—By a Portuguese vessel just arrived from Angola, we learn the death of the governor of that place, Commodore Brissarne Leite. The same conveyance brings the intelligence that the son of the deceased commodore, the Governor of Benguela, was about to board a slave vessel full of slaves, by a British cruiser, just at the mouth of the harbour. Its said that he is principally interested in the speculation.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

TRIENNIAL VISITATION OF THE DIOCESE OF BANGOR.—On Wednesday last the Lord Bishop of Bangor commenced his fifth triennial visitation of the diocese in this cathedral. There was a numerous attendance of the clergy, and many ladies and gentlemen who attended divine service, remained to hear the lord bishop's charge on the executive discovery, expository and vindicatory of the litu[illegible] [illegible] preached by the Rev. M. Mirg[illegible] rôle of the clergy having been dispensed with, the [illegible] Bishop proceeded to deliver his charge to those of his reverend brethren assembled upon the occasion.

The Bishop of Chichester has appointed the Rev. C. F. Kennaway [illegible] to the ministry of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, vacant by the death of the Rev. Robert Anderson, B.D.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—We believe we may state, upon good authority, that Lord Abinger is about to lead to the hymeneal altar Mrs. H. J. Rudley, widow of the late Rev. H. J. Rudley, nephew to the late Lord Chancellor Eldon. We understand the ceremony will not take place before the end of the present month.

THE SEASON.—His Right Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons has [illegible] to visit his friend Sir [illegible] shooting lodge in the Highlands, where, we understand, he had some excellent sport. The Speaker was in Edinburgh last week, visited the old Speaker, his right honourable and justly esteemed predecessor in office, viz.—Lord Dunfermline.

The following distinguished visitors arrived at Mount Shannon, the seat of Lord Clare in Ireland, on Friday:—Duke and Duchess of Leinster, Marquis of Kildare, Lady Jane Fitzgerald, Lord Otho Fitzgerald, Mr. and Lady Caroline Sandford, Miss Sandford, Hon. Mr. Lowther (son of Postmaster-General), Augustus S. O'Brien, Esq., M.P., Viscount de Chabot, Mademoiselle de Chabot.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—On Tuesday were married at St. Luke's Church, Chelsea, the Marquis of Ormonde and Miss Frances Jane Paget, eldest daughter of General the Hon. Sir Edward Paget, G.C.B., Governor of Chelsea Hospital, and Lady Harriet Paget. The Right Rev. the Bishop of Ossory officiated at the ceremony. At the conclusion of the solemnization, the noble bridegroom and his fair bride proceeded direct to the Governor's house at Chelsea Hospital, amidst the cheers of the people who had assembled out of curiosity without the church. A sumptuous déjeûner was given by the gallant Governor and Lady Harriet Paget to a circle of about eighty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, attended by Lady Caroline Legge, was pleased to honour Sir Edward and Lady Harriet Paget with her presence at the breakfast. At twenty-five minutes to three o'clock, the Marquis and Marchioness left the Eastern Quadrangle in a carriage and four for his Lordship's villa, near Tunbridge Wells, Kent.

BARONTCH.—The Princess Royal and Princess Alice left the Pavilion on Thursday morning for Windsor Castle. The Prince of Wales is to remain two or three weeks longer. During his Royal Highness's stay the Grenadier Guards will remain to do duty at the Pavilion. The health of his Royal Highness has considerably improved WINDSOR.—The whole of the works commenced at the Castle since the departure of the Court on the 24th of May have been brought to a close, with the exception of the new private chapel, which it is not expected will be completed until next Saturday; and the royal residence will be in readiness for the reception of the Sovereign by the morning of Thursday next. The rumour is still prevalent that it is not improbable her Majesty and Prince Albert will visit Walmer Castle at an early period after the return of the Court.—Captain Moore, late of the 67th Regiment of Foot, and now on half-pay, who was appointed one of the Military Knights of Windsor upon the death of Captain Cumming, the late Governor, was installed on Tuesday morning in St. George's Chapel, with the usual formalities.

LADY QUEEN DOWAGER.—Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, who has been for a brief visit to Earl Howe, at Gosport, arrived in Birmingham, by a special train from Tamworth, at half-past one on Tuesday. She was accompanied by Earl Howe and the various members of her suite, who, immediately on their arrival, proceeded with her Majesty by a special train to Droitwich, whence she proceeded by her private carriage to her residence at Whitley Court. It was expected that her Majesty would have honoured the musical festival with her presence: but though anxious to participate in the gratification of so splendid an entertainment, she yielded to the advice of her physicians, and declined attending. Her Majesty appeared in her usual delicate state of health.

The marriage of Lord Dalmeny, M.P., eldest son of the Earl of Rosebery, and Lady Catherine Lucy Wilhelmina Stanhope, only daughter of Earl and Countess Stanhope, was solemnized on Wednesday, at St. George's Church, Hanover-square, the Rev. W. Repton performing the religious ceremony.

DRAYTON MANOR.—The Earl of Jersey, after passing several days on a visit to Sir R. and Lady Peel, left on Monday for town. The Right Hon. Sir Henry and Lady Emily Hardinge left on Wednesday. Viscount and Viscountess Villiers have arrived from Upton hall, near Banbury. Mr. Wm. Peel, third son of the Premier, who has been in her Majesty's ship Belleisle during the recent operations in China, has arrived from Plymouth. Mr. Frederick Peel has returned from a tour of several months in Germany.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association at the Corn Exchange, on Monday last, was a scene of great tumult and confusion, in consequence of a motion by Mr. Conner with regard to the fix ty of tenure and the payment of rents and taxes, which several of the young peacetaint lawyers pronounced to be seditious. In the absence of the Liberator, Mr. John O'Connell took charge of Ireland; and Mr. Conner, who had not previously an intimate friend of the hon. member for Kilkenny, had a narrow escape from being summarily ejected from the building. The week's rent was announced to be £1462 17s. 8d.

REPEAL.—DROGHEDA BOARD OF GUARDIANS.—At the weekly meeting of the Drogheda Board of Guardians, Mr F Boylan in the chair, Mr. Campbell moved "That this board do petition the House of Commons for the repeal of the Act of Parliament commonly called the Act of Union." The motion was seconded by Mr. N. Markey, and carried unanimously. The commissioner retired when Mr. Campbell rose to move the resolution, and did not return until the business was disposed of. At former meetings of the board, the chairman (Sir P. Hellew) and the vice-chairman (Mr. St. George Smith) refused to put the question, on the ground that they objected to the introduction of politics at the board. These gentlemen, with those of the guardians who agreed in opinion with them, did not attend at the present meeting.

A lodge of Orangemen, headed by the high sheriff of Limerick from the chief Secretary for Ireland, directing that the execution of Houlohan and Noonan, found guilty at the last assizes for the murder of Mr. Shine, shall be postponed until the 20th of November. The matter was understood, is for the purpose of [illegible] the question raised on the trial discussed before the [illegible]

MURDER.—[illegible] Roman Catholic curate at Currin, county Monaghan, [illegible] drowned in the Ulster Canal on Tuesday. He was riding [illegible] bank, when his horse stumbled and fell into the river, carrying his rider with him, and before assistance could be procured life was extinct. An alarming fire broke out in the premises of Messrs Stuart, brothers, in Carrickfergus, on Thursday morning last; they were totally destroyed, and much difficulty was experienced in the saving of adjoining buildings. There was fortunately no loss of life.

DEATH OF THE VICE PROVOST OF TRINITY COLLEGE.—The Rev. Dr. PRIOR, D.D., Vice-Provost of Trinity College, died at his residence in the college, on Sunday morning, in the 79th year of his age. [illegible] he doctor was elected unanimously to succeed the late Dr. Hodgkinson in 1841, and held a fellowship for a period of nearly fifty years. It is supposed that Dr. Prior will be succeeded in the vice-provostship either by Dr. Wray or Dr. M'Donnell. By the elevation of Professor Lloyd to a senior fellowship there will be a vacancy in the number of junior fellows, which cannot be filled up till the second quarter next Trinity term.

DEATH OF A ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP.—Dr. Burke, Roman Catholic Bishop of Ephin, died on Saturday morning, at Turlogh, near Ballymore, after a long illness.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The eleventh session of the present Mayoralty commenced on Monday morning before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, the Sheriffs, the Under-Sheriffs, Aldermen Sir J. Pirie and Gibbs, Mr. Commissioner Bulck, and other civic functionaries. The grand jury being sworn, were charged by the Recorder. He said that the calendar contained a list of about 200 prisoners, but the offences, although some were of a serious nature, did not require any particular remarks. There were three persons charged with the crime of murder, one of whom, counselled by driving furiously. It would be for the grand jury, if the experte evidence seemed to establish the fact, to put it in course of further investigation. After a few other general observations, his lordship dismissed the grand jury to their duties.

ASSAULT.—Augustin Gonzales, a Spaniard, was indicted for an assault upon Mr. Aspinwall, the consul for the United States. It appeared that the prisoner had been in the habit of annoying the prosecutor and family. He is a native in Bahogenes Canchyard, for the last ten months. He claimed to be a citizen of the United States, which the prosecutor denied, he believing him to be a native of Florida, and born in that state before its admission into the Union. On the 5th of August he went to the prosecutor's office, and having made a great noise, the prosecutor tried to turn him out, with the assistance of his clerks. The prisoner resisted, grasped the prosecutor by the throat, and nearly pulled him down the stairs.—The prisoner in his defence alleged that he wanted to sleep in the office, having no money and no place to go to, and the prosecutor struck him.—The prosecutor positively denied having struck him at all. The jury returned a verdict of guilty.—Sentence, one month's imprisonment, and to enter into recognizances in the sum of £20 to keep the peace for twelve months THEFTS.—Mary Ann Foster, aged 19, Diana Foster, aged 13, and George Foster, their father, 50, were indicted for stealing nine yards of woollen cloth, the property of Henry Bodman, the master of the prisoner Alice. The prosecutor stated that he is a tailor, in Bishopsgate Church-yard, and that the prisoner is of the same trade. Alice had been in his service some months, but, as he missed several things, he was induced to watch her. The little girl Diana came to the house, and they gave her some pieces of cloth, and she ran off to her father's, who was waiting near the house. The property was produced and identified. The jury without hesitation, returned a verdict of Guilty against all the prisoners.

George Foster was again indicted, with Amelia, aged 24, another daughter, for stealing several articles, the property of G. Dawson, her master. The prosecutor proved that the articles were missed from his shop, and were pledged by the female prisoner, who was declared guilty, and the father acquitted. The judge called the child up separately from the rest, and sentenced her to a month's imprisonment. With respect to Alice and Diana, who had both robbed their masters to a great amount, the [illegible] had [illegible] to transport them; but from the belief that [illegible] would not [illegible] to [illegible] No, my Lord. They were [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] ship sail the father [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and the sentence was, that he be transported for 10 years.

John Charles Sedgwick, 45, described in the calendar as an agent, was indicted for a misdemeanour, in having unlawfully obtained goods by false pretences. The evidence not being considered sufficient, the jury, after consultation, found a special verdict, and the prisoner was remanded.

Theodore Gottschalck, 21, a young German, of gentlemanly appearance, who was stated in the calendar to be a merchant, was indicted for unlawfully embezzling £453 10s., the moneys of Frederick Huth and another, his employers.—The prisoner expressed his desire to retract his plea of Not Guilty, and to plead guilty to the 1st indictment.—The Recorder, having consulted with Alderman Copeland, ordered the prisoner to be called up for judgment, and said he felt it to be an imperative duty to pass upon him a sentence that would remove him from this country. He might apply, however, to the Secretary of State, and he had no doubt that, if he could state any circumstances that would warrant the Crown in exercising its prerogative of mercy, it would be extended to him, and the sentence he was about to pass might be revised. He felt himself called upon to direct the prisoner to be transported for seven years.

WEDNESDAY.—Mr. Justice Erskine and Mr. Justice Creswell took their seats upon the bench at ten o'clock.

Richard Russell pleaded guilty to an indictment charging him with having in his possession the purpose of making counterfeit money. It appeared that the prisoner was an old offender, and he was sentenced to be transported for seven years.

James Hammond pleaded guilty to a similar offence, and he was also sentenced to ten years' transportation.

William Peacock, 30, was indicted for the manslaughter of Matilda Harriet Bayley, otherwise Boreham, otherwise Peacock.—Mr. Ryland held the depositions of the coroner, and Mr. Hisley defended the prisoner.—In this case the parties had a quarrel, and bad language was made use of by both parties. The deceased ultimately took up a pair of scissors and wounded the prisoner with them slightly on the shoulder, and he immediately snatched the weapon from her, and struck it into the side of the deceased, who died a few days afterwards in consequence of the injury she received. The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to the mercy on account of the provocation he had received.—The prisoner was sentenced to be kept to hard labour for three calendar months.

George Crisp, 26, a butcher, was indicted for feloniously killing and slaying Constantine Briggs.—Mr. Adolphus conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Clarkson appeared for the prisoner.—The prisoner was driving a butcher's cart, in which two other persons besides himself, over London-bridge, on the night of the 30th ult., and he drove against another cart, in which the deceased was riding, and both vehicles were turned over, and the deceased died a few days in consequence of the injuries he received.—Several witnesses were examined, who swore that the prisoner whipped the horse and did not in any way endeavour to pull him up before the accident happened.—Their evidence was unpaid that the horse was a spirited animal, and the persons who were in the cart with the prisoner swore that the horse had "bolted," and that the prisoner was unable to restrain him. The prisoner received a good character from a number of respectable witnesses.—The jury, after considerable deliberation, returned a verdict of "Not guilty."

THE QUEEN v. B. GREGORY.—Mr. Bodkin, who is instructed for the prosecution in this case, called the attention of the court to the fact that, at the last session, when the defendant pleaded guilty before Mr. Baron Rolfe, an order was made that copies of the affidavits in mitigation of punishment should be handed to the prosecutors a week before the present session. It appeared, however, that there had been some misunderstanding as to the precise terms of the arrangement, and consequently the copies were not furnished. The prosecutors were, therefore, not prepared with counter affidavits, and they now sought an extension of time, and requested their lordships would name any day on which the defendant should be brought up for judgment, and counsel might be heard.—Mr. Justice Erskine and counsel could not be permitted to address the court under the circumstances. The defendant had pleaded guilty, and the court had only to look into the affidavits, and consider the matter and give its judgment. There would be no objection to allow time for the production of the affidavits.—Mr. Bodkin suggested that the defendant should be called up on Friday.—Mr. Justice Erskine declined to fix any particular day.—Mr. Bodkin said he was only anxious to prevent any misunderstanding on the part of the defendant. He wished to know whether the court thought it necessary that fresh notice should be served upon the defendant?—Mr. Justice Erskine said certainly not: he was under recognizance, and was bound to attend the court from day to day.—The subject then dropped.

THE ALLEGED SLAVE-TRADING CASE.—On the entrance of the judges on Thursday, Mr. Erskine made an application for the postponement of the trial of Mr. Zulueta and two others, on a charge of having fitted out a vessel for slave-trading on the coast of Africa. The ground upon which he founded the application was the absence of material evidence for the defence, the principal of whom was Mr. Joseph Teplis, who had been Mr. Zulueta's chief clerk at the period of the alleged offence, and who, when the affidavits were first prepared, was abroad at Gibraltar, and had only arrived in this country on Saturday evening. After considerable opposition on the part of the prosecution, the court acceded to the application, and the matter stands over until next session.

POLICE.

MANSION-HOUSE.—On Wednesday a fresh-coloured, able-bodied man, named John Britten, was brought before the Lord Mayor, in the custody of a country constable, upon a warrant which charged him with having, on the 26th of August last, in conjunction with another man, robbed a person on the highway. When the Lord Mayor read the warrant, the prisoner said he had never committed any offence of the kind, and could not guess what was meant by apprehending him after a period of seventeen days, especially as he had been residing in good repute near Market Harborough. The constable said there was a remarkable circumstance connected with the affair which was likely to fasten itself upon the memory. The description of the prisoner in the robbery was executed for the offence. The Lord Mayor observed that, if the prisoner really had anything to do with the robbery, he had a very lucky escape from the capital punishment, to which a second offence of the existence of that extreme penalty, he frequently was resorted to. The officer said he never could find the prisoner in England, which he had searched for and sought. He knew the man well, and was convinced of his identity. The prisoner: I am respected by the whole country in which I have resided. I have been constantly at Smithfield and other markets. He had recently bought horses at Wells, in Somersetshire, and was last year in the force. One part of the officers who searched for the prisoner as a frequent visitor to Smithfield. The prisoner was then delivered up to the constable, to be removed to Somersetshire, where the offence was alleged to have been committed.

GUILDHALL.—AMERICAN CUSTOMS.—Mr. Silas Williard Tobey, an American merchant, residing in the Kent-road, and carrying on business in Thames-street, was charged before the Lord Mayor with having refused to pay a shilling to Mr. Burnside, a partner in the firm of Hodgkinson and Co., stationers, Skinner-street.—Mr. Hobler stated the nature of the case.—Mr. Burnside examined the complainant, who said he was a customer of the defendant as a customer. He was indebted to the firm, and they were engaged in an arrangement of his affairs. Defendant called upon him, and, after some conversation, complainant said he would be glad to have a shilling's worth of stamps immediately.—Mr. Burnside replied "he did not understand such language; there was the door, and he had better walk out of it." He did walk out, but in the evening sent the following letter:—"London, Sept. 19, 1843. Dear sir,—After the personal insult received from you this day, I beg to say, in accordance with a custom of my country, I expect an opportunity being offered me of trying my double-barrelled pistol, which never yet made a miss. I await your answer, but regret to add that I am afraid you are a coward. If you do not meet me as a man I will shoot you down in the street.—I am, respectfully, yours, S. W. TOBEY."—Complainant knew of no other insult than what he had stated. Was sure he had given no other. He made no reply, but on the following day he received a second epistle.—"London, Sept. 19, 1843. Dear sir,—Having no answer from you up to this time, I have to request your attendance at Wormwood-street, by eight-and-forty hours I do not receive a memorandum of the necessary arrangements, I am at liberty, by the usual etiquette of such cases, to post you as a coward in the town, which I will do publicly.—I am, respectfully, yours, S. W. TOBEY." Complainant apprehended danger to his life or person from the prisoner. He knew the letters to be in the prisoner's handwriting, and had shops, clerk in the house could testify to the receipt of his own accord to the prisoner's counting house for the purpose of advising him to write to Mr. Burnside, apologising for his offensive conduct, and sending the stamps. The prisoner said he would not, he would have Mr. Burnside's blood. He had sworn to his wife that he would have his before night. Defendant was much excited, and, catching up a swordstick in a corner of the counting house, advanced in a menacing attitude towards the door as if his notion were to clear off and terminate the existence of the complainant. His wife wrested the sword-stick from him, he resisted. It was not a sword-stick, but a sheath, formed like a sword, and a savage state in which he found the prisoner. Defendant's solicitor said he must be borne in mind that defendant was a foreigner, and unable to find bail. He would enter into his own recognizances to any amount.—Mr. Hobler said he could not take his own recognizance.—Mr. Alderman Hunter thought other security must be had, but it should be such as the defendant could probably obtain, and on that point he was desirous of a little further confer privately.—Sir Peter Laurie said he could only regard the first letter as a joke. The second letter, written twenty-four hours after, when the heat should have subsided, was a more serious matter. Sufficient bail should be taken to prevent a breach of the peace.—The defendant was bound, himself in £200, and two sureties in £100 each.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—APPREHENSION OF A RECEIVER OF STOLEN GOODS.—Henry W. Marley, tailor, No. 36, Dean-street, Soho, was placed at the bar before Mr. Hall, on Monday, charged by the detective police with being a receiver of stolen property. Mr. Hall and Benjamin Brown were also charged on suspicion of having had some stolen cloth in their possession. The police have been for many weeks engaged in this business, and at length, by keeping a strict watch on Marley's house, they have succeeded in obtaining such a mass of evidence as will most likely lead to the discovery of numerous robberies, and prove the means of restoring much valuable property to the plundered owners. The apprehension of Morley, who occupied one of the best houses in Dean-street, who also apparently carried on a highly respectable trade as master tailor, has created no small commotion in the district.—Inspector Hayes, and Johnson, and, in consequence of numerous robberies of cloths and velvets which had recently taken place at the west end of the town, and from information which the police had been put in possession of, a watch was kept upon Morley's house, in Dean-street, and the result was, that he went on Saturday last, in company with Sergeant Shaw, to search the premises. He found a considerable quantity of plushes and velvets in two boxes, which he took possession of and these were afterwards found to have been stolen from the premises of Messrs. Hudson and Falconer, of New Bond-street. In an upper room a dressing-case was found, which is a future day would also be sworn to. There were some pieces of cloth which would be identified by the owner, who lived in Grafton-street. There was also a large quantity of property, consisting of broadcloths and cassimeres, which was at present without owners, and which was suspected to be stolen property. Evidence confirmatory of this statement having been given, the prisoners were remanded until Saturday.—Bail was tendered on behalf of Morley, but it was refused.

MARYLEBONE.—Two young men, named George Swaine and John Swaine were placed at the bar, before Mr. Rawlinson, on the charge of having stolen articles of different description, the property of Mr. Charles Mathews, the comedian.—Police-constable Hughes, 174 D, deposed that on the preceding night, about ten o'clock, as he was on duty in the Harrow-road, he met the prisoners, one of whom, George Swaine, had in his hand a bundle, at the bottom of which was tied a coffee-mill. The bundle was opened, and in it were discovered an iron-handled feather fan, sixteen pieces of sperm candles, some bread and meat, a tooth-brush, two carpenters' tools, twenty-five apples, and two boxes of lucifer matches; the other prisoner, John Swaine, had nothing in whatever of a suspicious nature upon him.—John Hipkin said that he was valet to Mr. Charles Mathews, who, with Mrs. Mathews, entered upon the occupancy of Dashborough Cottage, Westbourne-green, Paddington, on Monday last; their late residence was in Albury-street, Pimlico, and the prisoners had been employed in taking up carpets, and removing furniture, &c.—Mr. Rawlinson: Look at these things before you. Do you know anything of them?—Witness: The feather fan I know to be a cadane's; she has been in the habit of using it upon the stage. The coffee-mill I can also identify, having repeatedly seen it in the house in Albury-street.—Mr. Rawlinson: Can you speak to the pieces of candle?—Witness: Mathews finds her own sperm candles for her dressing-room at the theatre; the pieces are brought from there home, and they are afterwards used in candlesticks for the bedroom. I have no doubt that these pieces are some of the same.—George Swaine was then committed for trial, and the other was discharged.

Son Altesse Royale Prince Albert, decoré de la Grande Croix de la Légion d'Honneur par le Roi des Français, S. M. Louis Philippe.

"HONNEUR ET PATRIE."

Croix! dont les yeux ravis étincelants,
Ont lu travers tant de combats,
Les cœurs des braves conduisant
Où l'honneur tirigeait ses pas,
Fol! qui méprisait les entraves,
Le joug terrible de la mort,
Bri le, oh Croix! un autre brave
S'est joint à ton illustre corps.

Croix! Celui qui t'a fait maître,
Et qui t'embrasse en son tombeau;
Celui qui fut des Rois le maître,
Dès son triomphe à Marengo;
Quoiqu'il eût de grands guerriers sous elle,
Le monde a oublié tous ses torts—
Brille, oh Croix! un autre brave
S'est joint à ton pieux de toute corps.

Croix! Pilote de la terre,
Te cherassaient plus que leurs âmes,
L'Aigle te portait dans un serre,
Dans l'autre il vengeait la flamme.
Et qui l'Aigle vole. Du Nil au Drave,
Ne fut pour lui qu'un seul essor,
Brille, oh Croix! un autre brave
S'est joint à ton illustre corps.

Croix! si le main d'un vaillant Roi
T'a posé sur le cœur d'Albert;
Un cœur rempli d'honneur, de foi,
Qui sent du bien à l'univers—
Les astres de l'envie qui pavent
Les cieux, béurent ses efforts.
Brille, oh Croix! un autre brave
S'est joint à ton plus noble corps.

Oh Croix! puisse un ciel que nous—
Les grands peuples de ce monde—
La France et l'Angleterre, par-tout,
Partians ce ciel—la paix féconde!
Plus de tyrans! et plus d'esclaves,
Donnons aux hommes un meilleur sort.
Et brille, oh Croix! un autre brave
S'est joint à ton illustre corps!

HER MAJESTY'S BELGIAN EXCURSION.

We commence our promised illustrations of her Majesty's visit to Belgium with a picturesque view of the royal landing, detailed at page 182 of our journal of last week, showing the front of the handsome pavilion, with a triumphal arch, Corinthian columns, &c. Next, at page 195, are the two scenes of the progress: 1. The pavilion, with the royal visitors and their royal host and hostess making their first mutual greeting. 2. The royal yacht coming into harbour.

The coast presents one continued line. The approach is difficult, and vessels pass the two jetties by so narrow an opening that they can only enter at flood-tide, and then attempt is dangerous with a strong contrary wind. The visitor's attention soon becomes directed to the ramparts and spires of Ostend. The vast dyke, the old canal of Bruges, the pavilion of the ladies, that from amidst the ruins of the once thronged and bustling port, silent and melancholy as a desert in ordinary times, but enlivened into a brilliant scene on Wednesday week. Usually, "the sea-beaten aspect of Ostend, the façade of the jetties, the Place d'Armes, the monumental ruins, the wide-spreading sea from the encircling ramparts, at once picturesque and wild—even the reading rooms and hotels, lighting, and estaminets, are all insufficient to rescue it from a monotony and dulness which make the stranger anxious to proceed; for it is only four leagues from Bruges, and twenty two from Brussels. Not a few historical associations attach to the city, which has rather an antique and old-fashioned appearance; the écluses were erected as early as 1609; and the port may be considered a handsome monument of the Emperor Joseph II. For a considerable period, Ostend, now chiefly celebrated for its fine oysters, was a place of considerable importance." In 1583, it was strongly fortified by the Prince of Orange; it sustained more than a three years' siege by the Archduke Albert; in 1604, the town was captured by the Spanish general Spinola, when the enemy fired no less than 150,000 coups de canon, and the loss to the besiegers was upwards of 30,000 by sword and famine. Such is the historical interest of the place. The town stands upon a plain, and is entered by four gates. Of late years, it has been much frequented during the summer as a watering-place; the sea-bathing is good, and there are excellent baths; and the ramparts form an agreeable promenade.

The fourth and fifth engravings upon page 195, are both very interesting.—The young Princes, the Duke de Brabant and the Count de Flandres, two fine, intelligent, curly-haired boys, accompanying an Oriental, with their attendant; and the next group shows the young Princess, a beautiful child, enjoying the sea-breezes on the sands, with her attendants, followed by a royal footman. Both these groups are characteristic of the simplicity of the every-day life of the Belgian royal family. Upon the succeeding page, 197, are portrayed her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the King and Queen of the Belgians, promenading on the Digue, a sea-wall, which formerly served as a defence, but is now converted into a public promenade, and commands a great extent of draws and flat. This and the wooden piers, stretching on both sides of the harbour's mouth, are much resorted to in the evening. The next engraving is a scene of kindred familiar interest—Her Majesty and Prince Albert and the King and Queen of the Belgians walking on the sands.

We concluded our account of her Majesty's movements at Ostend last week with a description of the grand banquet given at the Hotel de Ville by his Majesty the King of the Belgians on Wednesday.

On Thursday, shortly before twelve o'clock, Prince Albert and the King of the Belgians proceeded en amateur to the port, where, after going on board the Belgian steamer, the Crown Prince of the Netherlands, they proceeded to visit the royal yacht. They were rowed thither in the barge of the Crown Prince, which, however, was so unskilfully steered, that an accident, which many of the bystanders apprehended might turn out to be "an ugly one," occurre l. By coming too close to the bows of the royal yacht, the flagstaff of the barge was caught in the rigging of that part of the vessel, and, if it had not snapped close off, might have capsized the little craft. As it was, all was righted in time, and the royal visitors set foot in safety on the royal yacht. Immediately on their coming on board, flags, representing the arms of Saxe Coburg and of Belgium, were hoisted fore and aft, and remained there till the illustrious visitors retired, which was after a lapse of about half an hour.

His Majesty the King of the Belgians and Prince Albert then proceeded to a station in the eastern direction of the town, where a review of the light artillery and infantry took place before them. These illustrious personages then returned to the palace.

The royal yacht and the convoy of steamers (six or seven in number) cleared out of port at half-past two o'clock, in the presence of an immense concourse of spectators, who were unbounded in their expressions of admiration of the noble scene which passed before them. Previous to the departure of these vessels, an order appeared to have been given to admit the public to inspect them, an opportunity which was taken advantage of by an immense number of persons in the course of the early part of the day; and up, indeed, to the very moment of the ships' departure. Such a scene of bustle was perhaps never before witnessed on the waters of the port of Ostend, as the various craft hurryin g to and fro the several steamers presented. The officers on board behaved with the greatest politeness to all this bevy of visitors, and seemed to take an honest pride in exhibiting these few of the wondrous sights of our unrivalled navy.

In the afternoon the Prince and Princess Hohenzollern arrived from Germany, for the express purpose of doing honour to the Queen of England. They took up their residence at the house of M. Delsart, the postmaster, in the Rue de la Chapelle; and very shortly after their arrival they were visited by the King and Queen of the Belgians, and the Queen of England and Prince Albert. The interview between them and our gracious Sovereign was the most interesting one. The princess, on the entrance of our Queen, was for throwing herself on her knees to receive her, but was immediately raised by her Majesty, who uttered an exclamation implying her dissent from the necessity of such a mode of reception, at the same time embracing her most cordially.

The royal dinner party at the Town-hall was upon an exceedingly splendid scale. It took place as early as half-past six, in order to afford the whole of the court an opportunity of proceeding to the theatre afterwards. The company arrived in precisely the same order as the day before. King Le Spold entered the hall, leading the Queen of England by the hand, the band striking up "God save the Queen." Her Majesty then sat on the right of the King, and the Princess Hohenlohe on his left. On the right of the princess was Lord Liverpool, and then Lady Hamilton Seymour. To the left of the Queen of England was Prince Hohenlohe, a very fine looking man, apparently about fifty years of age; and next to him the Viscountess Canning. All these, with many others, occupied one side of the table; the host, by foreign custom, sitting not at the end, but in the middle of his honourable board. On the opposite side of the table was the Queen of the Belgians. She had Prince Albert on her right and the Earl of Aberdeen on her left.

The banquet lasted about half an hour. The whole party seemed to enjoy themselves with more of empressement and less of formal restraint than we are generally in the habit of attaching to the gastronomic proceedings of courts. The Queen seemed very cheerful, and chatted freely with all those who seemed to be within hearing of her voice. The repast was a sumptuous one, served on silver plate; and between the various courses the band in attendance played agreeable airs. Of course there were no toasts or healths drank.

The entertainment at the theatre was announced to take place at eight o'clock, but it was nearly half-past before the royal party arrived, having evidently hurried from the dinner-table at the earliest possible moment. In the mean time, however, the play, "L'Hérétière," was commenced, but was interrupted, in the middle of the first dialogue, on the appearance of the illustrious visitors, when a scene of much more interest took place before the curtain. The theatre, as might be expected, is a small one, about the size and shape of that in Tottenham-court-road. The whole of the first tier of boxes had been appropriated to the use of the royal party, or the various members of their suites; and above were two other tiers, the places in which were eagerly bought up by the public as soon as the announcement of the intended performance was made. The three centre boxes, facing the stage, were appropriated to the immediate members of the royal party; and were lined and faced with crimson velvet for the occasion.

The first to enter the royal box was Queen Victoria. A burst of cheering and clapping of hands immediately took place, which her Majesty gracefully acknowledged. Her Majesty then sat down in the centre seat—an old-fashioned arm-chair, covered with green silk. The Queen of the Belgians next entered, and was received with cheering as warm as that which had just greeted her royal niece. The rest of the royal party then rapidly entered, and took their places. At the end of the comedy, which only contained one act, the orchestra played "God save the Queen," the audience, including the Queen and her illustrious relatives, joining in honour of our national anthem. Two pieces of singing then followed, and the second act of "Guillaume Tell" concluded the performance, about eleven o'clock.

The town was generally illuminated, as on the night before.

The wood engraving on page 201, represents one of the lions of Ostend—a house in which Napoleon resided for a time: it is one of the most massive-like dwellings in the place.

THE VISIT TO BRUGES.

At twelve o'clock on Friday morning, her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians and their respective suites, left Ostend in a special train to visit the city of Bruges. In anticipation of this event, the inhabitants had made every preparation to receive the royal party in a manner suitable to the occasion. The last time that this city was visited by a sovereign of England was when George the Fourth passed through it en route to Hanover. He then slept at the Hotel de la Poste, and after his departure the proprietor of the hotel immediately closed the doors with the determination never again to open it as an hotel. He said that having had the sovereign of the first nation in the world as his guest, his house should from that hour cease to be one of public entertainment. He kept his word—the house remained closed until his death. Since then, however, it has been re-opened as an hotel, and is now the Hotel de Flandre.

On the present occasion every house in the city was more or less decorated; not only were flags and banners suspended from the windows across the streets, but the fronts of the houses were literally covered with drapery of all colours, hung in various forms and shapes, chiefly in festoons. On those parts of the frontage which the drapery did not cover, green boughs were placed, forming a pretty contrast to the many coloured materials. In the streets, in addition to the flags and banners, garlands formed into wreaths and crowns were suspended, while cross-lines of house to house pieces of unbleached or brown Holland, the manufacture of which is peculiar to the city, were placed in a continuous range along the whole length of the streets. Before many of the houses, young trees or large branches of trees were planted pro tem.

The splendid triumphal arch erected, under which the royal cortége would have to pass in its progress to the Hotel de Ville or Town-hall, it was covered with foliage, very tastefully arranged; and in a wreath at the summit were displayed the names of "Victoria and Albert." A similar to the same arch that was erected in 1810, when Napoleon and the Empress Marie Louise made a public entry into Bruges, and it had never been used since. The house of the burgomaster, where his family resided, and where the Queen of England, is the same room where the Emperor Napoleon was received on his visit to Bruges. Such is the mutability of human grandeur! This very edifice in its structure is upwards of 500 years old.

It is custom any for the civic authorities to give notice to the citizens or any event about to take place in which they may be interested. In obedience to this custom, the Burgomaster issued early in the morning a placard, stating that according to the latest express from Ostend, the King and Queen of the Belgians, with the Queen of England and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, would arrive at Bruges soon after seven. As the hour approached when the royal party were expected to arrive, the streets were crowded by the inhabitants, and the windows of the houses were occupied by the fair sex, presenting a display of beauty not to be surpassed by any town in the kingdom.

A few minutes before one the sound of the artillery firing a royal salute gave notice of the arrival of the illustrious party at the railway station. Here they were received by the Count de Mercy-Argenteau, Minister of State and Governor of Western Flanders; the Burgomaster, Baron de Pelichy, and the Echevins of Bruges; the British Vice-Consul, and all the civil and military authorities of the city.

On her Majesty reaching the interior of the station the cheering subsided, doubtless to afford the King of the Belgians an opportunity to present the burgomaster and the commander of the city to her Majesty. The amiable and gallant-looking burgomaster, bowing repeatedly, addressed some observations to her Majesty, doubtless expressing his acknowledgment of the honour conferred upon the city by her visit, which was graciously replied to by her Majesty made some suitable observations, curtseying, bowing, and smiling most graciously. The burgomaster then passed on to the King and Queen of the Belgians, and the Queen of England stood a short complimentary conversation took place, during which time the commander was presented, in like manner as the burgomaster had been, to her Majesty. The Queen then took King Leopold by the hand, and the Queen of the Belgians that of Prince Albert, and, the suite following, proceeded to the royal carriages. A hearty cheer was then raised inside the apartment, which was taken up by those without, and re-echoed again and again by thousands of voices. The band playing "God save the Queen," the royal cortége set out at a rattling pace. The splendour and magnificence of the Belgians excited frequent bursts of admiration from the royal visitors, which was only increased as the procession moved on, and the embellishments became more and more rich; whilst, at the same time, the cheering of the multitude became louder and louder, extending along the streets, and up to the very house-tops. The Queen and Prince Albert stared right and left, evidently overcome; the king and Queen of the Belgians looked gratified in the extreme; Lady Canning and Lady Seymour tried in vain to look demure and courtly; Lord Liverpool, with up-turned eyes, smiled and peered about him, and smiled again; and even Lord Aberdeen seemed, just for the moment, to forget the Union Church of Scotland and the Free question. As for the people, they were for the moment out of their senses for joy. There was no prancing cavalry flanking the royal carriages, as with us, to divert the view of the anxious subject of royalty. The multitude and the military were restrained by any influence but their own good feelings, they rushed and leapt along beside the carriage—shouting, shrieking—with perfect Irish abandon and all naïveté along, from every crowded lady's window and doorway, handkerchiefs, nosegays of flowers, garlands, branches of trees, were waving to and fro. Then the bands of the various regiments placed along the road played "God save the Queen," so lustily, as if they would drown this tumult, but in vain; for the tumult drowned even the booming of the cannon hard by, and the pealing of countless bells overhead. Then what a rushing and scrambling was there between the multitude and the military at the cortége passed the Place des Armes; what a climax of excitement, as it went under the triumphal arch opposite to the Town hall; and then what a shout for instrumental and vocal music was it, when the full potent bands, all playing away at once in the Place du Bourg, succeeded at last in throwing a somewhat confused version of our fine national anthem upon the ears of Queen Victoria—to be weighted to partake of the hospitalities of the worthy burgomaster of Bruges!

The Hotel de Ville, built in 1377, was first founded as early as 865. It is a fine specimen of middle-age art, having six towers, two of the summits of which bore formerly each a gilded brazen crown. The façade exhibits six grand windows, and are richly supplied with niches, formerly fitted with statues. The great hall, lit by four of these noble windows, contains the public library of 7932 volumes. This very interesting edifice is engraved at p. 197.

On entering the Town-house the royal party proceeded to the public library, as a withdrawing-room, until the collation was served up. After the lapse of a few minutes they descended the staircase, the Queen of England being led first by the King of the Belgians, and ushered by the grand maréchal of the court, the Queen of the Belgians by Prince Albert; the Earls of Aberdeen and Liverpool, and Ladies Seymour and Canning, and the rest of the suite, together with the invited guests belonging to the town, following. Amongst the latter the Bishop of Bruges, in full canonicals, was a conspicuous object. The band having played "God save the Queen" again in the hall, proceeded to one of the ante-rooms, where they played selections from "Lucia di Lammermoor," and other favourite operas. Between their performances a body of singers, who had been engaged for the purpose, sang various pieces of music, beginning with the national anthem.

Immediately after the banquet her Majesty visited the most remarkable places in the city, among which were the Cathedral, the Church of Notre Dame, the Academy of Painting, the English Convent, the Hospital of St. John, the Archery Hall of St. Sebastian, &c. At the cathedral and the Church of Notre Dame, as soon as her Majesty entered, the organs pealed forth their swelling notes, and played the English anthem, "God save the Queen." Among the many objects worth seeing in these two churches, are the tombs of Charles the Bold and of Mary of Burgundy, his daughter; the escutcheons and seats formerly allotted to the Knights of the Golden Fleece; a statue of the Madonna and Child, supposed to be by Michael Angelo; and a numerous collection of pictures by various first-rate artists of the olden times. At the Hospital of St. John is that most extraordinary painting by Hamling, of the Eleven Thousand Virgins. No miniature can excel this elaborate gem in fineness of touch: it is an object of much attraction, and amply repays the connoisseur any trouble or expense he may be put to in going to see it. The Archery Hall was first established by Charles the Second, while residing here during his exile; the archers having elected him their king (Le Roi des Arbalétriers). Here there is a picture, supposed to be the only one, of the Duke of Gloucester. The large engraving at page 201 represents this building, with the royal visit.

Our next engraving, at page 200, represents the Grande Pace, with the Halles (not the Hôtel de Ville, as it is sometimes termed), a large building of the date 1534. The tower, or belfry (beffroi), is an elegant Gothic pile, imposing from its height; and the view from the top is of great panoramic extent. The chimes from this tower are the finest in Europe, and play almost incessantly. On one side of this square is the house inhabited by Charles II. during his exile from England. The engraving represents the arrival of the royal party to inspect the curiosities of this very interesting edifice.

At five o'clock the royal party took their departure from Bruges, and returned to Ostend. Her Majesty was highly gratified at all she had witnessed, and with the reception she had met with from the Brugeois. Her Majesty was also much struck with the appearance of the city; the great extent of the buildings, the high pointed roofs, the old Spanish architecture, all unite in giving it that appearance of "gloomy splendour." On her Majesty's return to Ostend, the royal party dined at the Hôtel de Ville, and went in the evening to the theatre.

THE VISIT TO GHENT.

On Saturday the Queen extended her progress to the ancient, powerful, and independent city of Ghent. The distance being about forty-four miles, the visit was contemplated to be a longer one than that to Bruges on the previous day, and the special train, conveying the courts of Belgium and England, left the station at a little after nine o'clock, reaching Ghent about eleven. The preparations to receive and welcome her Majesty, if not on such a scale of external magnificence as those at Bruges, were not wanting in taste and completeness; but at the same time it must be admitted that, brilliant as was the coup d'œil which met the eye of the stranger on entering the town from the railway station, the effect would have been much more striking if he had not been at Bruges on the previous day. The streets, from end to end, were planted with rows of fir trees, procured for the occasion, from which festoons of white linen were suspended. Flags in profusion waved over head; those of England and Belgium blending conspicuously on the top of the Cathedral of St. Bavon, on that of the celebrated belfry, and at other public edifices.

Several triumphal arches, covered with linen cloth and festooned in different colours, were erected at the entrances to the principal streets. All these arches bore inscriptions; those on one of them illustrated a curious historical coincidence. They ran thus:—"Philippine Hainsut, Reine d'Angleterre, à Gand en 1343," and on the other side, "Victoria, Reine d'Angleterre, à Gand, en 1843."

On the arrival of the royal train at the station, the artillery fired a royal salute, and the military presented arms, "God save the Queen" being played as usual. On the royal party alighting, they entered a tent prepared for the occasion, where the bishop, governor, burgomaster, and other various authorities, civil and military, all dressed in their robes of state, were severally presented to her Majesty by King Leopold. The effect of this ceremony for the moment was very pleasing. The ceremonies of introduction having passed, the royal party entered their carriages, the civil and military authorities theirs, and the procession moved forward to the town hall, where her Majesty arranged her toilet; it then set out for the round of visits which the royal party were to pay to the public edifices and curiosities of the town.

Her Majesty first went to the cathedral (St. Bavon's), where there are some very fine pictures, and the chiselled oak is without equal in the world. The Grand Beguinage was the next place visited. This is an establishment of an ancient community of females, whose lives are, without being bound by vows, devoted to religion. The coup d'œil afforded in the interior of the church, when they are at their devotions, generally attracts the attention of strangers visiting Ghent. Their number is about 600, and their time is occupied in the day in the same manner as it is by the Sisters of Charity. The other places to which the royal party went were the Casino, le Palais de Justice, and l'Université; after which they returned to the Government House, where an déjeûner à la fourchette was prepared for them.

At half-past three they attended a morning concert at the theatre. The house was crowded in every part, and upon entering it, her Majesty was repeatedly cheered, and the band struck up "God save the Queen." The theatre of Ghent, built in 1840 by Rowland, is, without doubt, one of the most magnificent buildings of the kind in the world. There are four tiers of boxes, besides the pit row, lofty separated from one another. The successive tiers have a bold sweep, and are quite unsupported by pillars, except the royal box at the back of the pit, which is built like a Grecian portico, rising to the second tier, and two lofty but narrow Grecian façades, the width of a single box, rising to the highest tier. The roof is an unbroken circle, a point of great difficulty to accomplish successfully in theatrical architecture, but which in this instance is most happily accomplished. The whole is most gorgeously painted, and lighted with a chandelier of elegant form and rich dimensions. The approaches and lobbies, which are all built of stone, are upon an appropriate scale of grandeur—the salle de bal being quite palatial in its proportions and decorations.

After the first act of the concert the royal party rose from their seats, amidst a burst of cheering, and left the box, for the purpose of going to the throne-room, at the end of the salle de bal, where, according to the ancient customs of this little independent community, the brave Gantois were to enjoy the right of presenting themselves before royalty, under its canopy of state. The royal personages took their places on the dais at the end of the extreme apartment; the band stationed in the orchestra, which was over the doorway between, having concluded "God save the Queen," struck up their own national anthem, "The Brabançon," which they continued playing throughout the remainder of the ceremony.

The first apartment, which is immediately behind the royal box, and opening to it by wide glazed doors, is a magnificent lofty saloon, extending the whole width of the theatre, and embellished in the Louis Quatorze style; the next saloon, which extends literally from the end of the former, and therefore beyond the region of the ordinary limits of the theatre, is even larger, with an oval ceiling, supported by sixteen magnificent marble pillars, richly overlaid with gold; the third and last saloon is about the size of the first, and somewhat in the same style. At the upper end of it is a dais, on which is a magnificent throne, an ancient one, said to be that on which the Flemish counts used to be inaugurated, surmounted with a magnificent canopy of crimson velvet. Here Queen Victoria being seated, surrounded by her royal relatives and their several officers of state, permitted the good people of Ghent (all dressed in afternoon costume) to press forward to gaze upon their new and welcome guest, even to the very step of the dais, unrestrained by guards or marshalmen of any kind. After waiting a few minutes in this position, during which time many of the principal personages were pointed out and presented to her by the King, she rose, and taking the King's arm, and followed by the rest of the court, made a slow progress through the thickly-crowded apartment, bowing now and then to those who made way for her, and apparently quite at home in the very novel situation in which she found herself. This was the most magnificent and striking incident in the whole day's proceedings.

After the concert, which closed between five and six o'clock, the royal party proceeded again to the Hôtel de Ville, and thence to the railway station, where they "embarked" with the same state as attended them at their arrival. The royal train reached Ostend about eight o'clock, and so ended the magnificent fêtes of this eventful day.

OSTEND, Sunday.—On Sunday morning divine service was performed before the Queen, Prince Albert, and her Majesty's suite and attendants, by the Rev. Mr. Jessop, of Ostend, in the chapel of the royal residence, and not in the Protestant church of the town, as has been erroneously stated. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians was driven to church at nine o'clock in the morning. Her suite consisted of two persons only, occupying two carriages, and without guards.

The first profane incident of the day was the firing of a salute by her Majesty's brig Grecian, sent in for orders from the Warspite, which lies in the offing, being too large to enter the harbour. The captain landed, and repaired to the residence of Lord Aberdeen, whence he soon returned, and rejoined the Warspite. The report of the cannon called out all the world, but finding that a single vessel only had arrived, the Digue became once more deserted, for even at that early hour the heat of the sun was intolerable.

Shortly before two o'clock the three children of their Majesties the King and Queen of the Belgians left the royal residence for Brussels. King Leopold, notwithstanding the intense heat of the sun, walked for some time on the Digue, dressed, as usual, in a plain brown coat, grey trousers, and white hat. His Majesty may be said to have been unattended, for the only servant (in the undress livery of the royal family), that was in view was so far behind as to be overlooked by an inattentive observer.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY AT BRUSSELS.

The preparations for the reception of her Majesty at Brussels, on Monday, though not abounding in so much luxury of detail as those of Bruges, were more stately and theatrical in their effect. The whole length of the way from the railroad, by the Boulevard and the Rue Royale was planted with fir-trees, sometimes in double rows, and rich draperies, mostly of crimson and gold, with occasionally some of lighter colours, were suspended in front of the balconies of the spacious and elegant mansions which they curtained; from the windows of which also flags floated, some as high as the third and fourth étages. The walls along the ground floor were faced with thick hedges of evergreens. At the station-house a pavilion of truly royal splendour was erected, lined and draped with rich purple velvet, with gold ornaments, and furnished with two sofas and four chairs of carved oak covered with royal velvet, which had been brought from the palace on purpose. Around was a perfect haie of colours, flanked with rows of fir-trees, planted for the occasion. The approach to the royal pavilion was covered with a spacious carpet, upon which dahlias and other rich flowers were abundantly strewed.

At twenty-five minutes past one the first sound of the cannon, firing a salute of a hundred and one guns, was heard, and about a minute afterwards the Queen alighted from the train, accompanied and attended precisely as upon the former occasions, the band of the Guides playing "God save the Queen." The royal party having entered the pavilion, the King of the Belgians presented the governor of the province, the permanent deputation of the province, the burgomaster of Brussels, the sheriffs, and other civic and military authorities, who had previously been waiting in a spacious open apartment, lined with white, and bordered with crimson and gold festoons. The burgomaster made rather a long address of congratulation and thanks to her Majesty, who smiled graciously at the pauses, and curtseyed very low when it was completed. The procession then moved forward to the palace, the whole length of the road, with certain short intervals, being lined with troops. The various regiments of the civic guard extended from the station to the Rue Royale; at the corner house of which it was a most magnificent emblazonment of the arms of England, of Belgium, and of Coburg. Then came the troops of the line, ending with a demi-battalion of light artillery, which were stationed in the place before the palace. The populace cheered her Majesty as she stepped into the carriage, and generally along the line of route, and the ladies at the windows waved their handkerchiefs.

On the cortège passing by the beautiful conservatories and grounds of the Botanic Garden, two jets d'eau began playing, the spray falling in clouds, upon which the rays of the sun produced the effect of a rainbow, swelling and shifting in extraordinary folds. At the park, which faces the palace, the coup d'œil was very fine, the old town being a striking feature below, on the right.

The royal cortège entered the palace at half-past two.

At four o'clock her Majesty, and the whole of the royal personages, attended a concert of the Grand Harmonie performed in the open air in the park. The royal party arrived in the usual procession of carriages at the gate of the upper end of the park, in face of the Palais de la Nation, and having alighted, proceeded on foot across the grass-plat which extends in front of that entrance, and thence making a detour round the orchestra (a polygon veranda, open on all sides), proceeded to a state pavilion, which had been prepared for their reception on the further side. On the royal party taking their seats a hearty cheer ran through the park, and the orchestra struck up "God save the Queen." They then performed several pieces of music from modern operas, and the concert terminated a little after six.

After the concert, the Queen, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, Prince Albert, and followed by the rest of the court, drove through the principal streets of the town, visiting on their way the Museum and the Town-hall. They were loudly cheered in many places, particularly in the Place Royale, where the principal hotels frequented by English travellers are situated.

The dinner party at the palace took place at eight o'clock; covers were laid for sixty-five. The table was sumptuously laid out, and there was a perfect blaze of light from the chandeliers and innumerable candelabra. The Queen sat on the right hand of the King of the Belgians; next to her the Queen of the Belgians; and amongst those in the immediate neighbourhood on that side were the Pope's Nuncio, Lady Canning, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Liverpool, &c. On the left of the royal host was the Grand Duchess Frederica, and next to her sat Prince Albert. The fine band of the Guides was stationed in the adjoining room, where they performed in a masterly style at intervals throughout the repast.

In the evening the whole city was brilliantly illuminated. At the entrances of the park the gates were very tastefully lighted with variegated lamps, and scarcely a house of any size or pretensions was without a row of the lighted pots with which illuminations on the continent are formed. The general appearance was very good. Immense mobs of people promenaded the streets till a late hour; all the hotels, taverns, estaminets, &c., were

HER MAJESTY'S BELGIAN EXCURSION.—Next week we shall resume and complete our illustrations of the QUEEN'S VISIT TO BELGIUM; and, in a series of highly-picturesque Engravings, represent the most attractive scenes of her Majesty's progress from Ghent to Brussels, and the royal departure for England. The sketches for this purpose have been executed by Mr. E. LANDELLS, who witnessed the several fêtes and celebrations of the royal Tour, as well as the "curiosities" visited by her Majesty; and whose accuracy in picturing the respective scenes may, therefore, be relied on.

OUR NEW MACHINES.—We are gratified at being able at length to state positively that our new machines are now all but complete, and will be ready for work in a fortnight. The paper of October the 7th will issue from them, and will, we trust, realize our expectations of increased facility and dispatch, and also of improvement. The long delay that has arisen has been caused, we are assured by Messrs. Middleton, from their anxious desire to make these machines the most perfect specimens of the kind.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1843.

We are aware how necessary it is towards a proper administration of the law that the persons entrusted with its execution should be treated with confidence and respect, in order that they may be enabled to discharge the more unpopular and disagreeable portions of their duty with stern and uncompromising fidelity. With this feeling, we have been always most reluctant to censure the conduct of magistrates or other public officers, except in cases where the duty which we owe the public left us no alternative but a base and cowardly abandonment of principle; and we regret to add that the occasions for our interference have of late become alarmingly frequent. Any one who pays attention to the published reports of the proceedings at the police offices must have observed that there is a growing licentiousness in the conduct of this force which requires the most jealous watchfulness on the part of public journalists especially, for such is the healthy state of society in this country that public opinion, after all, is found to be the best and readiest tribunal of appeal. These remarks are suggested by the perusal of a police case which was brought under our notice during the past week; and, as the material facts are neither disputed nor denied, we feel bound to say that it behoves every man who values his civil rights and liberty to protest against a system which encourages the wily machinations of hired spies to entrap the unwary into the commission of crime. It is now no uncommon occurrence for the police to assume disguises so ingeniously devised that the most lynx-eyed persons are deceived, and under such circumstance to become parties to a breach of the law, in order that the less guilty may be pounced upon and punished. The class of persons who appear to be most subjected to this species of annoyance is the licensed victuallers of London, a body of men who, considering their peculiar avocations, and the great respectability with which their business is generally conducted, are entitled rather to the indulgence and encouragement of magistrates and policemen than to be made the victims of a gang of interested prosecutors, who are actuated by the most sordid and unworthy motives. A contemporary states, that "it is no unfrequent proceeding for a police-constable to make his appearance in baker's clothes, dusted with flour from head to foot, or as a coalheaver in professional costume and coal-begrimed visage, and, by means of this disguise, to obtain an entry into some public-house, for the purpose of being able to give ocular evidence of what was passing within." Now, the case before us proves the truth of this statement in every particular. The following are the facts:—

Mr. James Weaver, landlord of the Bricklayers' Arms, was summoned by the police for keeping his house open during the hours of divine service.

Inspector Beresford said that by his orders two constables, in plain clothes, obtained admission into the defendant's house about a quarter before twelve o'clock on Sunday. Witness followed shortly afterwards, and found that the constables had been served with gin-and-water. Witness saw the landlord [illegible] stairs with two men.

Examined by Mr. Robinson: Had the authority of his superintendent for sending the constables about in plain clothes. Did not know whether the superintendent had any instructions on this point from the commissioners. The orders of the constables who went into the defendant's house were to disguise themselves so as not to be known for policemen. Did not tell them to assume the appearance of countrymen. Witness saw nothing in the house to indicate that anybody had been served with refreshments beyond what the police in disguise exhibited.

Police-sergeant Gibbs said he went to the defendant's house disguised in a fustian jacket and cap. He was admitted, and served with some gin. His brother constable was shortly afterwards admitted, and had also some gin. While there, there were several persons admitted and served with liquors.

Cross-examined. Did not say, in order to gain admission, that he was a countryman, as he had walked a long way, and required refreshment. Did not say, when his fellow-constable knocked, that he was a fellow-traveler, and had walked with him.

Mr. Robinson said he should show by his witnesses that the landlord had been entrapped by the police in a manner which he hoped, neither sanctioned nor police commissioners would sanction. The constables had gone to the defendant's house disguised as countrymen, and, on representing themselves to be tired travellers, they had induced the landlord, who knew that by the tenour of his licence he was bound to supply travellers with refreshment, to let them have a small quantity of gin.

George Miller said he was in the house when the inspector came in. Previously to this two men were admitted, one after the other, whom he afterwards learned were disguised policemen. The first person who was admitted said he was a countryman, and had walked along way that day. The man's appearance was that of a weary traveller, and his dress was like that of a person from the country. After he was served, another application for admission was made, and the first under-said thus was his fellow-traveller. No one but these two men were in the house or were served.

The son of the defendant also swore that the two policemen got admission into the house by representing themselves to be travellers, and by passing assumed the appearance of countrymen. No one was served except by witnesses, and witness could swear that no one except the disguised police were served with liquor.

Mr. Maltby said it was his duty to decide the case on the conflicting evidence before him, and, though there were discrepancies in small matters on both sides, yet each swore positively to circumstances which were diametrically opposed to each other. The police had sworn positively and directly to certain facts, and unless he could bring himself to believe that the witnesses, having so other bias than what the desire to do their duty might be supposed to create, had first conspired together against the defendant, and had afterwards come forward and committed unblushing and deliberate perjury, he must allow their evidence to stand unshaken. He would not pronounce any opinion on the evidence for the defence, as it was possible the parties who had spoken had not had so good an opportunity of seeing the whole of what had occurred as the police. He should, however, fine the defendant 40s. and costs.

Really we see no such perplexity in the case as that which appears to have confounded the judgment of the worthy magistrate; and, when we remember that the declaration was made from the bench by another magistrate last week, in the counterfeit coin case, which our readers will remember, we cannot hesitate in thinking that the age of "blood money" has returned, and that the conduct of these over-zealous constables requires increased vigilance on the part of the magistrates. We candidly acquit the police commissioners of being parties to this most unseeming and indecent conduct, and we trust that they will take measures to put a total stop to it. Let it not be supposed that we have here given an exaggerated or overdrawn statement of the existing state of things. These occurrences have already attracted the attention of influential and discerning persons, who are not likely to let the matter rest when once inquiry has been set on foot; and, if proof were required of the evils that must necessarily flow from this masquerading of justice, it will be found in the annexed observations, made by that active and intelligent magistrate, Sir Peter Laurie, at a meeting of the Marylebone vestry on Saturday last, with which, for the present, we conclude our notice of this painful and disagreeable subject:—

"He had a subject of considerable importance to bring before the vestry, and in which he had to ask their assistance. For a considerable period, and, indeed, since the introduction of the metropolitan police, a vast increase had been made in the county rate, in consequence of the enormous sum paid for the attendance of the police-constables at the Middlesex sessions. In addition to his pay as a policeman, each man for his attendance, in all cases at the sessions, had been in the habit of receiving 3s. 6d. per day out of the county rates. He (Sir Peter Laurie) had, after considerable persuasion, succeeded in convincing the bench of magistrates, sitting at Clerkenwell, of the pernicious effects of this system, and had effected a reduction of the amount to 2s. per day. It was his intention to persevere, if possible, in obtaining a further reduction of the amount payable to 1s., for it had been ascertained, in the most indisputable manner, that the high premium offered for the attendance of the police at the sessions had induced them to make and get up cases for the purpose of enabling themselves to the money (Cries of 'Shame'). He need not inform the vestry how much money would be saved out of a county rate of £200,000, and what a vast amount of saving, as well as benefit to the public, such an alteration would effect. Being aware that the vestry were in possession of much valuable data and information respecting the police, he hoped he should have the assistance of the vestry in the matter."

EPITOME OF NEWS.

During the firing of the royal salutes off Ostend last week the roar of the guns was heard distinctly at Aldeborough in Suffolk.——The Rev. Father Mathew arrived in Dublin on Saturday, after the completion of his first mission to England.——A Havre journal states, that on Saturday an innkeeper of Caen set out in pursuit of an English family who quitted his house without paying their bill, amounting to 800f. He found his debtors on the quay at Havre, and at once demanded his money. Some discussion arose, and continued for a few minutes, when all at once the unfortunate man, who had been much excited, was struck with apoplexy, and died in less than a minute.——The fourth quarterly statement of receipts for the session of 1844, are, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishops of Meath, Kildare, and Cashel.——A royal order has been published at Stade, announcing that the differential duty paid by Hanoverian vessels exporting coal from England, had been abolished by the Lords of the Treasury.——On Friday last a large cod fish, weighing 20lb., was caught near Balachulish. The captors on opening it imagined they had found a museum. A fishing-hook and ten yards of line, the ivory handle of a penknife, a small silver toothpick, and a brass breast-pin, were all found in its stomach. The fishermen refused 7s. 6d. for the fish and articles.——By a Parliamentary return lately published, it appears that from January, 1842, to June last, inclusive, 212 persons were confined for the non-payment of assessed taxes, some of whom are still in custody. The principal part were for game duty. Up to the date of the return not one person had been imprisoned for the non-payment of the income-tax.——The number of passengers passing through Boulogne, between the 8th and 14th of September, amounted to 2529; by way of Calais, 423; the proportion being—Folkestone, 1279; Dover, 440; Ramsgate, 181; London, 629: total, 2529.——In Copenhagen and Holstein the consumption of spirits is greater in Denmark amounts to four million gallons, which, with a population of 350 000 adult males, as according to the last census, would give an average of fifty-seven quarts per head, or about four times as much as the average consumption in Great Britain and Ireland. Father Mathew should discharge his mission immediately in the territory of the Danes.——The Royal Botanic Gardens at Kew are being enlarged by an addition of sixteen acres from the pleasure-grounds. The enclosure of the new part commenced last week.——Several inhabitants of West Hackney have just been distrained upon for payment of the church-building rate of the crowning parish of Hackney, a rate with which the parish has been burthened since the year 1790, and will continue to be till 1871.——The inhabitants of Plymouth, after a conference with Mr. Brunel and Mr. Saunders, of the Great Western Railway, have resolved on adopting the coast line of railway to communicate with their town.——The two English Quakers, Alexander and Wiffen, had arrived at Copenhagen, to convince the Danish Government of the expediency to abolish slavery in the Danish West India islands.——A phenomenon, as strange as it was frightful, is now the subject of conversation at St. Pierre, in the Oise. Two children have been carried off by a whirlwind in presence of their parents. The whole country, within a circumference of two leagues, has been visited, without any news being heard of them. It is feared they were carried into the river Oise.——On Tuesday was the anniversary of the birth of the loquacious and versatile Lord Brougham, his lordship having been born on the 29th of September, 1779.——A correspondent of the Société Belge de Librairie has written word that the atrocious practice, which has lately prevailed at Naples, of throwing inflammable matters on ladies' dresses in public walks, has caused several dreadful calamities. His own daughter, a fine young woman of eighteen, was burnt alive in the open day, in the middle of the Strada di Toledo.——A society has been established lately in Brighton for the suppression of Sunday trading. Many tradesmen now pay the men in their employment on Fridays instead of Saturdays, to enable them to go to market in time on the latter day.——Patrick M'Grath, confined in Waterford Gaol under a decree of the Court of Conscience, for a debt of twenty shillings, died on Monday in the prison, of consumption, accelerated by confinement.——At a meeting of the Neuagh poor-law guardians last week, the collector of rates handed in a list of defaulters, when, amongst the number, the Right Hon. General Lord Bloomfield figured to the heavy amount of twopence halfpenny.——The new dock at Ellesmere Port, or Whitby, which has just been completed, was formally opened on Wednesday. It is 435 feet in length and 139 feet wide.——Out of 208 pensioners inspected in a district in the west of Ireland, 100 have been declared effective and fit for duty.——The Moniteur publishes a report of the French Finance Minister, stating that he will need a supplement of 15,000,000 of francs to his budget. The China French station is to consist of two or three frigates. The French have fifty armed vessels afloat.——Reekie and Bird, the two persons named in the article on the frauds in the revenue, do not hold appointments in the London Dock Company, but in the revenue.——The circulars of Messrs. Hennessy and Co., of Cognac, state that there has been a considerable rise in the prices of French brandies, owing to the bad weather of the spring and summer months, although the present weather is very favourable for the vintage.——From "An Account of Inquests in the Borough of Birmingham in the year 1842," compiled from official documents, and just published in the Birmingham Journal, we learn that during the past year there have been twenty undoubted suicides in that town, and that of these fourteen belonged to the working classes. The proximate causes in "the great majority of these cases," have been ascertained to be "absolute want of employment;" and it is stated, on the best authority, that "this latter cause has been more painfully marked in the past than during either of the two preceding years."——At the meeting of the Horticultural Society on Wednesday, there were shown three Persian melons from the gardens of the Duke of Sutherland at Trentham, of the extraordinary weights respectively of 10lb. 5oz., 9lb. 13oz., and 9lb. 6oz. The resemblance of this fruit was very much that of the gourd.——Some of the retail London tradesdealers have given the public the benefit of the late fall in teas, by reducing the prices to the consumer from 4d. to 6d. in the pound: the fall in Dublin has been still more, being so much as 9d. per lb.——Mrs. Taylor, who has been confined for the last twelve months in Paisley gaol, on the charge of having poisoned her husband at Bowfield, near Lochwinnoch, has been liberated by an order from the Lord Advocate, who, after a careful perusal of her case, was satisfied that the prisoner could not be brought home to her.——On Tuesday, Hafod, with its magnificent domain and splendid mansion, and the beautiful estate and mansion of Cwmelan, on the banks of the Elan and Wye, with other properties, situate in the counties of Cardigan and Radnor, belonging to the Duke of Newcastle, were put up to auction by Mr. Smith; the quantity of land to be disposed of consisting of about 30,000 acres. Hafod was knocked down at £109 000. The sale of the other estates was postponed.——A young serjeant, in garrison at Orleans, shot himself last week to the heart. He had lost a bag containing 300 francs belonging to the regiment, and had requested his friends to make it good; but they being unable to do so, and fearing it might be thought he had stolen the money, he resolved to commit suicide rather than bear his dishonour.——On the 3rd instant, says Reuter's letter, two leagues from Jamina, some quantity of stones and water came down from the mountain, at the foot of which the village is situated, that 42 houses were completely destroyed. Two hundred persons perished, and the destruction of cattle was very great.——Curtis, the well-known pugilist, expired on Saturday night last, between eleven and twelve o'clock, after a most lingering and painful illness, at his residence, No. 4, Little Surrey-street, Blackfriars-road. It appears that he has been leading a very irregular and dissipated life for the last few years, and died in the greatest poverty and distress.——We understand that his Majesty the King of Prussia has been pleased to appoint Francis Turner Barrett, Esq., of the island of Madeira, and Lime-street, London, Royal Prussian Consul for the island of Madeira.——The steam-ship Acadia left the Mersey on Tuesday afternoon, for Halifax and Boston.——A body of the A division of police, under Serjeant Hawke, left by railway, on Tuesday morning, for Windsor.——On Wednesday, the annual election of commissioners took place in St. Martin-in-the-Fields, St. Clements, and other metropolitan districts.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—At the Bank of England meeting on Thursday, the half-yearly dividend was declared at 3½ per cent., to be ready by October 11. Just complaints have been made at the deduction of the income-tax from parties having less than £150 per annum, a measure to which, as a body corporate, the Bank directors did not like their seal, though the governor pleaded in extenuation the compulsion of an Act of Parliament. The trouble experienced by humble individuals, perhaps not possessing even £50 per annum, on claiming the return of the amount deducted, would doubtless have long since been remedied, but that their position is not sufficiently exalted to enable them to cause much serious annoyance to the Government, and it is satisfactory so far that a bank proprietor himself should have taken up their cause. The governor said he had no [illegible] to state that the court, in making the dividend of 3½ per cent., had, to the best of their judgment, wound back from the "rest" as £7167 17s. 10d., in order to make up the dividend. Considering the estate of the banking interest, and the difficulty which bankers had of realising profits, he hoped the proprietors would be satisfied with the result. There was a [illegible] in the "rest" in 1840 of £15,000; and in 1839 there was a [illegible] to that fund: the total increase within these few years had [illegible] so that of the £13,000 necessary for the present year's dividend were declared, there would still be a total increase upon the rest fund of something about £80,000 in the last four years.

THE MAYORALTY.—Alderman Magnay has declared his intention of becoming a candidate for the ensuing mayoralty, the resignation of Alderman Lanson having placed him in competition with Alderman T. Wood.

ELECTION OF AN ALDERMAN.—The election of an alderman for the ward of Bread-street, in the room of Mr. Lanson, retired from ill health, took place on Wednesday, when Mr. Lawrence was declared elected by a majority of seven over his opponent: the numbers being—For Mr. Lawrence, 97; Mr. Hughes Hughes, 89. A scrutiny has been demanded on behalf of the defeated candidate.

GENERAL NOGUERAS.—It will be remembered that some weeks ago we published a letter from Lord Palmerston denouncing General Nogueras, one of the Spanish refugees now in London, as the murderer of Cabrera's mother, and consequently unfit to be present at the civic entertainment given to the Spanish generals by the corporation of London. The following is the general's reply:—"41, York street, Portman-square, Sept. 16, 1843. Sir,—I have just been informed by a friend that in the Times of the 6th inst. you have published a letter addressed to the Lord Mayor, and a guard banelagh,' stating that I ordered the execution of Cabrera's mother. Had this false assertion been published in Spain, I should have despised it, and remained silent; but in England, where I have received the most generous hospitality, my honour will not permit me to let it run without contradiction, assuring you that Cabrera's mother was neither imprisoned nor shot by my orders, nor consequently executed in my presence then, as now, the town of Tortosa, where the execution took place, belonged to the military district of Catalonia, in which I never held the least command during the civil war sustained against Don Carlos. It was another general who ordered the trial and execution, and neither have I to take on myself the responsibility of its acts, nor the denunciation of his name. I beg, in consequence, you will be kind enough to insert these few lines in your valuable paper, a favour which will be duly appreciated by your obedient servant. I have the honour to be, Sir, your humble servant, AGUSTIN NOGUERAS."—On the Lord Banelagh has replied by reiterating his statement, and adducing in proof thereof General Mina to do so, as the following extract from Mina's letter, dated March 15, 1836, will show:—"It happened at this time that the petition of General Nogueras reached me, suppleciamo me to put the wounded (Cabrera's mother) to death, on account of her son's having atrociously assassinated the authorities of four different towns.' Your obedient servant, BANELAGH."—A correspondence has taken place between Lord John Hay and the Marquis of Granby on the subject of the reports circulated, to the effect that the former noble lord had accused Lord Banelagh of firing at the British flag during the siege of Bilbao in 1836, when the forces under Lord John's command were co-operating with her Catholic Majesty's army for the relief of that town. Lord John Hay says—"It never was reported to me that his lordship either fired at the British flag or came in immediate conflict with it."? The report, in fact, does not appear to have any foundation whatever.

GENERAL ESPARTERO.—On Monday last the garrison and town of Woolwich presented throughout the day an animated spectacle, commencing at an early hour, in consequence of the visit of General Espartero, the Duchess of Victory, the Donna Edita Espartero, General Van Halen, Count of Perecamps, Captain-General Don Noguerus, Don Cipliano Montesino, secretary to General Espartero; and a number of other Spanish officers. Guard-mounting took place at the Warren at six o'clock, as it usedto of ten o'clock, the usual hour. At nine o'clock experiments were carried on at the mortar battery with 54-inch fusees, and 13-inch shells, conducted by Lieut.-Colonel Dunlop, R.A., and Lieut.-Colonel Chalmer. At half-past ten o'clock the Royal Horse Artillery, under the command of Lieut.-Colonel Cobbe, and the field batteries, under the command of Colonel Cleveland, assembled on the common, and shortly before eleven o'clock Lord General Lord Bloomfield arrived on the ground, accompanied by Colonel Lacy, Lieut. Colonel Blackley, and Brigade Major Cuppage, and were joined by Lieut.-Col. Wylde, C.B., Lieut.-Col. Colquhoun, and Lieut. Turner, officers who had served in Spain under General Espartero, and who were decorated with a profusion of Spanish orders, conferred upon them by Queen Isabella as a reward for their services. Major Lynn, of the Royal Engineers, who also distinguished himself in the Spanish service, was present, decorated with his orders conferred upon him by the Queen of Spain. At precisely eleven o'clock General Espartero arrived, and after the usual ceremonies of introduction, left the Duchess and her niece in the care of Lady Bloomfield and her daughter, and, mounting on horseback, with his suite, joined the staff of British officers. Hasty-hop, the Commandant, Colonel Cleveland, Lieut.-Colonel Cobbe, Lieut.-Colonel Wylde, Lieut.-Colonel Blackley, officers of the Royal Horse Artillery, and the three troops of Horse Artillery, marched past at a slow pace, the officers named joining Genera. Espartero on passing the flagstaff. The field batteries passed in a similar manner under the command of Major Wood. When the troops dismounted their guns, General Espartero, with his officers, all dressed in plain clothes, and Lord Bloomfield, with the splendid staff of officers accompanying, went up and congratulated Lieut.-Colonel Cobbe and the officers, non-commissioned officers, and men under his command, on their soldierlike appearance and efficiency. The troops then marched past again at a slow pace to their barracks. The whole of the party afterwards visited the Repository grounds, and all the other departments of the garrison; and on entering the Rotunda appeared delighted with the models and beautiful specimens of all kinds of arms ever used in the British service, and other objects of interest connected with the military and naval departments of this great country. General Espartero was evidently gratified with the attention paid to him during the day. On seeing Sergeant Ormrod, of the Royal Artillery, who has the charge of the muskets, he recognised him as an old soldier who had served under him in Spain, and shook hands wi h him, inquiring at the same time how he and his old comrades were. Sergeant Ormrod was decorated with the medals of the cross of Isabella and Bilbao, sent to him by the Queen of Spain. On Tuesday morning, shortly before twelve, General Espartero, accompanied by his secretary, the Duchess of Victory, and Donna Edita Espartero, arrived at the Mansion House, and were received by the Lord and Lady Mayoress. The whole collation was prepared for the illustrious visitors, but such was their anxiety to proceed to view the Bank, &c., that they would not remain to partake of his lordship's hospitality. Shortly after twelve o'clock, during the sitting of the Common Council, the Lord Mayor's party arrived at Guil hall, and were received by the Lord Mayor, the Duchess of Victory, leaning on his lordship's arm, and the rest of the party, attended by Alderman Sir J. Paris and Alderman Kelly, were conducted into the grand hall, to the aldermen's room, council chamber, freedom office, library, reading-room, &c. On leaving, the Lord Mayor handed the Duchess into his own carriage, the rest of the party followed, and were driven to the Royal Mint, and after a short stay proceeded to the Bank of England, where they were received by W. Cotton, Esq., the Governor, and the Directors. The visitors were afterwards shown into the printing-room, the chief cashier's-room, and the treasury. The party retired through the Rotunda to the gate in Lothbury, where their carriage was in waiting.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—We are enabled to state that this theatre will open for the season on Saturday week, the 30th inst. The performances will be the opera of the "Siege of Rochelle," to introduce Mademoiselle Albertazzi, which will be followed by the new ballet of "La Péri." Monsieur Corallí, the ballet master, has been rehearsing it ad the week; and Carlotta Grisi, Monsieur Petipa, Mademoiselle Galbo, Stephan, and others will be here on Monday. It is computed that this will be the most beautiful production of the Parisian stage, and the scenery of it will be painted by three of the eminent artists, the Messrs. Grieve.

ROYAL SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—On Tuesday the Royal South London Floricultural Society held their third and last exhibition at these gardens. There was on the occasion a captivating assemblage of all the choice, rare, and beautiful. The dahlias were surpassingly rich, splendid, and varied, and the display of fruit and flowers elicited the most unqualified approbation. Upwards of 70 gold and silver medals were awarded, exclusive of Mr. Sharp's £10 premium for the best white dahlia, and Mr. Cowan's prizes for bloom lancifolium. A grand musical festival and splendid Indian fire-works added to the attractions of the scene.

ARRIVAL OF THE INDIA MAILS.—A very numerous meeting of merchants and others interested in the commercial intercourse with and from India, China, Australia, Ceylon, &c., was held on Tuesday in the Hall of Commerce, Threadneedle-street, Mr. J. A. Smith in the chair. A number of resolutions were adopted to the effect that the present slow and expensive mode of transmitting the mails via Egypt was imperfect, as not allowing an answer by the return mail, and that vessels of greater power and speed should be employed. The resolutions were forwarded to the Premier of the Cabinet was also adopted, and ordered to be transmitted to those functionaries by the chairman.

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' SCHOOL.—On Tuesday a meeting of the governors, committee, and subscribers of the institution was held at the school-house, Kennington-lane, Mr. Kearsley in the chair. Mr. Blake, the secretary, having read the minutes of the last meeting, and the report of the committee of management, an election for admission to the school took place, when, from nearly one hundred candidates, eighteen boys and twelve girls were elected and declared duly elected, which will leave but about one hundred and fifty children on the establishment, where they are prepared by a sound moral and religious education to fill situations adapted to their abilities. This is one of the most excellent institutions of the laudable charities in the metropolis. The recipients of its bounty are reared up as respectable tradesmen's children, with plain substantial and genteel clothing, and are undistinguished by any of those harsh equipments, by which some institutions delight in rendering their inmates ridiculous.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—Mr. Cubitt has comple road from Belgrave-square, through Eaton, Chester, Ebe and St. George's squares, to the river. At the end of S square he intends to erect a splendid chain-pier, to be called St. George's Pier, from a design of Mr. Brunel.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—ST. MATTHEW'S DAY.—Thursday last, being St. Matthew's Day, in accordance with an ancient custom, the usual attendance of the civic authorities at divine service at Christ's Church, Newgate-street, was observed with the usual formalities, and the examination of, and delivery of orations by, the pupils of Christ's Hospital took place. At ten o'clock the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, accompanied by the Sheriffs of London (Messrs. Hooper and Pilcher), the Town Clerk of London (Mr. Sergeant Merewether), the Aldermen and Governors of the several Royal Hospitals having arrived, proceeded to the church in procession, when, the usual prayers having been read, a sermon was preached by the Rev. Nathaniel Reymer, M.A. At the conclusion of the sermon, which was characterised by the greatest fervour of observing days dedicated to saints, the Lord Mayor, accompanied by the distinguished persons before mentioned, repaired to that part of the institution styled the counting-house, having partaken of refreshments, &c., proceeded to the great hall, for the purpose of hearing the orations delivered. At 11 the Duke of Victory (Espartero) and suite shortly afterwards arrived, together with several other distinguished foreigners, who having taken seats provided for their accommodation, the proceedings commenced. The orations delivered were as follow:—On the benefits of the Royal Hospitals, by the four senior scholars, who were proceeding to the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, viz., in Latin, by Mr. J. G. Hawkesworth, the author of Augustus S. Harrison; in Greek, by Mr. A. Chubb; in French, by Mr. G. Pace. The other seven scholars recited the following odes and poems: A Latin Alcæus on Scipio at Carthage, by Mr. Rumbo on Satan's address to the Sun; an Eulogium on the Duke of Wellington, by Yeysey and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Governor of Christ's Hospital, delivered the general prize [illegible] Latin [illegible] the Royal [illegible] delivered [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Mr. [illegible] delivered the orations, and were much applauded only by a small number of the spectators. At four o'clock the proceedings terminated.

COUNTRY NEWS.

RUDDLEY.—MELANCHOLY COACH ACCIDENT.—On Saturday morning last, as the Red Rover coach was coming from Ludlow to Bridgnorth, when within a mile and a half of the latter town, the fore axle-tree broke; the coach was very heavily loaded, and the whole of the passengers were violently precipitated to the ground, receiving more or less severe bruises. One gentleman, a Mr. Thomas, of Camberwell, Surrey, received such injury, by the coach falling upon him, that he was obliged to be carried to the Whitehead Inn, Ruddley, where he expired about two o'clock on Sunday morning. The deceased was a native of Ludlow, aged 57. An inquest was held on the body on Tuesday afternoon, when the jury returned the following verdict:—Accidental death, with a deodand of £10 on the coach, and we regret that we cannot fix the deodand on the culpable parties, the axletree makers."

CARLISLE.—John Brown, the manager of the Carlisle and City District Bank, a few days ago absented himself from the bank, under circumstances which have excited suspicion, and the directors to-day (Monday) have felt it their duty to inform the shareholders and the public, by printed bills, of the fact. Since his departure, the directors have carefully investigated the books, securities, and vouchers; and at the same time they have communicated with their London and other agents, and, from what they have been able to make out, they find everything correct, with the exception that Mr. Brown's own cash account has been overdrawn to the amount of £2534 9s. 3d., with which sum, it is thought, he has decamped.

ISLE OF MAN.—EXTRAORDINARY ESCAPE OF SIX CRIMINALS.—On the morning of the 13th inst. a lad named Hughes, who was confined as a prisoner in Castle Rushen, in the Isle of Man, contrived to effect his escape, first to the roof, and afterwards into the room below, by means of blankets and sheets which he ingeniously fastened together. After this perilous feat, he proceeded to liberate the other prisoners, five in number, by wrenching the bolts, bars and fastenings off the doors of their cells; and then came the grand difficulty how to escape from the island. This they effected with a skill and decision no way inferior to those manifested in the commencement of their enterprise. Some of the men at Mr. Gawne's had given the boat constantly on the beach, at the southern end of the rabbit warren, and where the stream that passes Kentraug enters the sea. Thither they repaired, and succeeded in launching this smallest one. They had stored her with a quantity of fish, which they found drying at the doors of different cottages in their line of march, and had taken in a pig trough for a tank, and supplied themselves with oars and sprit, whether they had come by them otherwise, we believe, manifesting any very nervous concern as to title or priority of right. Fortune seemed to have smiled upon her adopted darlings, for they had not scarcely gotfairly afloat in the bay, than they discovered Mr. Gawne's fine large pleasure-boat at anchor. Here they found everything to their entire satisfaction; they therefore transhipped their fish, and abandoned the small boat, and from the latest intelligence received from our correspondent at the Calf, Mr. Shepherd, we learn that he saw them sparshing away past the Chickens with a brisk breeze and a flowing sheet, in a manner unknown in Ireland.

LIVERPOOL.—FORGERY AND DETECTION OF THE OFFENDER.—A plan of obtaining money by means of forged letters of credit was detected at Liverpool on Tuesday last, and the offender placed in custody. His name is Henry Eastland, alias James F. Bentley. It appears that on Saturday last he called at the shop of Mr. Isaacs, printer, in Castle-street, and ordered 100 copies of a blank letter of credit to be subscribed on the following morning. They purported to be for the county of Gloucester Bank. The order was duly executed, and he paid Mr Isaacs the sum of 12s., which was demanded for the work. In the forenoon of the following day (Monday) he likewise called at Messrs. Franklin's, bullion-brokers, Lord-street, with one of the orders, filled up for £25, dated Cheltenham, Sept. 16, addressed to "Sir John Williams Lubbock, Bart., and Co., bankers, London," and requesting to be drawn in favour of "Mr. James F. Bentley" by "Edward Frampton," manager of the County of Gloucester Bank. His order was discounted, but when the main signature came under inspection after the bank was duly opened, which led them to compare Mr. Frampton's signature on the fraudulent document with that upon one which was undoubtedly genuine. The fraud was then detected, and Messrs. Franklin, conceiving that several attempts had be made elsewhere, among other parties, for information to Messrs. London and Liaff, bullion-brokers, in Waterloo-road. It happened that the proper one had called there on the previous day (Monday), and when he returned with the cheque, he was taken into custody. From the documents found upon him, he appears to have been residing in Canada and the United States; and one of his papers had written upon it some scores of times Edward Frampton," as if he had been practising the imitation of that gentleman's signature. The prisoner underwent a preliminary examination before the magistrates on Tuesday, and was remanded for further evidence.

MANCHESTER.—William Carnes, alias Simons, and Jemmy, who was apprehended and brought before the borough magistrates last week, on the charge of procuring money by forged bills of exchange, was again placed at the bar on Monday morning, but, owing to the illness of Mr. Beswick, chief superintendent of police, was further remanded till Wednesday next.

SOUTHAMPTON.—This port having become the royal mail packet station, the first mail, consisting of fifty four large bags for the various West India ports, arrived on Monday by the eleven o'clock down train, and were instantly conveyed to the new jetty, and from thence shipped on board the Royal West India Mail packet the Teviot. A numerous assemblage of persons were on the pier to witness the embarkation of the first mails from the port of Southampton. The Teviot was saluted by thirteen guns from the platform; as also from the Royal Yacht Station-boats, as she passed out of the Sun hotel. The Teviot takes out between thirty and forty passengers. All the establishment formerly belonging to the mail packet station at Falmouth has been removed.—The Little Liverpool went out of dock, upon her outward voyage to Gibraltar, &c., on Saturday.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SHOCKING OCCURRENCE.—On Monday an accident, likely to be attended with serious results, occurred to the driver of a coal waggon, named Richard Chambers, while conducting his team along the archway, under the Adelphi Shades. One of the horses having fallen, the driver endeavoured to encourage him; and while the animal was struggling to get up, he gave him such a tremendous kick in the body that absolutely swept him off the pavement. On his descent it was found that several of his ribs were broken.

DARING OUTRAGE.—On Saturday evening the following daring outrage was committed at Pentonville. Between eight and nine o'clock, as a lady named Townsend, residing at No. 5, Claremont-square, Pentonville, was walking along the street within a few yards of her own residence, she was met by an individual having the appearance of a Lascar, and on passing him she felt herself suddenly wounded by some sharp instrument on the right thigh. Mrs. Townsend, as soon as she could recover herself, pursued the ruffian, but he succeeded in effecting his escape before she could obtain the assistance of a policeman. On examining the dress, it was found that the knife had passed through her clothes and penetrated the flesh to some depth. The perpetrator of the outrage is described as being a man of colour, dressed in a red and black cap, which fell close to his head, and a red tunic with white sleeves, which reaches to his k ACCIDENT BY FIRE.—On Wednesday afternoon, about three o'clock, the cry of fire was heard to proceed from a house in Pleasant-row, Horsemonger-row, St. George's-road, Southwark, when it was discovered that the pinafore of a boy, about nine years of age, had caught fire, and he was enveloped in flames. Another boy about the same age was with him at the time, and endeavoured to stop its progress, but without avail, and in so doing burnt his hands severely. At length the unfortunate lad received aid, but not before he was so dreadfully injured that he was on the instant conveyed to the hospital, where he now lies in a very dangerous state.

FRIGHTFUL ACCIDENT.—On Monday morning one of those many dreadful occurrences which happen through the culpable neglect of parents, took place in Crown-court, Little Russell-street, Covent-garden. Little Carl, the child of a person connected with the police force, named Rea, had been left to amuse herself at a first-floor window, when she fell into the area, a descent of about twenty-five feet, by which her skull was fractured and other severe injuries inflicted, so as to leave no hope of recovery BURGLARY IN THE CITY.—Information was given at Bow-street, on Monday morning, that the premises of Messrs. Wood and Co., of 89, Wood-street, Cheapside, was broken open on Saturday, and several articles of apparel stolen. A reward of £5 is offered for the apprehension and conviction of the offenders.

TRAP DOORS OPEN.—A serious accident occurred to a man, named Joseph Church, on Monday morning, in a coffee-shop in High-row, Kensington-gravel-pit-lane, Hammersmith-bridge. While proceeding through the passage, he was thrown down a trap-door which had been incautiously left open, but which he did not see, and was precipitated with considerable violence into the cellar below. He was speedily conveyed to St. George's Hospital, where it was discovered that he had sustained a shocking fracture of the leg. Several persons have recently sustained serious accidents by this description of negligence; to some of whom the result has been fatal, while others have been for life.

DARING HIGHWAY ROBBERY.—On Sunday last, in the middle of the day, as a gentleman was walking along the highroad between the village of Bedfont and the Staines union workhouse, he was stopped by a man, who came up to him and demanded his money, at the same moment striking him a violent blow on the back of his head, which knocked him down; and, before he had recovered his senses, the robber had succeeded in effecting his escape with the gentleman's coat, which, owing to the intense heat of the weather, he was carrying on his arm.

FIRE IN BERMONDSEY.—Between twelve and one o'clock, on Tuesday morning, a fire broke out in the lower part of the premises now in course of erection in the Greyhound-road, the property of J. Keeley, Esq. The station engines were soon brought, and being copiously supplied with water from an adjacent ditch, a powerful stream was poured upon the fire, and happily it was extinguished before any damage was done further than by thirty-five destruction of the wood-work on the premises. It is rather a singular circumstance, that during the last month no fewer than three fires have occurred in buildings in course of erection.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.—One of the South-western trains from Woking was on Sunday evening for about an hour and three quarters, by the bursting of the boiler, detained in the neighbourhood of Weybridge station, and another engine had to be sent for back to Woking, and the defective one removed. Some hundreds were thus thrown out of their regular course, as the train which should have been at Nine Elms by thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock, did not reach there till twenty-five minutes past nine.

SACRILEGE.—Wednesday's Government Police Gazette contains the offer of £15 reward for the discovery and apprehension of the person or persons who, on the 18th instant, feloniously broke into and entered the parish church of St. Meldon, Cornwall, and stole the following communion plate therefrom, viz.:—A silver tankard, marked "the gift of Sir William Coryetone, Bart., of Youlston, to the parish church of St Meldon, March 25, 1745;" a silver cup, marked "the gift of Lady Jemima Coryetone to the parish church of St. Meldon, March 25, 1742;" a cup, marked "the gift of Lady Elizabeth Coryetone, March 25," date uncertain; a silver plate, marked "the gift of Lady Sarah Coryetone, March 26;" and a silver plate, not marked—altogether weighing 115 ounces REPORTED DEATH OF GENERAL JACKSON.—A Philadelphia paper of the 26th of August, announces in positive terms, the death of the former President of the United States. The following is the announcement: "Decease of General Jackson.—This truly great man is now numbered with the dead. He departed this life about the 22nd instant, of h morrhage of the lungs. Many were the friends and many the enemies that he had during a long life devoted to the service of his country. The grave bores not only human friendship but human enmity. Men will forget party, and unite in doing honour and paying just tribute, and awarding fame and glory, to the hero of New Orleans. Long was he opposed to 'the wild Indian;' and many have been the dangers to which he has been placed both when in the tented field, and when he filled the executive chair of the United States. His miraculous escape from assassination by a maniac, must be fresh in the memory of all. He was re-elected to the presidency, and his name and his opinions are hailed by the democratic party with veneration and respect."

POSTSCRIPT.

WINDSOR, Thursday.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert and the royal suite arrived at the Castle about one o'clock this afternoon, having travelled from town viâ Great Western Railway. An escort of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards, under the command of the Earl of Munster, attended the royal party to the Castle from the Slough station. The Princesses arrived at the Castle from the Pavilion at Brighton at half-past three o'clock. Their Royal Highnesses were attended by the Earl of Hardwicke, Lord in Waiting on her Majesty, and Dr. Prætorius.

SOUTH WALES.—The state of affairs in South Wales still wears an ill-boding aspect; indeed matters appear to grow more serious since the collision between the military and Rebeccaites at the Pontarduais toll-bar. A party of the 76th Foot marched from Swansea on Tuesday for Aberayron, Cardiganshire, where their presence is needed. A body of 100 men police also arrived at Swansea on Wednesday morning en route for Carmarthenshire. A body of 200 additional infantry are also expected from Plymouth to proceed to the disturbed districts. Indeed, it is now openly reported, and the opinion hourly gains strength, that it is intended to place Carmarthenshire and Cardiganshire under martial law. Nothing can exceed the exasperation expressed by all classes of the people as this idea gains ground.

IRELAND.—At an early hour on Wednesday morning a fire broke out in a house in Essex-quay, Dublin, by which two elderly women lost their lives; one, it is supposed, was suffocated in bed by the dense smoke by which she was surrounded; and the second died by fracturing her limbs, in throwing herself from a window into the street, to escape the flames.

EXTRAORDINARY DISCOVERY AT NEWINGTON.—A few days ago a gentleman, named Fawney, applied to the sitting magistrate at Union-hall, stating that the coffin containing the remains of his late father had been stolen from their family vault, adjoining the chapel of St. John, in Weststreet, Walworth. Some suspicions were entertained against the son of the informant, who is gone to Brussels. His father, however, undertook to produce him in a few days, and thus the matter was allowed to stand over.—On Thursday Mr. Fawney received such further information as to cause him to apply for a search warrant, to search the house of Mr. Bridgeman, and also the burial-ground, and, extraordinary to relate, a leaden coffin was found some distance from the vault, about six inches from the surface, it was filled with earth, and at the foot were an immense quantity of human bones, but not the lid was missing. On Friday morning a warrant was granted for the apprehension of Mr. Bridgeman, senior, but he was not, when this account was written, in custody. It would be next to impossible to describe the sensation which the above discovery has created throughout the parish. On Friday afternoon the grave-digger received orders to open the grave in which a young lady was buried in December last; and it is expected this step will be generally followed up by the relatives and friends of persons recently interred.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—FRIDAY.—Thomas Mortlock and William Penfold, both letter carriers—convicted, the former of stealing a post letter containing two sovereigns, and the latter several letters, one of which contained a £5 note. Sentence to be passed on the diamonds—reserved the sentence of the court. Penfold was sentenced to transportation for life, and Mortlock for 15 years.

Edward Hemingway and Edward Hewingway the younger, father and son, convicted on their own confession of forging a will, were sentenced to be transported for life.

CASE OF BARNARD GREGORY.—Mr. Bodkin prayed judgment on Bernard Gregory, in the case of the indictment for libel on Mr. Vallance, to which he had pleaded guilty; but, with respect to the libel on the Duke of Brunswick, he did not wish sentence to be passed till next session, as his Royal Highness wished to file affidavits, which he could not do at present.—Mr. Justice Erskine said, that he and his brother Cresswell had determined to defer judgment in both cases at one and the same time; and, as the Duke of Brunswick had not had time to propose counter-affidavits, the court had determined to postpone the sentence on both indictments till next session. His recognizances were then respited to the next session.

POLICE.—HAMMERSMITH.—Thomas Arabbins Talbot, calling himself the Hon. Thomas Talbot, cousin of the Earl of Shrewsbury, was brought up by a warrant on a charge of bigamy, with Elizabeth Talbot, his alleged wife.—Mr. Archbutt, solicitor, of Sloane-square, attended on behalf of the male prisoner.—Mr. Paynter asked, as the name given by the prisoner at the first examination was an assumed one, what his real name was.—Edmead called evidence to prove that the prisoner's real name was Thomas Eely.—Mr. Paynter said, the prisoner had been guilty of a most absurd assumption of a title to which he had no title. He should further remand him until Thursday next, on the charge of stealing Mr. Peasley's new coat.—Mr. Archbutt applied for the prisoner to be admitted to bail.—Mr. Paynter said, he was unable to take bail at the present stage of the proceedings. The prisoner must go back to the New Prison, Clerkenwell, until Thursday next.—Elizabeth Talbot was then placed at the bar, and,—Mr. Paynter, addressing her, said, she was brought up on Tuesday last, she had said she was the wife of the male prisoner, and that she had been married to him six years. It was now clear that she could not have been married to him so long, as she wished to know if she still persisted that she was his wife.—The prisoner, after some consideration, admitted that she was not the male prisoner's wife, but declined giving any other name than the one she had given.—Constable Edmead said her husband was then in court, having hastened down to see seeing the reports of her appearance in the newspapers, she having about nine months since eloped from her residence in Kent with the prisoner; and from the inquiries he had made he fully believed that both the prisoner and her husband were most respectable connected.—The prisoner was then fully committed to Newgate for trial.—While at the bar, after the officer had stated that her husband was in court, her eye was continually observed to wander over the crowd in order to obtain a glimpse of him, and, on leaving the bar, seeing him near her, she put out her hand to him, which he at first took no notice of, but eventually he took it and shook it, and the unfortunate woman, whose manners were most feminine, burst into a passionate flood of tears, and was with difficulty led out of the court

FOREIGN.

PARIS, Sept. 20.—(From our own Correspondent.)—The following are the latest accounts from Spain:

BARCELONA, Sept. 12.—The Central Junta has issued a proclamation, declaring all individuals who take up arms against the insurrection as traitors to their country, and to be instantly shot, and the same penalty to be inflicted on all those who promulgate false reports, tending to encourage the traitors, and cool the enthusiasm of the defenders of the nation. It is severely prohibited to send provisions out of the town.

Prim continues inactive at Gracia. Five serjeants from Fort Montjuic and a serjeant and three officers from Fort Hercemonte have joined the insurgents. The National Guards of Barcelona have hoisted the flag of the Central Junta. Colonel Martel has received orders from the Junta to organise two batteries of artillery, to operate with the division commanded by Antiche, now stationed at Martorell. Don Gregorio Valenciencio has been named by the Junta Governor of Barcelona and Tarragona.

BARCELONA, September 14th.—The Junta has given full satisfaction to the French consul, and has promised that the post which fired on the seaman of the Méléagre should immediately be put on his trial. The commandant of Fort Atarazanas has given orders not to fire on disarmed men.

MADRID, Sept. 16th.—The elections commenced yesterday at Madrid. The Opposition had a majority in seven bureaux out of nineteen. The capital was tranquil on the 16th.

FRANCE.—In my last I noticed that a species of conspiracy had been discovered in Paris, and that several persons had been arrested. Since then some arms and a flag have been seized, and a proclamation addressed to the people, and the persons arrested, the greater part men out of work, is an officer formerly in the army

The celebrated statuarist, Gerard, died on the 16th, aged 84 years. He executed many of the statues in the Tuileries, Louvre, Palais Royal, and the Triumphal Arch, Champs Elysées.

PARIS, Sept. 21.—The news from Barcelona is delayed by the swollen state of the rivers. Still it was known that on the 15th Prim demanded troops of Areas, threatening to return if they were not sent. The latter gave him 2000 men; Prim had 2000 more; and he marched with them to attack Amettler. A recontre between them was expected to take place on the 18th. Senor Olozaga would arrive at Paris positively on Saturday. The Madrid Gazette of the 16th orders Amettler to be proceeded against with severity. There were 460 votes on the first day of the elections, of which 265 were for the coalition of Moderados and Partisa estarnos, 215 for Infantista and Old Liberals. There had been some troubles at Grenada.

THE BRAZILS.—FALMOUTH, Sept. 20.—The Petrel packet, Lieut and Crooke, arrived off here this afternoon, from the Brazils, and lands her mails. Left Rio July 21. Freight, £25,000 nominally. Mr. Oliveira, and five strange passengers, are come by her. Her letters are not sorted for this dispatch. The affairs in the Brazils appear to be in the same state in every respect. Exchange, 25d. Coffee, superior, in good demand; an increase of 71,956 bags on the crop of last year. Sugar, none in the market, Stock, Six per Cents, 71¾ to 72.

crowded with merry-makers; and perhaps a more lively, gratifying, and pleasurable scene was never witnessed in this city.

VISIT TO ANTWERP.

On Monday night the Court slept at Laeken, and at half-past two o'clock on Tuesday proceeded to Antwerp. On arriving at Mechlin, a halt necessarily took place, which lasted about three minutes, in the course of which the Cardinal Archbishop, the Burgomaster, and other ecclesiastical, military, and civil authorities of the place, had the honour of paying their respects to her Majesty the Queen of England and her illustrious consort. A very beautiful corbeille of the choicest flowers was also presented to her Majesty by Mdlle. Keteleers, the daughter of one of the sheriffs, accompanied by a bevy of beautiful young girls, between ten and fourteen years of age.

The royal party arrived at Antwerp at three o'clock. King Leopold and his Queen were in the best spirits, and during the passage towards the pa are pointed out to our Sovereign several of the remarkable features of this old and interesting city, the birthplace of Rubens, and the scene of many interesting events in the history of a former age. The hurrahs of the spectators, both in the streets and at the windows of the houses, were enthusiastic. At the windows were the élite of the female society of the city, and certainly a better show of the beauties of Belgium could not have been got up.

A squadron of the Lancers formed the escort—a fine body of men, well mounted, well equipped, and of a most martial appearance. The Chasseurs and their band were also in attendance, which, with the cavalry band, lent the aid of warlike music to celebrate this triumph of peace.

On reaching the palace their Majesties and the Prince alighted, and entered, King Leopold handing in our Queen, and Prince Albert performing that courtesy for the Queen of the Belgians. The rest of the party immediately followed, amidst the cheering of the great concourse of persons collected in front of the building; also Major-General Aaoul, Commandant of the province and Inspector-General of the Gendarmes; M. Teichman, Inspector of Bridges, &c.; M. Visquain, and a deputation of the engineers, &c.

The guns discharged on the arrival of her Majesty and the Belgic Sovereigns were from the bridge of Laeken. A salvo of 100 rounds was fired.

The royal dinner at the palace was more private than that at Brussels on the previous day, only twenty-four covers being laid, which were devoted to the use of the members of the royal families of England and Belgium, and the highest officers of the respective governments and households. The dining-room was a very small and plain apartment, with panelled walls, and lighted up with a single chandelier of wax-lights, and five small candelabra on the table. The Queens of England and Belgium sat in the middle places at the table, facing the windows. To the left of Queen Victoria was King Leopold; and to the right of the Queen of the Belgians was Prince Albert.

The most remarkable dress at table was that of Queen Victoria: it consisted of a rich scarlet robe, a necklace of magnificent pearls, and a bandeau of green leaves on her head. The Queen of the Belgians was attired simply and in good taste. Prince Albert wore a field-marshal's uniform. The King was in military uniform. The officers of state were in their respective uniforms. The other members of the household dined at a separate table below. Two military bands played at intervals in the court-yard of the palace throughout the evening.

The illumination at night was even more magnificent than at Brussels. The Place Verte, the Town-hall, and all the public edifices, were each one blaze of light; the streets were as bright as day from end to end; and the sublime spire of the cathedral, receiving the rays from these countless fires, rose in bold relief against the dark sky, elaborated in its minutest details. Besides the illumination in the town, all the steamers and Belgium gunboats in the river were lighted up with blue lights; and a display of fireworks took place, which lasted upwards of an hour.

DEPARTURE OF THE QUEEN FOR ENGLAND.

At one o'clock, on Wednesday, the Queen and Prince Albert stepped on board the royal yacht, accompanied by King Leopold and his royal consort, who went with their royal relatives as far as Liefkenshoet, a small place about eight miles down the river, where they subsequently landed, and returned to Antwerp in a royal steam boat of Belgium. The royal yacht, followed by the other steamers, made her way gallantly down the river; her tall masts, bearing the standards of England and Belgium, being seen for a long distance over the low country which prevails in this part of the world. It was expected, in many quarters, that the royal squadron would have halted at Flushing, in order to afford the King of Holland an opportunity of paying a complimentary visit to our amiable and gracious Queen; but the Victoria and Albert did not even slacken her engines in passing this place, to the great disappointment of many persons who had assembled to catch a glimpse of her Majesty, and particularly of some officials who had come purposely to present their respects to her Majesty and her royal consort. Amongst the latter were Sir Alexander Ferrier, the British Consul at Rotterdam, and Mr. Ellinckhuysen, of Middlesburg, the Vice-Consul for Zealand (the latter in full official costume), who had actually put off in a boat in the hope of being allowed an opportunity of paying homage to her Majesty, but had to return disappointed.

The saluting and cheering at Flushing was upon a magnificent scale. Royal salutes were fired from the Dutch frigate of war the Maes, Captain Koop, and from the batteries of Flushing, as well as that of Fort Frederick Hendric at Breskens, on the opposite or left bank of the river.

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY.

On Thursday morning, at ten minutes to eleven, her Majesty and Prince Albert landed at Woolwich Dockyard, under a royal salute, fired from the batteries and the different steamers in the river.

Her Majesty was received by Sir F. Collier, the Captain Superintendent of the Dockyard, and the other principal officers. Great preparations had been made to hail her Majesty's return; and the house forming the road on each side were tastefully decorated with flags and devices formed of flowers. The landing-place was covered with rich crimson cloth. Her Majesty acknowledged the respectful congratulations of those officers of the Arsenal, Garrison, and Dockyard, who had the honour of approaching her person. The line of road was thronged by well-dressed persons, who loudly cheered her Majesty as she passed. The Greenwich pensioners were drawn out in front of the building; the boys of the Asylum manned the model ship recently finished, and their band played "God save the Queen" as her Majesty passed by. The road was kept clear by the horse police. Her Majesty and Prince Albert rode in an open carriage, escorted by a detachment of Hussars. The Hon. Miss Canning and another lady accompanied her Majesty and her august consort; the Earls of Aberdeen and Liverpool followed the Queen in another carriage.

Her Majesty was received, on landing at the Dockyard, by a guard of honour of the Marines, with their splendid band. Her Majesty appeared in excellent health and spirits, as did also Prince Albert.

The royal party came home in the royal yacht, but were unaccompanied by the squadron of war-steamers that attended during the excursion. The Prometheus and Cyclops steamers subsequently arrived, having been beaten by the Victoria and Albert yacht.

The royal cortege proceeded direct to Windsor.

The royal yacht anchored off the North Foreland at eleven o'clock on Wednesday night, and got under way at twenty minutes before six o'clock on Thursday morning.

BURNING OF THE STEAM-FRIGATE MISSOURI.

A subscriber at Gibraltar has obligingly forwarded to us the sketch for the annexed engraving, taken from "the Rock," of the burning of the splendid American steam-frigate Missouri, while at anchor in Gibraltar Bay, on the night of Saturday, the 26th of last month. It exhibits the appearance of the ill-fated vessel at midnight, when the mainmast and her funnel fell: it was, adds our correspondent, "a sublime sight." The details of the catastrophe are thus related in the Gibraltar Chronicle:—

The alarm was first given at eight o'clock precisely, and was immediately followed by such a burst of flame from the engineer's store-room as to lead to the belief that it originated among the oil and spirits. Every exertion was made to subdue it, and the large pumps were instantly put into operation; but the progress of the flames was so rapid that it became necessary to flood the two magazines, which was done so effectually, that it was not until twenty minutes after three a.m. that any explosion took place, and then not to an extent to endanger the shipping in the bay, the nearest of which had already been removed by the exertions of the acting captain of the port. Assistance was promptly sent from the Malabar, under the personal superintendence of Sir George Sartorius; and the Locust got up her steam and ran alongside the Missouri, with the view of towing her into deeper water, or rendering any other aid; but, unfortunately, she had already grounded, which rendered it impossible to scuttle her. As soon as the fire broke out, the Governor ordered the Waterport-gate to be opened, and proceeded himself to the wharf, from whence he despatched two engines under charge of the Artillery and Sappers; but, in spite of the united efforts of the crew of the Missouri and her friendly auxiliaries, the progress of the flames, which at one time appeared to be got under, was such, that at length Captain Newton was forced to abandon his ship, after summoning a council of his own officers and those British officers about him, who unanimously decided there was no hope of saving his ship. The order was then given by Captain Newton for all to quit the ship, which was done immediately, by the crew taking the water, and receiving the ready assistance of boats sent, in anticipation of the exigency, from the Malabar and from the vessels in the harbour. Such was the state of the ship when the officers and crew left her that they saved nothing but what they had on. Captain Newton did not quit the ship until all had left her, about a quarter past eleven o'clock. We are happy to add, that the officers and crew are believed to be all saved. His Excellency the American Minister, after securing his papers of importance, returned to the ship and zealously united his exertions to those of her officers. The line wall was crowded until a very late hour with spectators, anxiously watching the fate of the noble ship. The sight was awfully grand; and, until the masts at length fell overboard, the tracery of her spars and shrouds standing out in bright relief against the dark sky was beautiful. The whole rock was as light as day; and, probably, such a sight has not been witnessed in the bay since the conflagration of the floating batteries in the memorable siege.

The discipline observed on board, from the first moment of the fire, was most admirable: the several orders were given and obeyed as if the vessel had been in perfect safety, and nothing had occurred to excite alarm or confusion.

The following graphic description of the catastrophe, as described by an eye-witness, has been furnished by his relatives to the Cheltenham Examiner:—

Gibraltar, Aug. 28, 1843.

We have just witnessed one of the most fearful fires I ever saw, and I cannot but give you a few words about it. We saw a large steamer, evidently a man-of war, enter the bay on Saturday last, in the afternoon, which proved, after many conjectures, to be one of two American boats just built to eclipse all our English ones, and a fine vessel she is pronounced as she nears us, and to our great surprise passes close to our bowsprit in shore, and drops her anchor as the man cries "Mark 9" (which means five fathoms or thirty feet of water). We considered that very injudicious, as if an easterly wind should spring up she must go on a lee shore. We are so near as to hear all that is said on board. After well examining her and her enormous guns, and finding her draught of water to be twenty-one feet, we were the more convinced of her error, as she had only nine feet at the moment of dropping anchor, and now as she steers in shore has not more than five feet under her bottom; however, we left her to go below to tea, and had just finished at half-past seven, when our mate cried out, "The steamer's on fire, Sir." Up we were in a moment, and saw the smoke pouring out of the fore hatch. All was confusion on board. We saw many instantly jump overboard, and this continued till the captain and chief officers came off from shore, where they were dining with the American Consul; then the gate was shut, and it occupied some time to get the Governor's consent to pass, before they did come order was restored. At about eight o'clock the boats of the Malabar man-of war, with their water-engines, and two companies of the Miners and Sappers from Gibraltar, poured in such a torrent of water, that all the ship's pumps were kept going, to keep it from accumulating too much in her hold. Then the order was given to close the hatches and smother the fire, which stopped it for some time; but it next minute it broke out with such violence that all they could do seemed like spitting on it. We then heard the command to drown the fore-magazine of powder, but the answer returned was that it was impossible to go below. Then followed the order to drown the after magazine, and we suppose it was done (there is always a water-pipe turned into the magazine, in case of fire, and they have only to turn a tap to fill it with water, and should the fire be extinguished, they can let out the water, and the casks being inclosed in copper, and water-tight, the powder is not wetted). We now began to get anxious as to the after-magazine, which contained upwards of 1,000 barrels of powder (650 casks), as we knew, should it explode, even though drowned, it would have whirled our ship some miles distant, we being within 100 yards at the time; I spoke to Robert to bear up our anchor, and we dropped out into the bay about a mile, as we could render no assistance, there being more hands than could be employed engaged at the fire. Here, with the telescope, we could see all that passed. It was now ten, and the flames had got hold of her coals, 60 tons of which had just been taken in, and the Spanish boats were alongside with the remainder. We could see them advancing to the centre of the vessel, and although 1,000 were doing, all they could with 400 engines,* and a good supply of water, yet it was like a drop—evaporated in a moment. It continued unceasingly till eleven, when the decks fell in. Then it was awfully sublime; the flames rose to the top of the mainmast, at least seventy feet high, and enwrapped it with its rigging and sails. All was consumed in a moment but the mast, up which we could see the flames creeping, and in about an hour it fell with a terrible crash. About the same time the enormous funnel, which was redhot for hours before, came down. It was seven feet in diameter, and thirty-six feet high. Then at intervals followed the foremast and the mizenmast, till nothing was visible but one mass of vivid flame from stern to stern, a length of 250 feet. We could see some of the officers of the Malabar on the paddle-boxes till, driven to the last extremity by the heat, they jumped off into the sea, where they were picked up; and, as far as we yet know, no lives were lost. I stayed up till half-past two, and the fire was then as bright as ever. I was worn out, so went to bed, but was suddenly roused, though fast asleep, by an explosion of the few barrels in the after-magazine. It made the ship shock as so dreadful that it shook me out of my berth, and struck my head against a beam, that I scarcely knew where I was. I ran on deck, and the fragments were highly raised in every direction. It struck fire into the rock, and broke several windows, so I will leave you to guess what would have been the effect of 600 instead of only 4. They were now anxious for the after-magazine, and endeavored to tow the vessel into deeper water; but she had sunk to the bottom, and therefore it was impracticable; however, the tide was coming in, and soon entered between the burning bulwarks, and took away all alarm as to the remaining powder, but did not subdue the fire, which continued to devour all above water till mid-day on Sunday. As we returned from church we went round, and such a scene of destruction I never before beheld. Yesterday, a fine vessel with all the pride and daring of an American, now all consumed but the iron paddles, 32 feet in diameter, and a few pieces of bulwark yet burning, and the heat of the water rendered it unpleasant to go too near, and the enormous eight-and-twenty-inch still, with the funnel resting between the two paddle boxes, looked like a vast mortar. Two guns, just appearing above water, are all that now is visible. Her guns were all one light long one, as the fire heated them; but none were loaded with ball. She carried 18 32 pounders, the same sized guns as are at Gibraltar, called carronades. There were 350 souls on board; but all the crew but 40 were fortunately ashore for the purpose of visiting Alexandria, and thence to China, with the American Ambassador on board for the latter place. Nothing was saved, as the order to close the hatches prevented it, for not all have time or presence of mind to get what they have on board the various American ships in the harbour, of which there are about eight, come here with tea.

* There must be some mistake in the number of engines, but the writer has plainly written 400.

OPENING OF THE NEW DOCK AT ELLESMERE PORT.

The interesting ceremony of opening the splendid new dock at Ellesmere Port, or Whitby, took place on Wednesday week. This dock has just been completed by Mr. W. A. Provis, from the design of Mr. W. Cubitt, and is especially important to the interests of the Ellesmere and Chester Canal Company, by affording means of increased accommodation to vessels going thither to load and unload. This canal, sixty-one miles in length, commences in the tideway of the Mersey, at Ellesmere Port, and terminates in the Montgomery Canal. It has likewise several collateral branches. The magnificent new dock measures 435 feet in length by 139 feet wide. The vast extent and solid construction of the works are very striking. A few years since, there were upon this site but a public-house, three small cottages, an excuse for a warehouse, and one set of locks. Now, it has upwards of 7,000 tons of water, some extensive and commodious interior; a church, schools, two or three inns, two sets of locks; a splendid and most ample range of warehouses, erected on arches over various branches of the canal, and which afford great convenience for the loading and unloading of vessels, besides the vast new dock. Ten years ago, and even a little more years ago, the Chester canal, connecting the France, and Belgium, and Prussia—three sizeable places for Europe, and take and scrape every private carriage they've got, and they ain't no touch on what Ascot can show. Well, when you've done your cipherin', come right back to London, as hard as you can clip, from the race courses, and you won't miss any of 'em; the town is as full as ever it your eyes. A knowin' old 'coon, bred and born in London, might; but you couldn't. After that's over, go and pitch the whole bilin' of 'em into the Thames steamers, carriages, people, and all; and you'll see the river a mile or two below Blackwall black weepers and long faces of them that's lost money by it, and the black crape and happy faces of them that's got money, or titles, or what not, by it, you wouldn't know which was which. It surprises me that we've got new Lords in the pound in the market. A stranger, like you, if you warn't told, wouldn't know nothin' was the matter above common. There ain't nothin' in England knows its wealth like this."

Here is the philosophy of experience speaking out. The writer has seen that it is some time before colonies can afford to relax at all—long before they can invest capital in their pleasures. The amount of money represented by the materiel of our rural sports, and expended in working them—so to speak—exceeds the whole revenue of many a great state. If merely the expense of London could strike a shrewd calculator of the New Yorks as a colossal monument of our wealth, what would he have thought, could the resources of our national sports have been arrayed before him! Such reflections as these arose over, and after perusing a small portion of the great northern meeting, whose leading event was described in our last. Independent of the sums lost and won at Doncaster, and the valuable stakes run for, any man, woman, or child, who went to see the races, handed and received a great deal that would have startled a foreign prince. This is no doubt an evil to those who are pinched by it; but it comes of a taste or a conventionalism that does good service to a great many. The sporting spirit of the nation or continued us a bold people, are under the especial countenance of those whose fortune it is to possess the means of upholding them upon a scale worthy a great nation. It is the harsh profession made by the great money proprietors who visit our race-meetings that produces the pressure by which the man of limited means suffers. But it is by lavish profusion that the turf, in which the most popular principle of our national sports is typified, has its being. The large landowner feels that he is in a manner bound to patronize country pastimes. Allied to taste may not lead him towards horses and chariots, but it will tend to support a goodly equipage; his neighbours look upon his "set-out" as a parish affair; and the squire without a racer is his stable or a hound in his kennel, is regarded by the tailor of the village vasa advuce.

CRICKET.—NOTTS v. SURREY.—The famous match ended on Wednesday in favour of Nottingham, in one innings by a majority of 31. Nottingham got 35 in their first innings, and Surrey 35 and 262, consequently the majority was 31. The umpires were Caldecourt and Slater.

THE HAWICK GOLFING.—The Earl of Aberdeen, brought down two beautiful antlered stags last week, and Lord Provost Ogilvie's splendid ground at Attadarroch, in the district of Rutherglen.

THE BRIGHTON HARRIERS.—The Brighton harriers, under the management of Rooker Vallance, Esq., have commenced meeting hounds, and have had several good runs. The hounds are in excellent condition, and hares very plentiful, so that our sporting friends may look forward to plenty of this favourite amusement in the approaching season. The hunt will regularly take the field for the season on Monday, the 9th of October, and will hunt three days a week.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

A gunner of the Royal Artillery, at Ballincolig, in Ireland, has been sent prisoner to Woolwich for trial by court-martial. His name is O'Brien, a native of France, he is a Roman Catholic, and was heard to give a warm expression of his sentiments against the Reformation, Reformers, Westport, &c. It is long since Castlebar was the head-quarters of a regiment.

Her Majesty's steamer Carron, Mr. Payne in command, put in to Falmouth on Saturday, for a supply of fuel, from Bermuda six weeks, and fifteen days from Fayal. She has on board the Hon. Captain Grey of the consular-ship Tuscadoo, and of the steamer Gleaner, left at Bermuda. She sailed most of the voyage home. The Carron fell in with the Medea, Marsha on Sunday, at noon, off the land's-end, and took out her mails, which have been sorted, and will be forwarded hence to the several destinations of those ships. Same evening she communicated with her Majesty's ships Camperdown, St. Vincent, and Caledonia, bound to Cork. The Medea, Lavergne, Captain Bosse, sailed from Falmouth on Monday, with the mails for Vigo, Oporto, Lisbon, Cadiz, and Gibraltar, also with the intermediate mail for Malta and the Mediterranean Archipelago, in charge of Lieut. Wise, R.N.

DEVONPORT, Sept. 18.—The Dolphin steam-vessel, lieutenant Commander C. J. Forthereatone, arrived here on Sunday from Woolwich, and sailed again yesterday, with a detachment of Marines, under the command of Lieutenant Hendrick, who are to navigate the Vulture, new steam-vessel, from Pembroke to Deptford.—The Alban steamvessel, lieutenant Commander Ayres, arrived here yesterday, from Cork.—The Orestes, 18, Commander the Hon. S. S. Carnegie, will be towed into the Sound to day by the Cambrian steamer, and will proceed to sea in advance.—The Star, 10, sloop, was commissioned here this day, by Commander Robert J. W. Dundas.—The Camel, lugger, Fabian master, arrived from Southampton yesterday.—By letters received at this port from China, we learn that a fleet of the rates of sailing between the Waterloo, 16, sloop, the Commander W. S. Johnson, and the Wolf, 18, Commander C. O. Hayes, had been ordered by the Commander-in-Chief, which had created much in favour of the Wolf. Some interest had been excited in consequence of these vessels having been constructed on the plans and models of the Pelorus. The Wolf was built in 1836, by the architect of the Inconstant, while the Waterwitch was constructed the exact counterpart of the new, by the master shipwright of the Pique, and was built ten years later (1836) than the Wolf. The Wolf is commanded by the son of the former constructor, that is fitted with Captain Symonds's patent sliding keel. A curious specimen of ingenuity in the typographic art, was [illegible] a pamphlet, long, in quarto shape, and tastefully "set up," of the arrival and sailing of the Bellerophon from the different places at which she has touched on her voyage from the Cape of Good Hope, to Hong Kong on the 29th October, thus finishing a voyage unparalleled in the history of the world. Whether we view it on account of the immense distance gone over, amounting to 19,000 miles—the gigantic river, up which we explored 250 miles—the multitude on board—or the remarkable fact of having had no death from accident in three years and seven months amongst them. Her Majesty's 98th Regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell, embarked on the 11th; including officers, 860 strong, with 40 women and 74 children; which, with half a company of the Royal Artillery, the Bellerophon had on board making in all 1276 souls. The deaths in the regiment and among the seamen, up to our leaving and attack on Chang kiang-foo, in July, were four of the former, and four of the latter. From this date the casualties were as follows:—July, 55 soldiers, 4 sailors; August, 46 soldiers, 2 seamen; September, 6 soldiers; October, 9 soldiers; November, 34 soldiers; December, 34 soldiers. GREAT REVIEW IN GERMANY.—A review of the tenth corps of the army of the German Confederation is to take place in the neighbourhood of Lauenburg, between the 24th of this month and the 5th of October. The whole number of troops assembled on this occasion will be 28,000, of whom Hanover sends 13,054; Brunswick, 2,096; Holstein Lauenburg, 3600; Mecklenburg Schwerin, 3680; Mecklenburg Strelitz, 718; Oldenburgh and the Hanseatic Towns, Lubeck, Bremen, and Hamburg, 5018.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

LOSS OF THE BRIG DAPHNE.—Information has been received in the City of the total loss of the brig Daphne, Captain Robinson, belonging to the port of Whitby. The vessel is stated to have been totally lost on the 24th ult., on the eastern side of the south country bridge. In the early part of last week she started on her outward passage, with a cargo of coals, and nothing occurred on board that could in any way alarm the crew during the voyage, until she arrived off Flamborough head, on the night of Tuesday last, when to their great surprise, they found she had several feet of water in her hold. Captain Robinson immediately gave orders for the pumps to be set actively to work, in order that the leak might be discovered, and measures taken to stop it. In this attempt, however, they failed, as the water was fast filling up the hold; and as it became evident to them all that in a short time she would go down, not a moment was lost in launching the ship's boat in order to save themselves, and after procuring a small portion of food, and what they could get out of their clothing, the captain and crew got into the boat and shoved off. The boat was kept as near the unfortunate brig as was considered prudent, the captain being anxious to learn her fate, and about one o'clock on Wednesday morning she sunk in deep water, about ten miles off Flamborough-head. The boat's crew then steered for the land, the men rowing by turns; they were, however, soon picked up by a Sunderland trader, and landed in Robin Hood's Bay in perfect safety. The brig is stated to be partially insured.

Her Majesty's surveying vessel Beagle, left Falmouth on the 11th inst. for England; the Styx surveying steamer remained there; the Scylla was in the Gulf of Mexico; the Kingdove was expected at Jamaica; the Albatross was repairing there.

INTELLIGENCE FROM CHINA.—Captain Robertson, of the Monarch, of Leith, which vessel sailed from Hong Kong on the 8th of May, reports that the Marchioness of Douro, the Sir Charles Forbes, and the Emma, all bound for London, and the Minerva, for Glasgow, sailed from China the same time as the Monarch, consequently these vessels may be daily expected, but will furnish no later intelligence than that received by the last overland mail.

INTERIOR OF THE CHURCH OF ST. OLAVE, BEFORE THE LATE FIRE.

The recent destruction of this handsome church, in the extensive conflagration at Topping's Wharf, London Bridge, has already been detailed and illustrated in No. 69 of our journal. We now present our readers with an accurate view of the interior as it appeared before the fire, with the very interesting history of the structure.

The Church of St. Olave was, probably, the earliest parochial foundation in Southwark. St. Olave (or Olaff), to whom the church is dedicated, was King of Norway, and A.D. 993, made an incursion into England, and sailed up the Thames with his fleet; but having made peace with King Ethelred, and being converted to Christianity by the English prelates, he became that fast friend of Ethelred, and afforded him material service in the year 1008, when the city of London being occupied by the Danes, who had fortified London Bridge, Olave attacked it with his ships, and by fastening ropes to the piles and timbers of which the bridge was constructed, the whole was destroyed, and numbers of the enemy were involved in its ruin.* This manly contribuited to the restoration of Ethelred; and King Olave returning to his own country, filled with religious zeal, endeavoured to convert his Pagan subjects to Christianity. This caused them to revolt against him; and he was killed in a battle at Stichstadt, in 1028, and buried at Drontheim.

Being esteemed a martyr, Olave was canonized as a saint; and, from his services in England and friendship with the sovereigns, it is not surprising that many churches should be dedicated to him. In the city of London there are no less than three, viz, St Olave, Hart-street; St. Olave, Jewry; and St. Olave, Silver-street; besides St. Olave, Southwark. The latter church stands nearly on the site of his exploit, in 1008; for the original London Bridge stood somewhat eastward of the old bridge (pulled down on the erection of the present splendid structure), and crossed the Thames from Botolph's Wharf to the opposite side of the river. Olave would bring it to nearly the site of the Church of St. Olave, in Southwark.

It is not known when or by whom this church was first founded; but, from its dedication to St. Olave, it was probably prior to the Norman conquest. It formed part of the possessions of William, Earl of Warren and Surrey, who married Gundred, daughter of William the Conqueror, and, with his wife, founded the priory of St. Pancras, at Lewes, Sussex; and among the other possessions, granted to them, the church of St. Olave, in Southwark; the grant being confirmed by William, second Earl of Warren and Surrey.

The advowson of the church continued in the possession of the priory of Lewes, until the suppression of the monasteries by King Henry VIII., to whom it was surrendered (with the other possessions of the priory) by Robert, Prior of Lewes, in 1538.

In 1540, the Church of St. Olave was granted by King Henry VIII. to his then favoured minister, Lord Cromwell, Earl of Essex, for ever; but in the same year, it reverted to the crown, and afterwards formed part of the provision for Queen Anne of Cleves, the divorced wife of King Henry: during her life, and since her death, the living has been uninterruptedly vested in the crown.

The old church of St. Olave was a building apparently of about the fourteenth century, and consisted of four aisles or long rows of pillars (separated from each other by pointed arches and pillars) called respectively Our Lady's Aisle, St. Clement's Aisle, St. Anne's Aisle, and St. Barbara's Aisle: for each of these the contributors had distributed alms at certain times, and which were attached fraternities in honour of the Virgin Mary and St. Clement, and a sisterhood or St. Anne.

In January, 1736, it was found that one of the pillars supporting the north side of the church had been injured, in consequence of digging graves in the church too near to the foundation of the pillar; and, on endeavouring to recruit the same for want of proper shoring, the whole of the north side of the church fell down.

In 1737, an act was passed for rebuilding the church; for which purpose the trustees were empowered to raise money by lottery, or by loans, or by fines, to be charged on rates to be levied on the parishioners. This act contained the very salutary provision that no body should be buried within the church.

The architect of the late church was Henry Flitcroft, who was a pupil of the celebrated Kent, and a protégé of that well-known patron of art, the Earl of Burlington. He built the Church of St. Giles in the Fields, a more elaborate specimen of art; but the Church of St. Olave, Southwark, was considered a masterpiece for chasteness and simplicity of style. Like St. Stephen's Walbrook, the exterior was plain and unmeaning; but, on entering the church, the spectator was astonished by the beauty of the interior: this consisted of a nave with side aisles, each aisle containing a gallery; the nave of the church was terminated by a handsome cove of waggon-head ceiling, supported by an fluted Ionic columns on each side: the whole enriched with carvings and mouldings, producing a fine effect without either gaudiness or unnecessary ornament. The chancel was small, but well adapted to the general harmony of the composition. We should observe that the particular description of the building, as our interior view will best show the beauty of the details. The church was finished and opened for divine service in 1740.

It has been a common report that the tower was originally intended by the architect to bear a spire, but that the design was abandoned in consequence of the failure of funds; this we can hardly believe to be the case, as the tower appeared to be complete in itself; and the addition of a spire would hardly be in keeping with the lower part of the structure.

It is a singular circumstance connected with the history of this church, that a very considerable portion of the expense was advanced by a French merchant, on an annuity for his life; and he dying soon afterwards, it was a current saying that the organ had cost more than the church. The organ was a very fine one of the old school, supposed to have been by Father Schmidt, about 1680; but, notwithstanding various repairs, almost worn out. There was a fine peal of eight bells. The clock was a present from Hugh Boulter, D.D., formerly rector of St. Olave's, and afterwards Primate of Ireland.

In the vestry-room was a very handsome table, originally the sounding-board of the pulpit; which, being considered unnecessary when the church was repaired and beautified in 1736, now forms a round table. This board is of oak, inlaid with rays emanating from a centre, in the midst of which is contained the triangle, as an emblem of the Trinity; the edge is ornamented with a carved scroll moulding; and the entire table is supported on a pillar and claws. The founder of that college, it was, probably, the size of Sir John Fastolfe's mansion or palace in Southwark. In the immediate neighbourhood there were also several other goodly mansions. On the other side of the church, there Chamberlain's Wharf now stands. A fine house of the Abbot of St. Augustine's, at Canterbury; next to which was the Bridge House, and then the Abbot of Battle's house, from which that part of the parish is still called Battle-bridge. Immediately opposite to this was the town house of the Prior of Lewes; and an ancient Norman house, which was afterwards the site of St. Olave's Grammar School.

It has been resolved on to rebuild the church on the present site, and a committee has been appointed to superintend its re erection, to consist of the Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman Farncombe, Sheriff Pitcher, Messrs. Scovell, Bloyd, Walker, Langley, the Rector, Dr. Kenny, and others.

* The reader will find a particular account of this battle from the writings of an Icelandic historian, in "Thomson's Chronicles of London Bridge," a very interesting and valuable work.

LOSS OF THE REGULAR EAST INDIAMAN.

More than one inaccurate account of this melancholy affair having been published, we prefer the following narrative, by Captain Carter, as the best accompaniment to the annexed engraving of the abandonment of the vessel, from a sketch made by an officer on board. The noble conduct of the crew of the French frigate La Cléopatre, in rescuing all hands connected with the Regular from total destruction, has been acknowledged in a letter from Captain Carter to the commander of the French frigate; also, by Sir William Gomm, governor of the Cape of Good Hope; and this praiseworthy conduct has very properly been brought under the notice of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty:—

"The ship Regular, W. R. Carter commander, 550 tons, left London on the 22nd of February last, bound to Bombay and China, with a valuable cargo of specie, iron, steel, copper, &c. The passage was an ordinary one until the 8th of May, when, scudding in a heavy gale from the N. W. off the Cape of Good Hope, she suddenly sprung a leak, which, in spite of the continued exertions of the crew for the four subsequent days and nights, gained considerably upon them. On the second day the water gained upon both pumps three inches. The gale continuing with unabated fury, and a tremendous sea running, it was deemed expedient to lighten her, and about 80 tons of copper, &c., were thrown overboard without any good resulting. The crew was then divided into parties, and the pumps assisted by bailing at the fore hatchway. For the two subsequent days the weather continued nearly the same, blowing furiously with a tremendous sea. There was no alternative but to scud before the blast, which was done under a reefed foresail and close-reefed main-topsail. On the 13th all hands became completely exhausted, the pumps never having been left for four days and nights. The ship at noon on this day was in lat. 37 deg. 30 min. S., and in long. 36 deg. 30 min. E., when the immense quantities of water in the hold affected her steerage, and it was evident to all she was nearly waterlogged. At three P.M., the water in the hold being nearly up to the beams, and the crew despairing of keeping her afloat by their exertions much longer, they were compelled to take to their boats. At eight P.M. they left her to her fate. In the launch were placed eighteen persons, including the chief and second officers and two female passengers; in the pinnace were the third officer and ten persons; and in the gig Captain Carter and four persons. Several casks of provisions and water were placed in each boat. They were now 900 miles from the nearest land, scudding, in three small boats (the largest of which was only 23 feet 6 inches in length, and 6 feet 6 inches broad), before a furious Cape gale, direct from the land. About ten, in a heavy squall of wind, each boat shipped a tremendous sea; from the larger one everything was obliged to be thrown overboard to lighten her—water, food, compass, charts, &c. The gig cleared herself as she filled over the stern. So, on the top of a mountainous sea, the whole of her contents, save the crew, were washed over her bows. The pinnace shared the same fate as the launch; the gig was then pulled towards the launch, and reached her at midnight. The crew was then removed into her, and she cut adrift; the launch was now too crowded almost to move in, and had lost sight of the pinnace. Thus in despair they drove the wretched night through, without chart or compass to direct them, or a single necessary to sustain life; the sea birds (such as albatross and Cape pigeons) hovering close over them, as if only awaiting the moment when the frail boat should be engulfed. At dawn, to their inexpressible joy, the Almighty directed to their relief, which were descried directly to windward, running immediately down towards them. A signal of distress was made by hoisting a shawl belonging to one of the lady passengers, which was providentially not unobserved. The vessels proved to be the French frigate La Cleopatré, 52 guns, and corvette Alcmene, 20 guns, proceeding to China viâ Batavia, on convoy. On coming on being made acquainted with the discovery of the signal, immediately rounded the frigate towards the boat, and at eight those in the launch were received in safety on board her. On reaching the frigate's deck Captain Carter instantly implored the commander to go in search of his missing men and officers in the pinnace. This request was immediately complied with, and in less than an hour the missing boat was discovered by the corvette, and by her miraculously preserved, all parties thanking God and the French officers with tears in their eyes, who, through his mercy, had been the means of rescuing them from a watery grave. The appearance of these vessels seemed the more miraculous on this day as for forty-two days previously they had not sighted a single sail, nor did they fall in with any other after on their passage to the Mauritius. It was also afterwards learned that on the previous day the commodore had determined to alter his course, but had not eventually done so; if he had he would have passed eighty or ninety miles to the eastward of the unfortunate crew.

"The preparations made by those on board the frigate for removing the now wrecked people from the boats could never be surpassed. It displayed the skill of a seaman, and at the same time showed that every head and heart on board the Cleopatré seconded the exertions of the excellent commander; and, when they had been safely taken on board, they found that every arrangement had been made for their reception which either humanity or medical skill could dictate, and, from that moment until the arrival of the frigate at the Mauritius, the crew of the Regular received such generous treatment from their deliverers as will never be effaced from their memory. The whole of the officers, passengers, and crew were saved."

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XLII.

MR. THESIGER, M.P.

Westminster Hall partakes of the assertion that falls upon the Chapel of St. Stephen at this season of the year, and at the present moment is the subject of our sketch, who occupies a prominent position in both those seats of controversy. Is enjoying the seabreezes at Teignmouth, one of the prettiest watering-places of the south of Devon. We have often thought that to those who have the high places of legal reputation, whose minutes, to borrow a [illegible] case inter spectandum—that is, during a morning ride; a striking confrontation, we thought, of the brand of the sanbenito. Horses, that "care mounteth behind the horseman." There is no shaking it off, till, fairly released from the fetters, men flv to fresh fields and pastures new, as the majority of the members of the bar and the legal tore are in the habit of doing towards the beginning of September. For the sake of the "celebrities" of the legal profession we do not wish the long vacation cut short by a single day; and as for those who have not yet attained the rank they aspire to, we can only hope that they will be luckier in the covers than in the courts, and bag more birds in the shooting season than they did "briefs" during term. But we are digressing.

Mr. Frederic Thesiger is widely known, both as an advocate and a member of Parliament; but it is no derogation from his merit to state that at the bar he holds a higher place, speaking comparatively, than in the House of Commons. Partly this may arise from tinctions; and he who does not absolutely lead must be content to be led, unless he can stand aloof, like Mr. Roebuck, and, with almost a contemptuous indifference to either party, shower his denunciations on both. But in that case the individual speaks for himself alone, promulgates his own opinions only; and few indeed are there like the member for Bath, gifted with that power of thought and expression which commands attention from all, though it possibly may win co-operation from none. Mr. Thesiger is not one of these—he is a thorough party man, a Conservative of that more decided description which formerly would have been called Tory, but the term is out of fashion. Like the other great lawyers in the house, he speaks seldom, at least not often, having speaking enough elsewhere; and when he does, it is easy to perceive that it is simply because the subject has awakened more than ordinary interest in him. Thus during the last session—when the many bribery petitions were under inquiry, when the very air of the house seemed to be thickened with the unwholesome vapours of venality, when recusant witnesses and refusals to give evidence were so common, that motions to commit them to Newgate were ordinary matters—Mr. Thesiger took a very active part in the discussions. We believe it was on the Southampton petition that he took exception to the committal of a witness. Very late on a Friday night, or rather Saturday morning, he made a very long speech, and by an unexpected motion procured an adjournment of the house till the same day. A Saturday sitting is anything but popular with the members, and altogether the course he took was not very well relished by the Government—at least such was the general impression at the time; but the less likely it was to prove acceptable to the leaders of the party, the more strongly it proved his own sincerity. Mr. Thesiger represents the borough of Woodstock, for which he was returned in the month of February, 1840, after having been defeated in a contest for Newark against Sir Thomas Wilde. It is said that it was the interest of the Marquis of Blandford, when he succeeded to the dukedom of Marlborough, which secured him his seat. He was called to the bar by the Honourable Society of Gray's Inn on the 18th of November, 1818. It is generally understood, that before he commenced the study of the law he had been intended for the sea, and had entered the naval service. If he did, he could have continued in it but a short time. His practice is mostly in the Court of Queen's Bench and on the Home Circuit. He is a ready and fluent speaker, with a clear, strong voice, and very distinct enunciation. He is tall in person and rather spare, but well made, and he possesses the air and carriage of a gentleman. The "midnight oil," and the toils of the court, have long since banished the roses from his cheeks—if ever they had any—but they have not dimmed a dark and searching eye, which seems able either to spy out Truth at the bottom of her well, or convey to her an intimation that she had better remain there, should it be the client's interest not to disturb her. His career does not differ from that of many others who have attained eminence in the law; energy and ability must be supposed, and the tact of using opportunities as they occur. We may mention one occasion on which Mr. Thesiger particularly distinguished himself under very unfavourable circumstances; he defended Thurtell on his trial for the murder of Mr. Weare. The law did not then allow an address from the counsel of the prisoner, but all that could be done he did in the cross-examination of the witnesses, and it is said, not without probability, that he wrote the very able defence which Thurtell himself read to the court. Mr. Thesiger wears a "silk gown," as one of her Majesty's counsel.

THE PARLIAMENT OAK, SHERWOOD FOREST.

The Parliament Oak is situated by the side of the Ollerton and Mansfield high-road, about four miles from the latter town, and two miles to the north-west of the village of Clipston, on the borders of a magnificent remnant of Sherwood Forest. The oak would have long since "paid the debt of nature," but for the consideration of the noble proprietor upon whose land it stands. The Duke of Portland has stayed, and propped, and clamped it together on every side, so as to bid defiance to the violence of the tempest; and has reared a fine thriving plant from one of its acorns in the interior of the tree, which is so hollow, that it will with ease contain half a dozen persons. On an eminence, above the village of Clipston, are some remains of a very ancient palace that belonged to the Anglo-Saxon kings; it is of Norman architecture, and is said to have been erected by one of the kings of Northumberland after the Conquest. It was frequently the residence of King John both before and after his accession to the throne; and the charter which he granted in the first year of his reign, is dated at this place; as were also the orders issued by Edward II. on September 25, 1307, to the seneschal of Gascony and constable of Bourdeaux, to provide 1000 pipes of good wine to be sent to London before the following Christmas, for his approaching coronation. To this palace, also, all the kings of England, down to Henry V., appear to have repaired for the diversion of hunting in the royal Forest of Sherwood, as we find that Henry de Fanconberge, in the reign of Henry III., held the neighbouring manor of Cuckney in sergeantcy, by the shoeing of the king's palfrey on coming to Mansfield.

The Parliament Oak is twenty-five feet in circumference at the height of four feet above the ground; and, as tradition states that King John held a Parliament under it, on an occasion when despatches reached him from London when he was engaged in hunting, it is reasonable enough to suppose that it was a full grown tree in those days, and that its age cannot be at this time under one thousand years. The poet tells us that "the monarch oak

Three centuries he grows, and three he stays
Supreme in state, and in three more decays"

The Parliament Oak would not have lived beyond the above allotted period of nine centuries, but for the protection and assistance it has received from man, as the sap which supports the scanty foliage on its few straggling branches is conveyed along narrow strips of bark. The rest of the bole of the tree resembles a gnarled and rugged rock. Other natives of "Merry Sherwood" are of more gigantic dimensions than the Parliament Oak; the Greendale Oak, in Welbeck Park, being thirty-six feet in circumference, and THURGOH which two horsemen can with ease ride two abreast; but not one possesses more interest than the one above sketched.

THE HAFOD COPPER-WORKS.

SKETCHES OF SOUTH WALES.

We are now enabled to resume the illustrations of the disturbed districts commenced in our last number. Our first engraving represents the Hafod Copper-works, on the river Tawe, about one mile and a half from Swansea. They are the principal copper-works in Wales; and belong to Messrs. Vivian, Foster, and Williams. The workmen, some 2000 in number, at the day on which our artist made his sketch, had been "out" three weeks; one man told him that at the works where he and five others had formerly earned £5 8s. per week, they did not then earn more than £3 4s.; adding that a further reduction was expected. The smoke of the Sulback works, also belonging to Messrs. Vivian, is seen above the hill in the distance, to the left of the river Tawe; Foster and Williams's works are on the right. The chimney to the right of Vivian's works is that of some extensive chemical works. At the date of our engraving, eleven copper-works had struck in this district; five in the view before us, and the others over the hills adjoining.

We are happy to learn that the strike of the copper-men, which lasted so long, and was productive of such a serious injury to the trade of the entire neighbourhood, is now happily at an end, Messrs. Vivian's men at the Hafod Works having first resumed their employment, and the men at the other works on the Swansea and Neath rivers having now followed their example; so that the whole of the works in the Swansea Vale are now in full operation again.

The entrance to the vale of Tawy, in which these vast works are situated, at night, is both novel and surprising. Most of the copper ore in the kingdom is smelted in this vale, and its appearance at night is truly terrific: all vegetation in the immediate vicinity of the copper-works is totally blasted, it is a desolate-looking place. A lurid glare is first seen spread over the landscape. On nearing the works, some of which are in the hollow, close to the road-side, and others on the rise of the hill in the distance, a vast assemblage of flues—vomiting forth deep-coloured flames, once or twice varied with the brilliant glare of a blast furnace, and overshadowed by an immense cloud of smoke—certainly impresses a stranger very forcibly, and leads him to form no very favourable opinion of the environs of Swansea. The visitor who explores this vale often returns with a headache. The face of the country, which would otherwise have been beautiful, is literally scorched by the copper-smoke; and when it is recollected that the flues are constantly emitting smoke and flames, strongly impregnated with sulphur, arsenic, &c., the desolation is not to be wondered at. A canal runs up the vale into the country for several miles; and it is flanked near the copper-works by many millions of tons of copper-slag. Yet, in spite of the tainted atmosphere, a great number of the persons employed in the copper-works attain old age. The copper trade may be considered as comparatively of modern date; the first smelting-works having been erected at Swansea about one hundred and twenty years since.

The second engraving shows the remains of the Pontyberem toll gate, near Carmarthen, demolished a short time since by a party of Rebeccaites. The abuses regarding the tolls, which were first openly stated to be the cause of the disturbances in this part of the country, are placed in a somewhat more distinct light than hitherto in the Times's report from Carmarthen, dated September 4, in which an abstract of the accounts of a trust for 1839 shows that the receipts are £499 19s. 9d. for tolls, and the expenditure is £516 11s. 8d. Out of this sum, all the money expended on the road for keeping it in repair is £14 0s. 6d. for labour, and one-third of £2 14s. 8d. for materials. There is an item, "law, defending constables, &c., £175." £113 of this sum went for defending two constables for handcuffing a farmer on the road, on his return through one of the gates, he having passed through in the morning without paying, as there was no one at the gate to take toll. It is to be presumed the constables were in the wrong, for they lost the action. When these things are stated as the cause of outbreaks, the answer of those in authority is, "We know nothing of it." But an answer to the natural questions,—"Why did you not inform yourselves of what was going on around you? Why did you keep yourselves to yourselves, and avoid neighbourly converse with the people around you, as if you feared some sort of contamination from the contact? Why did you permit these abuses and oppressions to receive the sanction of your names and countenance without knowing what it was that you sanctioned?"—may not be so easy. Toll-bars are now sinking in importance as a grievance; in fact, most of them are either down or abolished; and objections to the new poor-law and to tithes, and to high rents, are beginning to stand in the front rank.

The subsequent destruction of the Pontardulais gate indicates the levelling work to be still rife. Our artist visited several destroyed gates, all of which presented the same appearance, generally, as that at Pontyberem, which he has here depicted.

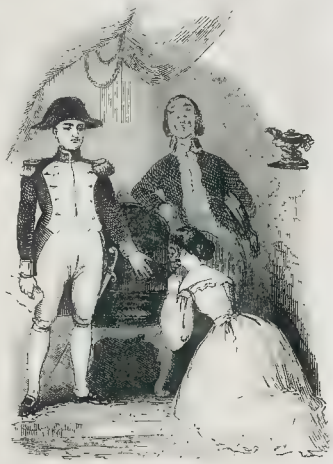
A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXIV

NAPOLEON.



AFTER a dreadfully tedious sixteen hours' journey Lucrece and Fred. entered the capital, and as, on reaching their hotel, they felt excessively fatigued, they almost immediately retired to rest.

The importance, however, of the task to be performed forbade any lengthened repose and, therefore, after being slightly refreshed, their first step was to call upon the Comte de Ville, to whom the letter written by Beauharnois was addressed, and whom they experienced no difficulty in seeing.

Having sent up this letter with their cards, the Count—an exceedingly elegant person—received them with infinite grace, and conversed with them on the subject with much courtesy and feeling, and having assured them that he should feel proud to present Lucrece—she being the petitioning party—to the Emperor, he appointed what he conceived to be the most convenient hour for that purpose, and they left him with high hopes indeed.

Punctual to this appointment, Lucrece—dressed nicely but with extreme neatness—returned with her brother to the Count, and as seven hope had lighted up her beautiful features, she looked indeed charming.

The Count, who had held himself in readiness, and who, in the interim, had read the petition, now raised her high hopes still higher by warmly expressing his conviction of success; and having been struck by her touching style of expression and the peculiarly musical richness of her voice, he encouraged her to make her appeal with firmness, and led her to his carriage accompanied by Fred.

On their arrival at the palace the Count left them for a time, and on his return, having informed them that the Emperor would receive the petition, he led Lucrece into a gorgeous salon, in which the Emperor stood with his back towards the door engaged in the perusal of various documents. He turned, however, almost on the instant, and as Lucrece knelt before him he approached, and with great kindness raised her, pressing her hand slightly as he did so and gazing with manifest pleasure.

He then receive, the petition, and having hastily perused it, drew the Count aside, and intimated to him that he had then no time to enter into the matter, that he should be occupied at least three hours, and that, as he presumed the petitioner wished to return as soon as possible, he would at the expiration of that time grant her an audience.

The Count returned to Lucrece, and having communicated this intelligence, took her hand and withdrew, but as they retreated the Emperor kept his eyes firmly fixed upon her, and moved with surpassing condescension

"I know not how to express to you my gratitude," said Lucrece, having retired quite delighted with this reception, "but that I do feel grateful he assured."

"My dear madam," returned the Count, "I beg you will not name it. If you succeed—and I now feel convinced that you will—the knowledge of your success will most amply reward me. I regret that I shall be unable to accompany you at the hour appointed, in consequence of an engagement which must be kept, but that will be of no importance: you will have but to announce your name, nothing more will be required."

They now rejoined Fred., who approached them trembling with anxiety to know the result and when the matter had been briefly explained, they re-entered the carriage, and were driven to the hotel, where the Count took leave of Fred. and Lucrece with many expressions of high consideration.

"Oh!" exclaimed Lucrece, when she and Fred. were again alone, "And you been there—had you but seen how graciously he addressed me—you would have been, perfectly amazed And then how kindly he raised me, and how calmly he smiled! Why he's very handsome, Frederick! I expected to see almost a monster:—instead of which he is really one of the most handsome persons I ever saw"

"Indeed"

"Oh he's extremely good looking! I'm quite sure that he'll not refuse."

"Heaven grant that be may so! But having seen him, do you still feel equal to the task of making an appeal?"

"Quite! Oh! I can speak to him without the slightest embarrassment! But now—let me see.—He will have read the petition, which he then merely glanced at, and then.—Oh how surprised they'll be in England when we all return!"

"True. but we have not yet the power to surprise them!"

"But we shall have, Frederick! You do not doubt it now"

"Not at all! But, perhaps it were better to confine your thoughts to the one grand point which has yet to be gained."

"I will—if possible, I will do so; although my fancy, floating on the stream, will be governed by the tide."

Fred., with a view to sustain her strength, then proceeded to order dinner, and until it was produced, Lucrece was lost in a most delightful reverie. She imagined the questions of the Emperor and her answers to those questions, and then thought of Charles, and having dwelt upon the raptures with which he would receive the happy news, pictured to herself the arrival in England, the amazement of relatives and friends, their affectionate embraces, their expressions of delight, and their warm congratulations. These, with a thousand collateral conceptions, passed in review before her, and the only thing which tended to mar the pleasure they indicated was the strong and ever present apprehension that the health of her Charles had been permanently impaired.

The three hours prescribed having nearly expired, Lucrece, whose impatience kept pace with the time, again repaired to the palace, accompanied by Fred., and on the arrival they appeared to have been expected, for an officer, with a great show of kindness, received them and conversed with Fred. in the most friendly strain, while Lucrece was formally ushered into the Emperor's

On being left alone in the room by the attendant, who immediately retired, the Emperor removed and approaching an ebon couch, raised her with an expression of encouragement.

"Rise," said Lucrece, in a tone, the depth and richness of which appeared to amaze him, "I pray you pardon me for having so long kept you waiting on your coming here."

"You would speak of Dr. C——rend," said the Emperor, "your husband, his cause you came to plead."

"Most humbly, sire!" returned Lucrece, "and if your Majesty would deign to grant the prayer of my petition, the purest gem that ever would fill our hearts. He has been, sire, long a captive, a dejected man, and death must soon complete its work, if not arrested by your clemency. I plead," she added with startling energy, kneeling as she escaped her grasp, "that I may search you grant him liberty—do, I implore you, set him free!—and that the Almighty may ever smile upon and bless you, will be our constant prayer."

"Your petition is granted in the petition," said the Emperor, raising her, "and now I have proved how I can interfere, with any show of justice to the rest. However I am not yet resolved."

"Thanks, sire!—a thousand thanks. No condition can be proposed which will not be respected; they will never join mass their arms against France."

"Oh, I would not fetter them," returned the Emperor approaching the table, and taking up a pen.

"Oh that I had the fortune to speak!" thought Lucrece, as the Emperor was writing, "to cast to my poor dear Charles with the glorious news! We are now about Heaven be praised!"

"Madam," said the Emperor on leaving the table, "here is an order for the passports. It has been to the governor."

"And before I receive it, sire, I beg most humbly to express the unbounded gratitude with which your gracious goodness has filled my heart. Oh, thrice happy must the those who have the power to impart such happiness to others. Sire, may Heaven bless you with that happiness of which this gift will be the source, be multiplied a thousand-fold to bless the giver. I thank you sire, most humbly, but with all my soul."

"Madam," said the Emperor, presenting the order, "I am proud of thus enjoying the esteem of one so graceful, so clever, so lovely as yourself."

"Sire!" said Lucrece, and returned, with an expression of embarrassment, "May Providence protect you!"

Fred's rapture on the result of this interview being explained may be conceived. He was in a state of absolute ecstasy. Still he urged Lucrece not even to prepare for their departure, and when all the preliminaries had been arranged they left Paris.

Meanwhile, Charles was in a state of anxiety the most intense. Time, to him, seemed to be running a racehorse's race, and we he dreaded the return of Lucrece. His dreams, never vivid, had been frightful, and although he had not been accustomed to attach much importance to dreams, they now took an firm possession of his mind, and gave his thoughts with no potent reason, but when the time he expected the return of Lucrece and her brother had passed, he became almost fear

And what moral torture can be held to be comparable with that which suspense induces, when in one's depths the hope of release struggles with the fear of being plunged deeper and deeper still? Passionate love becomes violence, and superstition forms itself into belief. Man calculate the chances even while they chide to destroy, absurd destiny and chance are so opposed they cannot exercise. What misery is created by the dread of its approach, and by what mere threads are joy and wretchedness suspended: the slightest effort will snap either, but then they are so mysteriously entwined, we know not which is severed until it descends.

Charles knew the futility of thus worrying himself as well as any man; but how useless was that knowledge to him then—and remember, unbroken by social companionship, which was then in a state of revolt.

At length, however, wearied utterly exhausted, the rumbling noise of an approaching carriage and the energetic cracking of the whip, which had upon him an electric effect, made him fly to the window, and when he perceived that the carriage was about to stop he rushed to the door in the passage.

"Success!" cried Fred, with an expression of gaiety, thrusting his head out of the carriage. "No news."

"Thank God" exclaimed Charles, approaching "Lucrece, my love," he added, as he pressed her trembling hand, "time never has been too much for you, my girl—the fatigue has been too great for you, my sister!"

"Why no" said Lucrece, "I am to be wondered at, certainly; but no, for I possess a constitution which will bear much more than this, dearest, my dear fellow, and so should your

"Sire!" and when they had entered the house Lucrece burst into tears at Charles's feet, exclaiming,

"Dear Charles. My dear husband!" she exclaimed, when turning to the servant who had brought the infant in her arms, she sobbed aloud as she kissed him with passionate ca

"Eh!" cried Fred., when Lucrece had retired, "what think you now?"

"I know not what to think, but that Lucrece is a——, that you are a fine fellow, and that the Emperor is a much better man than I ever—I am to be. But how did you act?—what did he say?"

"I'll enter into all the particulars when I have dined; you shall then have a full explanation. Here!" he added, placing the order in his hand "there is a feast before dinner for you."

Dinner was then ordered to be brought up at once; when all was explained to Charles, who was much delighted at a heavy weight seemed to have been lifted from his heart. He took up again, and felt quite another man; and as somebody propositions were made for the day, the 26th, on the following that which succeeded this evening, each an eternal added to Verdun.

THE DUNMOW AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—THE FLITCH OF BACON PRIZE.

The ancient jocular ceremony of awarding the gammon of bacon at Dunmow, to whatever married couple who should have lived in harmony a year and a day, was revived in 1837; the poetical oath being dispensed with, and the usual condition of complete fidelity being exchanged for the following—"To the married couple, labourer in husbandry and his wife, who shall have brought up the greatest number of children, and placed them in respectable service; without any the least parochial relief; a gammon of bacon to the second best candidate for the same, 10s., offered by the society."

The origin of this modern award is as follows—In September, 1836, at the annual dinner of the Dunmow Agricultural Society (then a branch of the Saffron Walden), John Player, Esq., placed at the disposal of the committee the value of a gammon of bacon, to be given to a married couple under the above-named conditions. At the following anniversary, three candidates were found, and the custom has since been kept up by the special donation of some member of the society; but as the Dunmow Agricultural Society, in 1840, became an independent association by its separation from the parent society at Walden, the gammon has since been given by some gentleman belonging to the corporation of Dunmow; and it is understanding between the society and the corporate body that it shall continue so to be offered.

The annual meeting of the Dunmow Agricultural Society, ploughing match, exhibition of agricultural roots, and of cottagers' garden produce, was held on Monday last, the 18th inst. For the trials of skill in husbandry—viz., the ploughing and hand ditching, the ground being extremely hard, consequently but few candidates presented themselves to compete for the various prizes; nevertheless the judges reported to the committee that the workmanship was of a very superior order. In the town of Dunmow, as early as six o'clock, a new method was resorted to on this particular occasion, of exhibiting the bacon to the public till the time should arrive for it to be delivered over to the worthy old couple who were to receive it. A strong rope was made fast to the cupola on the Town-hall, and, being carried across, it was fastened to an opposite chimney; from the centre of this rope was suspended the gammon, decorated with ribbons, flowers, and foliage. The exhibition of cottagers' garden produce at the large room in the ancient Town-hall was very superior.

About half-past two o'clock, some wagons having been drawn into the centre of the town for that purpose, the prizes were delivered to the successful candidates, surrounded by a large concourse of persons. There were in the wagons, or in their own vehicles, present—Charles Grey Round, Esq., M.P., who kindly consented to act as president, and read the award list; the Revs. H. L. Majendie (vicar of Dunmow), W. Shepherd, J. Ridgeway, and J. Tweed, W. F. Wade, Esq., W. Gibbons, Esq., J. Green, Esq., Woodbridge, Esq., J. C. Briggs, Esq., J. J. Cribb, Esq., B. M. Fonkes, Esq.; Mr. Blyth, secretary; Mr. Lawrence, treasurer; Messrs. Low, Clayton, C. Clayton, W. Portway, Fitch, Stock, Hockley, Barnard, H. Barnard, Patmer, Randall, A. Barfield, assistant secretary, &c.

The gammon, most excellently fatted by the worthy donor, and cured by Mr. Taylor for this occasion, was taken down, and, at the time the qualification for its reception was read by the worthy gentleman who presided, was borne away on a stout stick between the saddens of the jolly old couple, amid the cheers of the assembled society and inhabitants of the neighbourhood.

We have not space for the entire list of prizes, but give the particulars of the award of the gammon of bacon to Samuel Boatman, aged 81, and Lucy, his wife, aged 60, of Barnston; recommended by Mr. W. J. Clayton. They had had thirteen children, three of whom are, or have been placed, in respectable service. Boatman has been twice married; his first wife lived with him thirty years, and had seven children; has lived with his present wife twenty years, who has had six children. His eldest son, aged 50, is married, and has five children, one of whom is married. Boatman has subscribed to a benefit club thirty-five years, and never received any thing from it, except for two weeks, when ill. He worked with one master twelve years, and with his last upwards of twenty. Has always paid his rent punctually, and, the committee were well aware, is a thoroughly respectable old English labourer.

At four o'clock about 40 gentlemen, connected with the society, dined at the Saracen's Head Inn, Dunmow, the Rev. H. L. Majendie (vicar) in the chair. The usual loyal and patriotic toasts were drunk; after which the Chairman proposed the health of the noble president, Viscount Maynard. C. G. Round, Esq., then proposed, in an eloquent speech—"Prosperity to the Dunmow Agricultural Society." Many other appropriate toasts were given, and duly acknowledged; among the rest, the Vice-Chairman gave—"The corporate body of the ancient town of Dunmow." Mr. Wade, in returning thanks, alluded to the gammon of bacon and the ceremony, and the more modern and rational manner of awarding it, adding, that as long as he lived in the corporation of Dunmow, the Agricultural Society should not want a donor of the gammon of bacon. The meeting was an exceedingly interesting one, and passed off with the utmost hilarity.

The annexed engraving represents an interesting relic of the original custom, it being the actual chair in which the happy couple, who obtained the flitch of bacon, were carried on men's shoulders round the site of the priory, at Dunmow, the bacon being borne in triumph before them; probably, it was the usual seat of the old abbots; it is in good condition, considering that several centuries have glided away since it was constructed. The origin of the custom is thus very briefly stated to be from Lord Fitzwalter, in the reign of Henry III., having ordered, that whatever married man did not repent of his marriage, or quarrel with his wife, in a year and a day after it, should go to his priory, at Dunmow, and demand the bacon, on his swearing to the truth, kneeling on two stones in the churchyard. These stones have long since been removed and lost, for they were not worn away in practice, memoranda of three claims only being found prior to the Reformation, and the same number since.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

THEATRICAL LICENSES.—Considerable apprehensions are entertained by the proprietors of those hybrid localities—half gin palaces, half theatres—that their licenses to mangle the drama, particularly the lyrical, may not be renewed to them on the expiration of their present permissions. It were a "consummation devoutly to be wished for," that some check should be put to the licentious inroads upon the purity of the genuine stage with which these resorts vitiate the public taste. Neither Thalia nor Melpomene were frequenters of The Pleraiic. It is no wonder that Drury-lane and Covent-garden so often prove bankrupt speculations, when there are so many temptations to the thoughtless and indifferent to have their appetites satiated with low apician gluttony, when they might feed with true epicurean enjoyment, if they liked, upon the daintiest dishes of the imagination. It is chiefly owing to these establishments that the cause of the genuine drama, although upheld in the judgment of the few by the Atlantean shoulders of honest Knowles, has been for some years on the decline, and that we are forced to say with Varro, on the death of Plautus, that "Comœdia luget—scena est deserta."

M. BLASS.—The country which has given birth to De Beriot, Vieuxtemps, and other musical worthies, has also the honour to boast of one of the first (if not the first) clarionet players in the world. M. Blass lately performed at Ghent before her Majesty Queen Victoria, and was truly distinguished (as the old Ant. Hall Hatt-player used to say of himself) for taste, tone, and execution.

DRURY LANE THEATRE.—Although several engagements have been concluded for this house up to Christmas, still "fur niente," so far at least as effects preparations for opening, seems to be the motto of the present laity. Among the engagements are Mrs. Alfred Shaw, Miss Romer, a Miss Howson (a sister of Albertazzi), Templeton, Harrison, H. Phillips, Stretton, Harley, Meadows, Cooper (who, as last season, is to be stage-manager), and Mrs. Stirling. We have already stated some arrangements for the ballet department, and, à ce qu'on dit, Dupree and Scandigt are likely to appear shortly after Christmas. The scenic arrangements will be under the management of the Grieves.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—This house, it is said, will open on the 2nd of October with a new comedy by Bourcicault, entitled "Woman," in which Mrs. Nesbitt, Mrs. Keely, &c., will appear. Danson, the clever painter of the al fresco pictorial effects at the Surrey Zoological Gardens, is engaged as one of the artists.

ADELPHI THEATRE.—This deservedly popular place of amusement will also open on the 2nd of October under the management of Mr. Gladstone. Various interesting novelties are in preparation; amongst the rest an adaptation from Scribe's "Grace de Dieu," or "Linda di Cramoont;" the heroine to be performed by Mrs. Yates, who may be said to be unrivalled in her portraits of domestic character.

MUSICAL REVISITINGS.—Our metropolis will be again illumined by the reappearance of the stars Grisi, Mario, and Sivori on Monday next, the 25th inst., at the Princess's Theatre, Oxford-street, when Lord Henry Ill., hors constellation, some of the élite of our English artistes will also bestow their light.

RIVAL TO LABLACHE.—A young acting-singer named Fioravanti (son to the celebrated composer), has just made a debut at the Teatro Nuovo at Naples, in the part of Don Pasquale, and was crowned with immense success.

GRAVESEND.—We perceive that Messrs. Grattan Cooke and Kirkmark announce a concert at the Literary Institution, at Gravesend, on Wednesday evening next; and from the success of their last concert, and their attractive aid, a bumper may be expected.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 19th Sept., 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—In my last letter to you I confined myself chiefly to a description of evening toilettes; I will now, if you please, give you some insight into the fashions which I have observed in the various promenades of this city. Let me mention, in the first place, two robes: the one of a sort of rose-coloured dimity, the other of chameleon taffety. The first is made with an open skirt, with double fallback in bears embroidered en soutache. The corsage is open to the waist, with a double cape forming a pelerine behind, and becoming wider and more full at the bottom of the corsage, which is embroidered in the same manner as the front of the skirt. The sleeves are plain, and the under skirt is in Scotch batiste. The second is made of a rich silk, trimmed with a plaiting or puffing à la vierge of similar material; the corsage is plain, open at the neck, and brought to a rounded point, trimmed in front with a row of silk buttons, the sleeves plain, and wide frill, forming a jocket, and shirred with India muslin at the opening; the under petticoat is in batiste, trimmed with two deep flounces of lace. Besides these dresses I particularly noticed two bérége robes, the one sea-green, the other a most rose-coloured and white; the first was trimmed with two deep festooned flounces; the corsage high, gathered at the waist and plain above, the sleeves moderately wide, terminated with cuffs. The second was trimmed with two festooned frills: the band of the sleeve and ruffles are lace of a rich pattern. The sash is worn long, and is made of rose-coloured and green taffety. The other dress was trimmed on the skirt with two deep flounces en tablier; the corsage was open à la vierge, gathered at the waist and from the shoulder; the sleeves are shirred plain, and trimmed with a frill of the same stuff. I shall not detain you much longer with a description of accessory details; it will, however, be necessary to give you a slight idea of the different fancies which our public promenades offer to the observer. Let us then take, in the first instance, a sort of neckhandkerchief, or scarf, of India muslin, pleated from the shoulder to the waist, with a collar formed of two rows of festooned muslin, and another handkerchief, also of India muslin, but with the collar of lace. I have also remarked a scarf in white bérége, and a mantelet of embroidered muslin, with two pelerines, which do not descend lower than the waist, very much scalloped at the upper part of the arm, and falling in front in long squared ends, and trimmed all round it with rich and broad lace. As a further conservation, I should tell you, scarfs of black lace are much worn and very becoming. Hats of paille de riz, trimmed with a long willow plume, or with roses with taffety ribbons of the same shade, and hats of white crape lisse, lined with rose taffety and trimmed with a bunch of heath, are exceedingly fashionable, as are also fancy straw hats trimmed with white crimped ribbons, and with a small branch of roses; the interior of the brim is ornamented with a rich of taffety ribbon.

Adieu, HENRIETTE DE B.

THE MARKETS.

CORN-EXCHANGE.—Since our last report we have received only a moderate time-of-year supply of English wheat up to this morning's market. Most of the new samples having come in hand in middling condition, the demand for the best qualities has ruled firm, at, in most instances, the advance of 1s. per quarter, and good clean samples have been readily effected. In free foreign wheat a large business has been done, and the quotations have improved 1s. per quarter. The trade is now 2s. per quarter. Although the supplies of barley and malt have been small, the inquiry for them being dull prection is evidently in progress and those who feel inclined to work, do not now complain of want of employment. OPENING OF THE WESLEYAN THEOLOGICAL INSTITUTION, AT RICHMOND.

This extensive building, of which we gave an engraving in No. 67 of our journal, having been happily completed, Friday last, the 15th inst., was fixed on for the ceremonial of the opening.

Previous to the directly religious engagements of the occasion, the officers and friends of the institution met together at breakfast. The company altogether numbered about three hundred, and included the president of the Conference (Rev. John Scott), the president of the Theological Institution (Rev. Dr. Bunting), the governor, tutors, and other officers of the Southern Branch, most of the Wesleyan ministers in London and the neighbourhood, and a number of the supporters of the institution, male and female.

At one o'clock, the committee, the ministers, and other friends present, and the students, assembled in the large lecture-room, in order to the special services of the day. Dr. Bunting gave out hymn 744, "The Saviour, when to heaven he rose," which was sung; after which the Rev. Joseph Sutcliffe, A.M., engaged in prayer.

Dr. Bunting then addressed the assemblage, in which he entertained strong objections to this place being called the Richmond College;—it was the Richmond INSTITUTION;—to speak more diffusely, the Richmond Branch of the Wesleyan Theological Institution. He hoped his excellent friends to whom would be permanently and regularly entrusted the management of the institution, and the education of the young brethren, would concur with him in the opinion he had just expressed. There were many things implied in what was properly, speaking, a college which they did not aim to realise in this establishment. He congratulated the friends of the institution on the numerous assemblage now congregated. It was nearly a hundred years ago—namely, at the Conference of 1744—that the propriety of instituting a "seminary," as it was then termed, was first mooted; and this institution was, therefore, in principle anything but an innovation. The question proposed to the Conference of 1744 was, "Can we have a seminary for labourers?" He hoped the young brethren who were receiving instruction in the Theological Institution would always bear this in mind that, when the establishment of such an institution, or seminary, was first suggested, it was proposed for the instruction and training of "labourers." His young brethren must remember that they were to be "labourers"; and if he thought that anything they might learn, or any habits which they might acquire, in that institution, would unfit them for labour, or disincline them to labour, he would most deeply regret its establishment. But he anticipated a very different result. He anticipated that, by the blessing of God upon the assiduous efforts of their tutors, they would, in this institution, learn how to labour, and be strengthened in their determination to labour, faithfully and zealously, wherever their lot might be cast. He had stated that, at the Conference of 1744, the question was proposed, "Can we have a seminary for labourers?" The answer was, "If God spare us till another Conference." The subject was resumed at the next Conference, and it was asked, "Can we have a seminary for labourers yet?" "Not yet," was the answer; "not till God gives us a proper tutor." The want of a proper tutor was the only reason assigned why an establishment similar in principles and objects to this institution was not made coeval with the earliest periods of Wesleyan Methodism. At the end of a century, that which even at the early period he had referred to was felt to be a desideratum had now, by the providence of God, been supplied. An institution had been established which, for the sake of convenience, had branched into two divisions: one of those branches having been opened, last September, at Didsbury, near Manchester, which was called the Northern Branch; and the other, or Southern Branch, being that which they were now assembled, in a more formal and solemn manner than had heretofore been done, to dedicate to the service of God. They seemed, indeed, to have all they required, except two things. They did want more money. (Hear, hear.) It might be said, "Why did you erect such an expensive building as this? We cannot help doing justice to the architectural merit of the building; we must allow that it is beautiful and commodious; but have you not spent upon the erection of the building money which might have been better applied to the support of the institution?" He would reply, "No; these premises are a present to the institution, from the Centenary Fund, by a grant made for the specific purpose of such an erection; and I am informed that not one farthing of the money subscribed by individual friends for the support of the institution—for the maintenance and instruction of the students—will have to be appropriated to defray the cost of the building. (Hear, hear.) He believed it would not be necessary to trench upon any funds contributed for the maintenance of the institution; but that the sum granted from the Centenary Fund would just be sufficient to defray the expenses of the purchase, and of the erection of this beautiful and commodious structure, which was so well calculated to accomplish the monumental and commemorative part of the various noble objects contemplated in the original plan of the Centenary Fund. Since, then, they had obtained such convenient accommodation,—and since there was in the building a considerable number of students, to whom he hoped more would be hereafter added,—it now remained for them to provide means for the annual support of the institution.

The Rev. Dr. Dixon, after repeated calls from the audience, came forward and congratulated the meeting on the occasion on which they had then met. He thought the building in which they had now assembled was a beautiful exhibition of genius and taste. He greatly admired the edifice; he thought it very characteristic; it had the appearance of a religious edifice; there was something about it ecclesiastical and scholastic. In one view of the case, it was the result of benevolence; in another, it was the product of religious genius; and he congratulated the architect on the completion of his work. He was wonder-struck when he found himself—a Wesleyan Methodist Minister—located in this beautiful edifice,—surrounded by a royal park, and near a more than royal river. He congratulated the assembly on the completeness and convenience of the building; and concluded by observing that he hoped they might say now, as heretofore, that "the best of all is that God is with them."

The Treasurer of the Institution, Thomas Farmer, Esq., then addressed the assemblage, and, having resigned his office, added, that he had lately made an investment in the purchase of £500 stock, in the public funds, in order that the interest might be annually applied to its permanent support. ("Hear," and applause.)

The Rev. Dr. Bunting then read the 4th chapter of the second epistle to Timothy; and after prayer by the Rev. F. J. Jobson, the benediction was pronounced by the President.

It had been arranged that the sermon by the President of the Conference, with which the services were to close, should be delivered in the Wesleyan Chapel, Richmond; but it was found that the number of friends in attendance was too large to be accommodated in that building. Under these circumstances, the lawn in front of the institution was prepared for the reception of the congregation, the weather being most favourable for an open-air service. Shortly before four o'clock, the Rev. Thomas Jackson offered up a fervent and most powerful prayer, and read a portion of the Scriptures; after which the President (Rev. John Scott) delivered an impressive and very profitable discourse. The text was—Psalm iv. 3—"Know that the Lord hath set apart him that is godly for himself." After singing and prayer, the assembly dispersed, having derived not only high gratification, but, we trust, permanent spiritual benefit, from the engagements of the day.

We have abridged the above details from the Watchman. Our engravings represent the fine entrance-hall, with groined ceiling, and the principal staircase, branching off right and left. This leads to the library, shown in the second engraving: it is 35 feet by 20 feet, and 20 feet high. It is lit by a single window at one end, of lofty proportions, and which is the oriel over the entrance, and indicates the apartment to be carried up to the height of two stories. It is a noble room, and the appointments are in excellent taste. Lastly, we annex portraits of the Reverend Presidents of the Conference, and of the Institution.

THE MISMANAGEMENT OF WEALTH.

If a foreigner were to be asked, after a residence—even a short one—in England, what he considered the great peculiarity of society in this country, he would undoubtedly reply, contrast. He could have made but little use of the observant faculties if the startling evidences of this peculiarity have not met him wherever he turned. Let him walk the streets of this great city, and a conviction of the existence of immense masses of wealth, proved by its outward manifestations, luxury and magnificence, will be pressed forcibly upon him: they stand in the highway and the broad path of every day life; the flash and the glitter are on every side of him; he leaves behind him the mansion of the noble, only to meet advancing the chariot of the merchant, who, enriched by commerce, is enabled to vie in splendour with the earl who blazons a descent from the Conquest. He stands still, and the living stream passes by him, ever tinged with the hues of wealth; the tide of life will seem to him as if it ran above the golden sands of the fabled Pactolus. But let him turn aside from the great channel, where all that is visible seems flushed with "pride and purple"—let him seek the localities less known, less inviting to the eye, less examined, but not less deserving examination, and there he will discover—what? Proofs not to be mistaken—evidences not to be misunderstood—signs that convince alike the physical and the moral senses, of a poverty as startling as the pomp—of a misery as great as the luxury—of a destitution as complete and hopeless as the splendour he has just left is undeniable; and both conditions are co-existent; the rags and the purple are side by side; hunger is the neighbour of excess, and a few steps are often all that divides the house of feasting from the house of want. The plenty and the dearth in the dream of Pharoah were correctives of each other, but here the fat kine and the lean dwell in the same pasture and there is no change in the condition of either. The extremes lie close together, but, alas, they do not "meet," and herein is a great part of the misery; there is, unhappily, nothing new in all this; the wealthiest nations have always had a mass of poverty among them; Dives in the hall, has never been without the Lazarus at the gate; but few nations, we believe, have existed in which such wealth and such poverty might be seen together, as may be seen in England in the present day. Though it can be but imperfectly done in the limited space we can command, we wish to point out what we conceive to be one of the causes of this evil—the utter disparity in the condition of the many and the few; were our power to prove it as great as our conviction is complete, we think we could show that the mismanagement of great wealth, is the source of our deepest destitution.

There are two principles always in active operation in this country, which, like many other principles, are productive both of good and evil, according as they are directed,—the competition of capital with capital and of labour with labour.

It is the first of these only that we have to allude to here, for it has given the most singular proofs of what may be called the mismanagement of wealth. The capitalist, wishing to find a field for the employment of his money, sees most of the outlets occupied, and is discontented; the consequence is, he catches with rather too great an eagerness at any scheme that promises a higher rate of interest. And how schemes do promise! It is not till too late that it is discovered that promise and performance are frequently very little akin to each other. The possession of a large mass of wealth seems sometimes absolutely to incapacitate its possessor to direct it wisely; men, who in the dealings of every day life, in matters that involve only the outlay of a moderate sum, are sharp and cautious—nay, sometimes sparing more than is need, considering their station—lose all these qualities, and become possessed with a sort of blind infatuation when the question is of the disposal of the greater part, or all, they possess. He will not purchase the new villa, which he cannot help thinking would be rather a comfortable thing; he demurs to the outlay for the new furniture his wife is anxious for, and delays promising his daughter the new harp she has set her heart upon. But lo! there is a new scheme in the money market that "promises" a large per centage, and the cautious man is made rash by the hope of gain, and forthwith invests his thousands in shares in some foreign loan to some republic sprung into existence but yesterday, and whose securities are the revenues to be created by the commerce that is yet to be. The bubble bursts—his shares are worth the paper they are written on, and no more, and the fabric of wealth is shaken to its foundation. The rich man is crippled in his resources, and descends in the social scale to a lower level, or struggles to maintain his position by expedients that waste the mind and energies more than the humiliation of descending at once—or worse still, is entirely beggared. Then follows a scene of private and individual misery that we should in vain endeavour to paint—the keenest suffering falls where there was the greatest fault, but there is also an effect produced upon society at large, which cannot be disregarded. It is impossible to calculate the injury which England, as a nation, has sustained from the "mismanagement of wealth." The readiness with which almost any scheme for raising money in this country, to be carried abroad, is met, is perfectly marvellous. Loans to bankrupt Kingdoms, loans to mushroom Republics, loans to petty states, that are but fractional parts of a great Federation—the only question as to the securities for the advances to all of them being the doubt as to which can be pronounced the worst: all of these appear to be filled up, to be subscribed to, and obtained, with most unfortunate facility. At this moment the amount of British property which has been lent to, and spent by, the different states of America, is fifty-five millions sterling! The Republic of America is not responsible for the debt; it has been lent to the separate states, on their separate bonds; and "repudiation" has been of late a popular doctrine. There are signs of a better feeling returning, but the whole is yet in jeopardy. The situation of England in the mart of nations, is like that of Shylock on the Rialto, when Tubal announces the "merchant's" bankruptcy. He no sooner hears of his loss by America, than he is told that Mexico is insolvent! "There—there again have I another bad match—a bankrupt—a prodigal!" Still there comes "loss upon loss;" for again he hears that Greece is unable to answer the summons—"Pay me what thou owest." For this last announcement, however, he has some consolation in the fact that the Government of England, with more generosity to the subjects of King Otho than justice to its own overtaxed and underfed millions, is a joint security for the payment. All have failed, and John Bull looks at his worthless "bonds," recollecting, with a sigh, how, like the debtor of the Jew, they all "came so smug upon the Mart," that he did not suspect them. He now denounces their fraud—but he should also throw some of the blame upon his own avidity. It will be well if these repeated losses teach our capitalists at last something like caution, and show them that in sending their money out of the country they risk it on all the chances of wars and internal convulsions, or the doubtful integrity of nations and states, over which neither themselves nor the Government of their own country have any effectual control. What vast sums, again, are invested and are being invested in the construction of French and Belgian railroads? Yet with the first shot fired in a continental war the whole of it will be as much lost as if it had been thrown into the Atlantic! Is not this the "mismanagement of wealth?" Could it not be better employed? Are there no fields nearer home? If looked for, we think they might be found. Ireland abounds in labour and land, yet there is not as much English capital invested in this integral part of the empire as in a single French railway! Surely if the profit would be something less, the security would be greater, and as an individual as well as a national matter, it would be better to gain only a little, than, in so many cases, to lose all. We say nothing of the thousand bubble companies that have been born of native ingenuity, for the transfer of native capital from the pocket of the easily satisfied rich man to that of the unprincipled sharper. Yet they have absorbed no small amount, and played a distinguished part in the "mismanagement of wealth." That important element of greatness is ill directed in other ways. It has been proved that our railroads are far more expensively constructed than they need be for the purposes they are meant to answer; we might have had a greater number of miles laid down for the same money. Here again is capital wasted. Another enormous scene of mismanagement is the extravagance in spending, and the carelessness in watching over, the public revenue by the Government—not by this Government or that—but by all. The frauds at the custom house have been going on for years, and have stopped thousands upon thousands yearly in their way to the Exchequer. In the Exchequer itself a fraud of the most enormous kind is discovered, which leaves the public to suffer by the amount of thousands and thousands more. Is it any wonder we are told that an Income Tax is "necessary?" Whether we look at individuals or Governments, seeing the inconsistencies of carelessness and avidity they both exhibit, must we not acknowledge that "the mismanagement of wealth" is a serious failing of our national character?

DINNER TO GENERAL ESPARTERO AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.

On Tuesday the Lord Mayor gave a grand dinner at the Mansion-house to General Espartero, his lordship having arranged to commence to him on this occasion the resolutions agreed to by the Common Council on the 1st of this month, expressive of regret at the retirement of the ex-Regent from Spain.

General Espartero, on arriving at a quarter to six o'clock, was loudly cheered by the multitude. He was shortly afterwards introduced by the Lord Mayor to the aldermen and common councilmen, who were assembled in one of the rooms of the Mansion-house, where an extraordinary court of the common council was then held.

The Lord Mayor having taken the chair, communicated to General Espartero, who stood at his right hand, the resolutions of the court of common council of the 1st of September, which are to the following effect:—"That this court, feeling a deep interest in the independence and prosperity of the Spanish people, intimately connected as they are with that state of commercial and political intercourse which must tend to the mutual advantage of both nations, has witnessed, with disappointment and sorrow, the forced retirement of the Regent of Spain from that country, which, under his zealous and patriotic guidance, was making rapid strides in the path of constitutional government and healthful internal policy.

"That it desires to express its sincere sympathy with the Regent in the frustration of his wise and philanthropic plans for the permanent happiness of Spain, and its cordial wish that the triumph of those principles may be of lasting duration by the country he has served so faithfully; feeling assured that the happiness of the people, the only valuable end of good government, would be thereby increased."

General Espartero then addressed the Lord Mayor, expressing his gratitude for the sympathy shown towards him by the common council of the City of London. The general was not in any uniform, but was in full dress. He wore the ribbon and star of the Order of the Bath, and the decoration of the Golden Fleece. In stature he is not above the middle height. He is, however, well proportioned, and has an eye full of fire and expression. He spoke in the Spanish language, and delivered his sentences with such an earnestness of manner and such a grace of emphasis and action, as produced a very great effect upon his auditory. The conclusion of his short address was followed by cheers.

The Lord Mayor then said, that in compliance with the request of the Duke of Victoria, he would read in English the speech which his Highness had just delivered. It was to the following effect: "I accept with gratitude the generous sentiments and sympathy shown me by the court of common council. The feelings expressed by the corporation of this great city are the same as those by which I am animated. As a citizen, as a soldier, and as Regent of Spain, my efforts have ever been directed to obtain the independence, the liberty, and welfare of my country, and consolidate the constitutional throne of my Queen. Spain, unfortunate as at present, will one day be as prosperous as she deserves to be, and, intimately connected with England, her natural ally, and with all civilised nations, will contribute her share to the general happiness of mankind." (Great applause.)

The Lord Mayor with his distinguished guests then retired, and shortly afterwards proceeded to the Egyptian Hall, where the banquet was served up. The company which sat down to dinner was exceedingly numerous, there being about 300 persons present. Besides the principal guest of the Lord Mayor there were among the company—General Van Halen, Major-General Lacarte, Colonel Falcon, Colonel Mendicuti, Colonel Barcaiztegui, Colonel Quesada, Colonel Gurrea, Colonel Orio, Major Murrita, Major Mendiuna, Senor Basterrechi, Senor Paredes, Senor Montesinos, Senor Mendigalgolia, Senor Laserna, Col. Fitch, Lord Dudley Stuart, Viscount Canning, Major-General Sir Burgess Camac, Lieutenant-Colonel Wildman, Lieutenant-Colonel Sir H. Webster, the Hon. R. Otway Cave, M.P., J. Masterman, Esq., M.P., G. Lyall, Esq., M.P., Sir W. Clay, Bart., M.P., H. G. Ward, Esq., M.P., &c. &c. &c.

When the dinner was concluded, and the usual loyal and national toasts had been duly honoured,

The Lord Mayor, in a speech of considerable length, the spirit of which is to be found in the address of the common council, proposed General Espartero's health, which was most enthusiastically responded to, and drank with loud cheers.

Mr. Hobbs then sang the following song, written for the occasion, with admirable taste and effect; and in order that General Espartero should understand its import, Mr. Hobbs, one of the guests, at the moment translated it into French, and presented it to the General:—

From the birth-place of chivalry, sunshine, and song,
Where the wild mountain stream rushes laughing along—
With the laurels of victory fresh on his brow,
A warrior, a chieftain, feasts with us now;
Oh! comes he in triumph, oh, comes he in pride,
To grace with his glories a Briton's fireside;
To tread the proud soil of the fair and the free;
Espartero, what charm has Old England for thee?

Our breezes have borne us each land that have done,
Our cliffs hard the echo of each field thou hast won,
Our echoes exulting have caught the glad strain—
"Long live Espartero, and freedom for Spain."
Gallant chief! can it be that thou com'st but to crave
A boon that in Britain is claim'd by the slave,
A shelter from foemen, a home mid the free?
Esparteri! Old England shall yield them to thee.

Oh! ne'er be thy brow, gallant chieftain, cast down,
Though fortune is fickle—oh! heed not her frown;
Though by foes for the moment thy councils have cross'd,
Not a leaf from the wreath of thy glory is lost;
More great from misfortune, more dear from defeat,
A friend in each true hearted Briton thou hast met.
Here, here, let thy home and thy resting place be,
From our hearts, Esparteri, here's "Welcome to thee!"

General Espartero rose, amidst loud cheers, which were prolonged for some time, and in a very animated and expressive manner addressed the company in Spanish, returning thanks for the cordial manner in which his health had been toasted. General Espatero's speech, which was subsequently read in English to the company by the Lord Mayor, was to the following purport:—"My Lord Mayor and Gentlemen, the generous and hospitable reception I have met with from the British people, their Queen, and government, will ever be to me a source of most grateful recollection. The British nation, the high-minded and liberal British people, have thoroughly understood the feelings which guided the actions of him who has now the honour of addressing you, and who, having hoisted the constitutional flag of his country, carried it victoriously until finally the enemies of liberty disappeared. Solemnly elected Regent of Spain by the national will, I was determined to govern the kingdom with the law in my hand; to preserve the law, and to allow no one to transgress the law. The enemies of the liberty and independence of my country, and of the constitutional throne of my Queen, are indebted for their momentary triumph to that religious respect which I have ever shown to be the fundamental law of the state. But I shall never, on that account, regret that such has been my conduct, for I am convinced that such is the only conduct that a constitutional Regent ought to follow. Thus, it was my intention, when the time fixed by the constitution for the Queen Isabel II. to commence the exercise of her legitimate and constitutional authority should arrive, that she should find herself at the head of a flourishing and great kingdom, quiet within, respected without, and progressing to that prosperity to which it is entitled by its position, its climate, and the character of its people. I have asserted it a hundred times, and it is with satisfaction that I now repeat it here—to secure and consolidate public and civil liberty in my country—to preserve intact the constitutional throne of Isabel II.—to deliver into her hands the authority with which I had been invested, precisely in the manner determined by the law, and then to retire into private life and to become once more a private citizen—such were ever my wishes, such was my determination. An evil destiny has prevented the fulfilment of my intentions, and I have been obliged to quit from my country. But in the midst of my misfortune it is a great consolation to have met with so generous a reception in this, the classic soil of constitutional liberty, whence I offer the most fervent vows for the happiness of my country; and, whatever be the may lead me, I shall always have the most lively recollection of the sympathy shown me by the British people, and more particularly by the City of London, the prosperity of which I now beg leave to offer as a toast."

The toast was drunk with enthusiasm.

The Lord Mayor next proposed the health of General Van Halen, and the suite of General Espartero. General Van Halen returned thanks.

The next toast was "Viscount Canning and the House of Lords." Viscount Canning returned thanks, regretting that other noble lords, more able than himself to respond to the toast, were not present. He was sure they would have been present if they could; and had they been there, they could not fail to admire the magnificent and princely hospitality with which the first magistrate of the first city in the would had welcomed the illustrious stranger, whom adverse circumstances had driven to their shores. He trusted that, whatever future events might occur, wherever General Espartero remembered that night, he would bear in mind that that reception was given him as a man who had discharged the duties of the highest situation to which a subject could be called with scrupulous honesty to the interests of his country, and with unflinching fidelity to his young Queen (cheers).

The Lord Mayor next proposed "the health of Mr. Ward and the House of Commons," observing that he had received a letter from Lord Stanley, apologising for his absence on account of having hurt his foot, while shooting at Sir Robert Peel's, last Saturday.

Mr. Ward returned thanks, bearing, at the same time, the strongest testimony to the honest and disinterested character of General Espartero; and expressing his belief that the only security for constitutional liberty in Spain would be the recal of General Espartero, These observations elicited loud cheers.

General Espartero proposed "The Lady Mayoress's health," and Viscount Canning proposed "The health of the Lord Mayor."

The Lord Mayor returned thanks, and then proposed "The health of the City Members." In doing so he adverted to the recent death of Sir Matthew Wood, observing, that all would agree in saying that, as far as corporation purposes were concerned, Sir Matthew Wood had been a most valuable member for the corporation. His lordship also said, that Lord J. Russell would have attended on the present occasion, had he been in London. The toast being duly honoured, Mr. Masterman returned thanks.

The Duchess of Victoria, though at the Mansion-house, did not join the dinner-party, but she was for a short time a spectatress, from the balcony in the Egyptian Hall, of the hospitable welcome given to her husband by the Lord Mayor.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SPAIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—PARIS, Sept. 26.—Notwithstanding the telegraphic despatches published last night by the French government, the news from Spain continues unfavourable to the Moderates. From all parts advices have been received that the insurrection is gaining ground. In Grenada the populace paraded the streets, singing the "Tragala;" in Valencia many of the authorities openly declared themselves against the ministers; in Gallicia the peasantry are arming; in Saragossa, on the evening of the 17th, the municipality and national guards declared in favour of a Central Junta, and organised a Provisional Junta; on the 19th they had undisturbed possession of the fortress, the Captain-General being in the neighbourhood of Almara; in short, the whole of the country is in a state of commotion. Madrid, I am entitled to state, is far from being tranquil; the opposition acts with great vigour, and in all probability will carry the elections. The last accounts given them 1200 votes, the ministerialists 1110: the result of the general election will be known in the capital on the 21st, and a few days afterwards made public. Great discontent has been shown in the higher classes, and many remonstrances made, against the honour conferred on M. Olozaga by bestowing on him the order of the Golden Fleece. That order was formerly given only to crowned heads, princes of the blood, and on very special occasions, to men who had rendered eminent services to the state. It would be difficult to find out the services of M Olozaga, excepting his intrigues against Espartero. There are at present only forty-six persons possessing this decoration. I believe Prince Albert is one of the number. In military circles there is much disaffection at the nomination of General Laurenzo Sanz as Captain-General of Catalonia, over Arazuz, and the appointment to the heads of divisions in the Principality of Generals Lara, Shelly, and Campuzano—officers not known in the field of action, but possessing much influence in the War-office. The ministers are strengthening their position on the provincial militias, and reorganising free corps in every district. Narvaez strongly objects to this measure. He is aware that the people are opposed to the Christinos, and that the instant they are armed they will turn them against them. In all probability join the insurgents. Lopez, on the other hand, strongly supports the measure. From all that the standing army does not exceed 50,000 men, a force insufficient to preserve the tranquility of the country in support of the dominion of the government. It was generally supposed that Narvaez, supported by Serano, would gain the point, and then risk the existence of the present order of things rather than run the chance of a public declaration against the Christinos. The following telegraphic despatches were received last night:—

"Barcelona, Sept. 21.

"Prim and Blanco have attacked Saint Andre, occupied by the advanced guard of Amedder. With great difficulty they got possession of the first houses in the village; the engagement has lasted two days. Arazo has arranged with the Junta to suspend hostilities between the insurgents of Barcelona and the citadel."

"Barcelona, Sept. 21.

"Prim put in complete devroi this morning the insurgents entrenched at Saint André; at eight o'clock the Christinos were in possession of all the houses. He has made 200 prisoners; the remainder were killed or ran away. Melers is wounded The suspension of hostilities between Barcelona and the citadel only lasted twenty-four hours. The citadel and fort Montjuich are firing to-day in the direction of the sea-port and Atazaranas"

"Barcelona, Sept. 23.

"The insurrection has not succeeded at Reuss; the insurgents driven from the town have gained the mountains. Amedder has abandoned Badalona, and retreated with his small division on Tiana. Montjuich has ceased firing

"Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 21

"Vich and Puycerda have refused to acknowledge the Junta; the national guard of those places which adhere to the movement refuse marching. A great number of those who had departed have returned From the tenor of these despatches it would be imagined that the cause of the insurgents was more than desperate—we have Amedder beaten and the National Guards refusing to march, and to support the opinions in consequence of the struggle is very doubtful. I have long been connected with Spanish warfare, and am aware of the exaggeration in Spanish bulletins. During the late war in the Basque provinces it was a standing formula for generals to order only one-fourth of the number of killed and prisoners; nor was the possession of the ground after an action any sign of a victory, for it frequently happens in guerilla warfare not to remain long in one particular spot, but to carry on a rapid movement of march from one place to another: this was the tactics observed by Zumalacarregui, who, although according to the Christino bulletins was constantly beaten, succeeded in driving his opponents from almost every place in the provinces. It is a fact, that were the number taken of the killed, during the Carlist war, according to the Christino reports, it would far exceed the whole population of Spain. You must, therefore, wait before you form any opinion as to the result of the struggle. The insurgents also publish reports of successes; General Amedder writes under date of the 19th, that he has been joined by the valorosery of Gerona, commanded by General Francisco Bellera, and the volunteers of Mataro, Tordera, Canelor, Canet, Azenys de Mar, and Villa-Seva-de-Dul. The Central Junta has issued a proclamation declaring that the following places have completed the movement:—Gerona, Olot, Castelfolish, Figueras Tordera, Canet, Calella, Azenys de Mar, Villa-Seva-de-Dul, Villasa de Bas, Sabadell, Hospitalet, San Andres de Palomas, San Roy, Villanueva y Geltro, and several villages The commissioners, on their return from Madrid, published a manifesto, in which they state "that they could obtain nothing satisfactory from the ministry, that indeed nothing could be expected from a ministry under whose government the plains of Spain Was in the greatest confusion, the country in one of the national impoverishment, as at another period it was by England. The greatest misery reigns in Barcelona, and workmen are literally dying from starvation. The following challenge has been sent by Lieutenant Cosiko Fernandez to Prim:—

"If you ex-Brigadier Prim has still a spark of honour left—if his friendship towards the liberals is as great as he pretends—he may yet show himself worthy of wearing the honourable uniform of a Spanish soldier, by accepting my challenge. To avoid a recrimination of conditions against this honourable city (Barcelona), the undersigned challenges him to single combat, at any place and hour he may name. The two combatants to appear on the field on horseback, and fight until death. Prim! if thou hast any courage, get on horseback and then with thou find in me an antagonist worthy of thee! Shoulder thou not accept my challenge, I will call thee infamous coward and bastard!"

The last accounts from Saragossa give that the greater part of Lower Aragon was in a state of great uneasiness, and that the agents of the Junta were everywhere well received, and met with great encouragement. The government is seriously alarmed at the unpleasant state of affairs in Aragon, and have sent General Concha at the head of a small division against the insurgents at Saragosse. The Captain General remains inactive.

ITALY.—The accounts received from Italy continue very contradictory. The Government publish, that the insurgents, beaten on all sides, have been obliged to fly into the mountains Private letters, however, state, that the whole of Italy is more or less infested with brigands and the insurgents, or, as they are now called, Young Italy Confidence may be placed in the following communication. "Rome, September 14.—We have received, by an extraordinary express, information that the diligence, and the dragoons who escorted it, were attacked by a band of 150 men, armed with English rifles. The dragoons were made prisoners. It is reported that the band has attacked several cavalry posts, and got possession of their arms and horses. The news has created a great sensation in the Pasce, and a council was held yesterday. Several battalions of infantry have marched to Cesene

There has been lately printed at Milan a statistic of works published in Italy during the past year. It appears that in 1843 the number of new works was 3,905, six times as many as in any preceding year. Of these 3,905 works, forming 5,807 volumes, 668 were published in Lombardy; 1,101 in Venice; 503 in Piedmont and Sardinia; 395 in Tuscany; 326 in the Papal States; 174 in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies; 73 in the Duchy of Parma; 19 in the Duchy of Modena; and 11 in the Duchy of Lucques.

The Neapolitan government is actively engaged in establishing a regular service of steam-boats between Naples and Ancona, to touch at Messina, Taranto, Gallipoli, Bari, Barletta, and Manfredonia. Three steam-boats for this purpose are already launched, and a fourth is already on the stocks. It is generally reported that the service will commence in the month of January, next year.

GREECE.—The French government have published a telegraph despatch announcing the arrival at Athens of the 15th and 16th September, an insurrection broke out at Athens; this news was brought by the French steam-boat the Mentor.

We publish a few extracts from the Presse:—"The news received from Athens by the Mentor is of extreme importance. All the details are not yet known. We only know that a revolt broke out in the evening of the 14th instant; that the regular army marched towards the new royal Palace, which stands in an isolated position, a little beyond the city; that they were able to surround it so completely that none of the King's Ministers were able to get access to him; that separate bodies of the insurgents were appointed by lot, which each of the Ministers and the members of the Areopagus, or Supreme Court of Justice; and that the King, finding himself incapable of opposing the will of men resolute in demanding the constitution to be constantly promised, but never kept, consented, and hung out of from the Bavarians who composed his Privy Council, and held other confidential posts near him, was compelled to give way, and enter into an immediate engagement to grant a constitution, and send away his Bavarians. The vessel that brought this news made the passage from Athens to Marseilles in eight days, and the important accounts she brought were at once made known by a telegraphic despatch.'

The Greek Observer of the 15th inst. publishes the following account of the bloodless revolution:—Last night, at 2 o clock A.M., a few musket-shots fired in the air announced the assembling of the people in the different quarters of Athens. Soon afterwards the inhabitants, accompanied by the entire garrison, marched towards the square of the palace crying, "The Constitution for ever!" On reaching the place the entire garrison, the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, drew up under the windows of the King, in front of the palace, and the people having stationed themselves in the rear, all in one voice demanded a constitution. The King appeared at a low window, and assured the people that he would take into consideration their demand and that of the army, after consulting with his Ministers, the Council of State, and the representatives of the Foreign Powers, But the commander, M. Calergi, having stepped forward, made known to his Majesty that the Ministry was no longer recognised, and that the Council of State was already deliberating on the best course to be adopted under existing circumstances.

Two documents drawn up by the Council of State were then presented to his Majesty by a deputation, and whilst he was perusing them, the representatives of the foreign Powers presented themselves at the Palace, and were told by the Comman der that nobody could be admitted at that moment, the King being in conference with the deputation of the Council of State. The latter came out two hours afterwards, and in the consent of the King. The new Ministry then repaired to the Palace, where they held a long consultation with his Majesty, who shortly appeared on the balcony, surrounded by his Ministers and other personages, and was received with acclamations by the people. "Long live the Constitutional King" resounded, together with that of "The Constitution for ever. The new Ministers entered immediately on the discharge of their functions.

The day after the revolution was decided, on the part of the regular army, by the Colonel of Cavalry (Demetri Calergi), and on that of the irregular army by Colonel Macryayo. At three o clock in the afternoon the garrison, after defiling before the Palace, re-entered their quarters, preceded by their bands, amidst the acclamations of the people. An hour afterwards the city, in which order had not been an instant disturbed, resumed its customary aspect.

The 15th of the 3rd of September will hereafter be kept as a great national festivity. It will have consolidated the throne, and secured the future prosperity of Greece. The enthusiasm which inspires us, and which we endeavour to communicate in the following sketch, is worthy alone to give to history a clear exposé of the facts, does not permit us to conceal the spontaneousness and the affecting and exemplary unanimity of that revolution. The Greek people has placed itself, from that moment, on a level with the most civilised nations, and the most worthy of sympathy. It has made a pure and spotless revolution, although it has but a few years emerged from an oppression of ages. Europe, we are sure, will do them justice. Such events have reason to believe that similar movements to that of Athens took place simultaneously in the principal provinces.

The students of the university joined the movement, and were remarkable for their patriotism and moderation.

Letters from Athens of the 17th state that all foreigners holding offices under Government were to be dismissed, including even M. Lemaire and other French men employed in the construction of the National Bank The chiefs of the movement had adopted every precaution for the safety of that establishment; the Minister of Finance had beforehand informed of the hour at which the movement was to take place, and 12 hours before it broke out, sentries were placed during the night for its protection by M. Calergi. The revolution was effected without any violence. The troops were arrested in their houses, but liberated on the next morning. An Aide-de-Camp of the King, M. Gardelanchi, was arrested, but was also superintended, and confined in the barracks, where he, however, remained a prisoner only a few hours

It appears that the King yielded with bad grace, when he found that all resistance on his part would be unavailing It was eleven o'clock A.M. when his obstinacy was subdued. The military bands were then playing the "Marseillaise," and the "Parisienne," which gave his Majesty some cause to suppose that affairs might proceed to unpleasant extremities. On the 16th King Otho took his Ministers by surprise during, and was saluted, as he passed along the streets, with cries from the people and soldiers of "Long live the Constitutional King!" An exception had been made in the decree of exclusion against foreigners in favour of the old Philhellene Count Metaxa, who held office under the Government.

BANKS OF THE RHINE.—The Emperor of Austria has joined the truly noble intentions of the King of Bavaria, who proposed to create from the members of the Confederation, an annual contribution for the completion of the cathedral of Cologne. The Emperor has promised to contribute 40,000fl. (about £400, annually.

Prince Augustus of Saxe Cobourg Gotha, and the Princess Clementine of Orleans reached Cobourg on the evening of the 19th, and were received with great rejoicings, and amidst the acclamations of the people I am credibly informed that the Princess Clementine received at Saint Cloud, a letter announcing that the Princess is likely to become a mother. There are, at this present moment, two Princesses and a Queen in that state, Clementine, the Princess of Joinville, and the Queen of Greece.

The Duke de Broglie, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and several Cabinet Councils at Saint Cloud. The Council were occupied with the affairs of the Council of Jerusalem. It is given as positive that M. de Bourqueney, the French ambassador at Vienna, returned hastily to Paris, and that the ambassador has sent home for further instructions. The French Cabinet is not inclined to give way, and has sent couriers with despatches to almost every court in Europe.

A great deal of talk is likely to take place on the Russian order. Count Salvandy replaces the Marquis of Dalmatia as Ambassador at the Court of Turin; the Marquis replaces Count Bresson at Berlin; the Count goes to Madrid; Baron Billing replaces Count Alexis at Stuttgard; the latter goes to Bavaria. There is no truth in the report of the recall of Count Sainte Aulaire

During the visit of the Duke de Nemours to Dijon, he laid the first stone of the railroad from Paris to Lyons, by Dijon. The works will be pushed with great vigour.

In several parts of Paris lanterns have been placed, for the purpose of lighting the streets with portable liquid hydrogen gas. I am afraid the experiment will be a failure

Several of the leading Spanish statesmen seem gradually to approach the frontiers of the Pyrenees. Bordeaux has many. Bayonne is also favoured with their presence, and M. Mendizabal has taken up a temporary residence at Bare.

M. Pueta, formerly partner in the banking house of Pauls and Mollmer, an intimate friend of Count Toreno, fell down in an apoplexia fit, on hearing the death of the count, and instantly died.

M. Olozaga, the Spanish Ambassador to the Court of the Tuileries, reached Paris, on Sunday, and had a long interview with Marshal Soult.

General Boyer, accompanied by his mother and his nephew, Colonel Boyer, the wife of the colonel, and four children, reached Paris, yesterday. The ex-Dictator of Hayti appears greatly careworn, and is much broken by the years of age.

The Duke de Bordeaux, travelling as Count Chambaud, was, on the 17th inst., at Dresden. The Duke leaves, on the 21st, for Hamburgh, and from thence to England. He is look ng ill, and is accompanied by the Duke de Levis, Count Locmane, and Marquis de Chambonnal.

At a sale which took place a few days since at Glanstier, the residence of the too celebrated Mme Lafarge, now imprisoned for life for poisoning her husband, the competition to obtain a relic of the culprit was such that even old worm-out gowns fetched a high price; her marriage gown was knocked down for £32, her prayer-book £3, a pencil sketch of her miniature, £1, &c., &c. Many persons went from Paris in order to become purchasers.

I can bear my testimony to the fact of the murder of the mother of Cabrera at the request of General Nogueras, a detailed account of this unexampled act of barbarity will be found in the Spanish paper The Gazette of Oasis. A gentleman whom I spoke to this morning, a resident of Tortosa, assures me that the sutel ites of Mina called on the Mand mother of Cabrera, and brought her the joyful tidings that they were instructed to escort her to her son The poor old woman put on her best apparel, and shedding tears of joy quitted her dwelling. Along the road her conversation was her son, and the pleasure she should experience in pressing him to her heart. They reached the market-place—"Where, where is my son," cried out the blind woman. "Here, here," was the reply, "kneel and you will embrace Lim." She knelt! A report was heard—the blind mother of Cabrera was no more!! The vengeance of Espartero was satisfied.

Rossini passed three months in Paris. On his arrival he was very ill; he has gone away completely cured; he left on Wednesday. M. Offenbach, the celebrated violoncellist, has returned to Paris from Germany. His presence on the banks of the Rhine will be long remembered by all musical virtuosos. His success at Cologne was such as never yet experienced by any artist. Mademoiselle Nerow, who so successfully debuted last year at the Italian Opera, has returned from Stockholm. The royal family of Denmark made her a present of a diamond bracelet. Lablache has had a most perfect operation performed on the left jaw. He is nearly convalescent, and leaves us in a few days for Naples, to remain till the month of November. Madame Anna Thilon is engaged for the London stage. She will come out in "Don Pasquale" and "The Diamonds of the Crown." Mrs. Henderson is engaged at Boulogne for the season. Mrs. Salmond and Miss Poole are staying in Vienna, from thence to go to St. Petersburg, to be present at the opening of the Italian Opera, definitively fixed for the 15th of October.

Queen Victoria has sent a very handsome present to Mr. Vyvyan, the young and truly remarkable horn player. The Queen expresses herself in a little speech accompanying the gift as highly delighted and astonished at his execution and tone on the instrument in his trios and quartetts. Miss Sarah Dolby, sister of Mademoiselle Rachel, has left for Italy in order to study the Italian school—she goes to Florence, and intends taking lessons from Romani. Don Pasquale is in repetition in almost every theatre in Italy: it was lately brought out at Arona and received with immense success; the principal parts were confided to Gam, bardelà, Malvezzi, Pairiseiori, and Cambaggio. Mirate has met with great applause at the Teatro Carignano, at Turin, in "Linda." His presence on the stage of the Italian Opera, definitively fixed for the 15th of October.

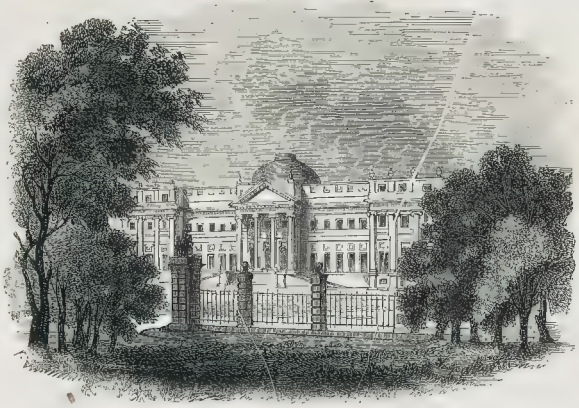
HER MAJESTY'S BELGIAN EXCURSION.

THE GOVERNOR'S HOUSE, GHENT.



THE CHATEAU OF LAEKEN.

THE CASINO, AT GHENT.

"Time travels at divers paces," saith the great bard, who wrote "for all time;" but, verily, we believe "the feathered thing" never flew faster than during the recent royal excursion. He left no gaps for halts, and scarcely a minute for "the only quarter of an hour in human life passed ill—that between the calling for the reckoning and paying it." Yet, in all this railroad rapidity, the pencil has scarcely been able to keep pace with the pen—the currente calamo of quotation-mongers. Accordingly, our tour of illustration and pictorial record is not yet completed, though our narrative may be; and there are many scenes and incidents in the late royal visit, upon which the lover of art will linger with delight, even after he shall have laid aside the hurried dispatch of "our own" or "another correspondent." Invention, we know, outstrips reality with proverbial celerity, but the trick is as dishonest as it is musty, and fact is better at three days' grace than fiction at sight. But a truce with trope—our illustrations of her Majesty's Continental visits have been sketched from the very life-stream, in the streets and highways, and the steam movement by water and land; our artists have left the stay-at-home illustrations to their dusty museums and portfolios, their dry bones and dead leaves; they have themselves accompanied the royal visitors from place to place, and by thus partaking of the celebrations of the event, have transferred them to our pages with Daguerreotypic fidelity.

The first engraving carries us to Ghent, which does not display the same signs of decay as Bruges, but is still the Belgic Manchester. The picturesqueness of the houses, the fantastic variety of gable-ends rising stepwise, or ornamented with scrolls and carving, arrest the stranger's eye at every turn. Here the governor's house presents a truly interesting scene of welcome. It was here that their Majesties and the whole party alighted, and partook of refreshment. Here, too, were prepared for the Queen, a beautifully, but very simply-furnished suite of two chambers, situated at the furthest extremity of the building; and here her Majesty arranged her toilet. Immediately opposite to the governor's house was erected the Place de la Calendre; the inscription on the arch was, "The Town of Ghent, to Queen Victoria and her august husband. The ancient house of Artevelde salutes anew a queen of England." On the outside of the arch was inscribed the historical coincidence mentioned at page 196 of our last number. Another of the buildings is shown in the next engraving—the New Casino, a handsome building by Roelands, situated near the coupure, or canal. It has a literary and scientific as well as a social destination. Exhibitions of flowers take place in the lower apartments; it is a spacious and elegant building, surrounded by beautiful grounds. Here the royal party staid a short time; and here, as at most other places visited, her Majesty and her illustrious relatives inscribed their names in the books of the institution. Upon the same page is a portrait of one of the sisterhood of the Béguinage, at Ghent, one of the few nunneries not suppressed by Joseph II., or swept away by the torrent of the French revolution. The sisterhood number more than 600, and many are persons of wealth and rank. They wear black robes and white veils, the ancient Flemish faille. The novices are distinguished by a different dress; and those who have just taken the veil wear a chaplet round their heads. The Béguinas are bound by no vow; they may return into the world whenever they please; but they boast that no sister has ever been known to quit the order after having once entered it. The royal party visited this interesting establishment; the line of route over which they passed was strewed with roses and other flowers.

The scene now changes to Brussels; and at the lower right-hand corner of the page is engraved one of the triumphal arches erected for the royal visitors to pass under. Above this engraving is a view of the chateau of Laeken, a country residence of the Belgian court, three miles from the Port de Laeken, on the road to Antwerp. Here the royal party passed Monday night, after dining at the palace at Brussels. The whole allée vert leading to the chateau was a glare of light; and about the park, the devices and illuminated arches were truly magical. At Laeken, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, the festivities were continued; and six young girls in the village, in a former part of the evening, presented our Queen with a beautiful bouquet. The chateau is furnished in palatial style: it was originally built for the Austrian governor of the Netherlands, before the French revolution, and was afterwards inhabited by Napoleon, who here planned and decided on his disastrous expedition to Russia. The gardens and park are very beautiful: King Leopold is an accomplished botanist, and has them admirably kept up.

Immediately after the arrival of their Majesties at the chateau, a message from the King intimated to the Reunion Lyrique that the two Queens desired to hear their performance. The members of the society ranged themselves in the garden in front of the steps of the chateau, and in a few minutes the King and Prince Albert led Queen Victoria and Queen Louise to the arm-chairs which were placed for them. The evening being cool, the Queens sat wrapped in shawls. The King came down to the garden and approaching MM. Lintermans and Marneffe, said—"The two Queens desire to hear you, gentlemen; but I forewarn you that you are about to perform before a competent judge. Queen Victoria is herself an excellent musician and an accomplished singer." Queen Victoria was quite charmed with the serenade, and repeatedly gave marked tokens of her admiration. The Queen of England did not withdraw until the music was concluded, when King Leopold and Prince Albert thanked the singers for the gratification their performances had afforded. On withdrawing Queen Victoria several times waved her hand in token of thanks.

IRON BRIDGE AT LAEKEN.

Upon this page there is represented another of the triumphal arches commemorative of the eventful royal visit; and it may be remarked that in this species of construction, the Belgians are very successful. Another specimen of Belgian ingenuity, but of a more permanent kind, is an elegant iron bridge at Laeken. Beneath is the tomb-house in the cemetery of Laeken, to the memory of the celebrated Malibran. This is one of the most interesting memorials of genius in the neighbourhood of Brussels, and was accordingly visited by the royal party. It contains a marble statue of the lamented cantatrice, which has been set up by her husband, who caused the body to be removed hither from Manchester. Beyond this begins the Allée Verte, a long avenue of trees, extending all the way to Brussels.

Next is the Hotel de Ville, in the Grande Place of Brussels, at the moment of her Majesty's arrival. This is by far the most striking building in the city, and is one of the grandest of those municipal palaces which are found in almost every city of the Netherlands, and no where else of the same splendour. It was finished in 1442. The beautiful tower of Gothic open-work, 364 feet high, was built by Jean Van Ruysbrock, and is remarkable for not being placed in the centre of the building. It is surmounted with a copper figure of St. Michael, seventeen feet high, which serves as a weathercock, and turns with the wind. Our artist has sketched this fine tower, and shown scaffolding for some repairs in progress. The view from the spire extends as far as the field of Waterloo. In the grand hall of this edifice the ceremony of the abdication of Charles V. took place in 1555; and the event is depicted on tapestry still preserved here. In the market-place in front of the hotel, the Counts Egmont and Horn were beheaded, by order of the cruel Alva, in 1568. Beneath the view of the Town-hall is represented the interesting incident at the Railway station at Mechlin, on the morning of Tuesday, as the royal party were on their road to Antwerp. After the cardinal, archbishop of the city, the primate, and the civil authorities had congratulated her Majesty on her visit to Belgium, a deputation of several young ladies of Mechlin presented our Queen with a basket of flowers, and a scarf of the finest Mechlin lace; after which the cortège passed on.

The next page of engravings illustrates the royal stay at Brussels. First, is the concert in the park, by the Harmonic Society, given beneath the trees, on a spot well adapted and occasionally used for such purposes. The royal party were seated in an elegant and well-proportioned pavilion, open in front, so that the thousands of spectators assembled could get a perfect view of the Sovereigns and Prince Albert; and the musicians were in an open orchestra close to the pavilion. The Grand Duchess Anna Fedorowna was with the royal party. The concert was instrumental, and the royal and august party remained from five to half-past, when they retired amid the plaudits of an exceedingly well-dressed and numerous auditory. The concert was open to all comers, and the thousands of persons who sat listening to it, seated round on chairs, formed a very fine scene. In the engraving beneath is represented the allée, or avenue, through which the royal party passed.

The park is well laid out, with avenues of trees, shady walks, and verdant turf, ornamented with statues; serving as a promenade for the inhabitants. Among the buildings which overlook it, is the King's palace, of little architectural pretension, but sumptuously furnished: its pictures are of no great value, except one excellent portrait by Vandyke, the Chapeau de Velours. Here, Queen Victoria and upwards of eighty distinguished guests dined with their Belgic Majesties, on Monday evening, in the grand ball-room of the palace, which they afterwards quitted for Laeken. The lower engraving in this page represents the Rue Royale, with the passage of the Royal cortège to the palace. This is but one of the many scenes of enthu-

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Arotarchus—The novel will be concluded within the present year; and we intend to supply its place by a new and amusing feature, of which due announcement will be made.
"E. M" is thanked, but the engraving is not suitable
"J. C." Red Lion-street, Holborn.—See our paper of September 16.
"J. R. O. F." Fermoy.—We have at present such an abundance of subjects, that we cannot entertain those sent by our correspondents.
"E. B." Tearney Abbey.—The demand of 1s. is an overcharge.
"W." Bury.—The error referred to sometimes occurs by not allowing for the subject being reversed in drawing
"J. G." Harwich.—The season is, we fear, too far advanced.
"R. H. T." should beware of the mean agent's opinions as it is founded inevitably upon the extra amount of profit he may get by the sale of any particular paper.
"H. M."—A new "Rebecca" starts up almost every night in South Wales. See the engraving in one of our late numbers.
"F. Z." The lunatic asylum on Headington-hill, near Oxford, received so much assistance from the funds left by Dr. Radcliffe in 1837, that the committee gave it the name of "The Radcliffe Asylum."
"B. S. S." Birmingham.—The signature of the husband is indispensable.
"W. M." Cheltenham.—We have not room
"J. B." Cupar.—The manuscript has been destroyed.
"A Friend." Tynemouth, and "Delta," Fraser, London.—The defect complained of by our correspondents will be remedied by our new machines, which, we trust, will be ready in a fortnight.
"H. D." Creed lane.—We agree with our correspondent that the City Police are ineffective as a preventive force.
"The Wandering Boy, by "J. T. O. S. R."—Ineligible.
"C. J. F.," Cross-house.—Certainly not, during the minority.
A correspondent suggests that at the forthcoming inauguration of the column to the memory of Nelson, in Trafalgar square, Charing-cross, the day should be kept as "a naval national jubilee," and that Nelson's brave companions (who are to take part in the ceremony), with the boys from the Naval School, should be conveyed from Greenwich to the metropolis in a fleet of steam-boats.
"E. P." The romance "England and France" is an original work, and published for the first time in our columns, it having been written expressly for this journal.
"C. D. L." Hawkesbridge.—Under consideration.
"A. L"—The mistakes alluded to were for the most part typographical, as any intelligent person must have known from the internal evidence of the piece. The remainder of the criticism is not tenable.
CURES—"D. H." see our chess article last week
Solutions to problem No 88, received from "Richard Ormrod," "Clericus Darvensis," and "Morron"
"Morron."—You may have as many guesses on the board at once as you like.
"P. G.—I." Problem received.
"Argus," "Inquisitor," "A Wellwisher," and several other correspondents who interrogate us on the subject of our French and Belgian illustrations, wish to know how it happens that our delineations of these scenes differ so materially from other representations put forth to the public in various pictorial shapes, and purporting to be authentic. We can only say that our artists—Mr. E. Landells and Mr. Sly—gentlemen of great celebrity and acknowledged talent, attended the royal progress in each instance, and sketched the different scenes that we have given on each particular spot. This answer, we trust, will be sufficient to give our readers confidence in the correctness of all our engravings.
Our Durham correspondent has our thanks. We shall not overlook the subject of his communication.

TO OUR READERS.

On SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, will be published, price SIXPENCE,

This work has been compiled at great expense and will form a most useful authority for reference to the CLERGY, GENTRY, MAGISTRATES, JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, CLERKS OF THE PEACE, POOR-LAW GUARDIANS, PARISH CLERKS, REGISTRARS, and all other PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The whole has been drawn up with great care and accuracy, forming a complete Digest of a Parliamentary Report exceeding 500 pages; and is decidedly the most comprehensive abstract of which has ever appeared at a price to bring it within the reach of all classes.

To afford facilities for the circulation of this useful work in all parts, copies will be Stamped as a Supplement to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, of Saturday, the 14th October.—Price Sixpence.

 Orders for this Supplement must be given as early as possible to the Newsvenders; and in places where there are no Booksellers or Newsvenders, parties will have it forwarded to them by post, by enclosing Sixpence in a letter (post paid), addressed to Mr. LITTLE, No. 198, Strand, London.

LONDON, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1843.

Espartero has dined at the Mansion-house; the Regent of Spain has sat as a guest at a City feast; the Duke of Victory has been entertained by the Corporation of London as an exile. The Romance of History is not yet dead; it did not sink from existence when Napoleon died, nor was it buried in the rocky tomb of him whose voice made the nations tremble. It is among us still, building up and casting down, mocking at humble ambition and showing the vanity of human wishes, telling us that power is a dream and greatness a phantom and a vision, to be dispelled by a stern awakening to the truth that

The glories of our birth and state
Are shadows, not substantial things.

Events succeed each other with such rapidity, that, giving some attention to all, we devote little reflection to any. Yet such a scene as that of Tuesday's feast at the Mansion-house was one of no ordinary interest. Is there not in the presence of the Ruler of Spain a "moral lesson?" We speak not of the conflict of party or principles, in which the good are often vanquished and the worse triumphant, but of the simple spectacle of fallen greatness and vanished power, of the uncertainty of all earthly things, which the General presents to us. His reception was hearty; it is certain it was sincere, for the motives for flattery do not exist. If public sympathy can compensate for the loss of power the compliment paid him will have been sufficient, for it could not have been more marked. But we doubt its efficacy to soothe the pangs of fallen greatness. The manifestation of it must remind him of the contrast between what was and what is; the past cannot be lost in the present, nor could the festivity of the passing hour banish the thoughts of the future. The lot of the exile, however lofty his rank, must be a bitter one; the loftier the station from which he is driven the moresevere. Isit probable that the mind of the Duke of Victory, amidst all the civic splendour of the Egyptian Hall, did not revert from the Mansion-house to the Palace of Madrid? Where the treasure is there will the heart be also, and Espartero has left behind him all that has been the struggle of a life to gain. It is not the sympathy of men that can diminish the affliction of such a loss. Yet it is gratifying as far as it goes, and, seeing what has happened since his expulsion, the miserable anarchy, and horrible bloodshed that seem impending over his unhappy country, we may regret that the strong head and arm, that for a long period were able to control the tumultuous elements, are now paralysed,—that the keystone being taken away, the structure is falling into shapeless ruin. Such a regret does not involve an approval of all the deeds which have marked the career of Espartero.

A very melancholy account of a coroner's inquest upon the body of a gentleman who has died of decline in the Queen's Bench Prison appears in the journals, and induces us to call the attention of the public, upon Christian and philanthropic grounds, to the present state of that disgraceful blot upon the civilisation of the country—the law of Imprisonment for Debt. We take this sad instance—one only of the many continually occurring—as fearfully illustrative of the iniquity of the practice of such imprisonment, and of the mischief of that infatuated and obtuse perversity of judgment, which will not distinguish between adversity and fraud, and as boldly punish the one as we should humanely commiserate the other.

The case in question is that of a gentleman of the name of Rowley, who died the other day of pulmonary consumption in the Queen's Bench Prison, after an incarceration of ten years! And here, let us for a moment pause! Ten years! The thief expiates his dishonesty, the criminal works out his crime, but the unfortunate debtor, who is neither thief nor criminal, holds to his melancholy prison and declines into the grave. Seven years' transportation will cover fearful delinquencies broad daylight crimes against the constitution of society; but ten years of sorrowful incarceration will not wipe away a debt. The unfortunate gentleman must find his discharge in the grave. It is in evidence upon the inquest held upon the body of Mr. Rowley (will his creditors attend his funeral sweet compassionate mourners for their debtor—and their debt?)—that he frequently starved. His charwoman, who seems to have attended him compassionately, often offered him her poor charity, which he refused. "He did not like people to know that he was in want." Poor fellow, we can pity his poor pride! but read the woman's evidence. "She knew that he had often been without food, and had frequently offered him things, but he always declined to accept them. Sometimes he had a pint of beer or gruels, and had not the means of getting any. He was occasionally without food during the winter, and he always refused what she offered him." We see that this unhappy gentleman struggled with a poignant pride—an infirmity of our nature, indeed, but an infirmity often tinged with honourable feelings and great power of endurance. A person of the name of Wilian deposed that "He had been for a long time without a bed to lie upon, so destitute was he. Witness had often relieved him. The original illness he (the witness) had no doubt was brought on from want." The evidence of Mr. Hooper, the surgeon, given, we think, with some professional heartlessness, proved that latterly—(that is when it was known he was dying), he had not wanted the necessaries of life! When it was known that he must die, he was given the wherewith to live! But we must give a slice of this evidence. Mr. Hooper says—"He had been very short of bed and clothing, but for the last two months he was supplied with not only the necessaries of life, but also with luxuries. Witness did not think that deceased's lungs would have become affected by privations unless there had been a predisposition to consumption. Disease of the lungs more frequently arises from taking too much stimulating drinks." Where did Mr. Hooper imbibe that medical education which taught him that a man "short of bed and clothing" the natural elements of warmth, and the absence of which are almost certain to produce cold—accompanied, moreover, with "privations," would not have produced consumption, unless the subject were predisposed? And why the insinuation about drink, of one, who, carried by starvation to the grave, could have had no means of obtaining it. Your prison surgeons may be sadly wanting in the charities of life. The marshal seems to have acted with most kindly humanity—to have done as much for the dying gentleman as could be suggested by the commiseration of a feeling heart. "As soon as his condition became known, he provided him with a bed (poor fellow, he had none then before), and ordered him comforts and necessaries." (Alas, then, he had been a stranger to both.)

Reader, good as the marshal was, was not the case of the prisoner dreadful? We would not willingly stoop to poor revenge, but we cannot in our indignation hold back a wish that the dead man's creditor may read this paper—that it may serve him in the stead of conscience—that it may wring his heart, and burn his brain—and sting him to the deadly quick! The very searing of his spirit will do him good, and tend, perhaps, before it is too late, to class him in the brotherhood of man!

The verdict in the case of Mr. Rowley was "Natural death." Perhaps it should have been "That the deceased died of consumption, brought on by want and starvation in prison." We have made inquiries into the case, and find that a few years back Mr. Rowley was a hale stalwart man, but that for several years he has been miserably poor in his gaol—that he had never habiliments either decent enough to appear in in the day time, or warm enough to wear in the evening at any period—that it was his custom at night, winter and summer, to walk at the back of the gaol in a dressing-gown for the sake of the only exercise he could procure, without wounding his inexorable pride —that he was not given to habits of intoxication, was a gentleman in his manners, and had property in expectancy, upon which he vainly waited for his release. Poor man—he did not live to possess what might have paid his creditors, but died of consumption, engendered by starvation and cold. Not only did he nourish for ten years that "hope deferred which maketh the heart sick," but went unnourished himself, or only so scantily that his manly frame wasted, and Poverty took the bed from under his body, and then when he began to die people were afraid of it, and Charity gave him food!

We ask, is not all this picture a very sad one to contemplate. The merchant-trader is protected by a bankruptcy. He pays his debts with a fiat, and is not imprisoned at all. The gentleman, the barrister, the attorney, the author, the dramatist, the musician, and a large class of the non-trading community have no resource, which, as in the case of the merchant, leaves them free exertion in after life, for their future property is always liable; and should they be thrown into prison by contingency, either they must go through that court which does not clear them, or stay in gaol and die like the poor gentleman whose melancholy history we have recorded. There can be no justice, no principle of civilization, in the law which admits of this inequality of social protection, and the sooner it is blotted from the statute book of England the better it will be for all Englishmen.

We have given elsewhere the details of a revolution which took place at Athens, on the 14th inst. and was consummated on the 15th inst., by which a total reform of the Government was effected, without the slightest effusion of human blood. It appears that the insurgents marched against the new palace of the King, situated a little outside of the town, and thus isolated, that they surrounded it so that none of his ministers could get to him, other bodies watching the ministers and the members of the Areopagus, and that the King, finding himself unable to oppose the determined men, who demanded the long-promised constitution, and the dismissal of the Bavarians from the Privy Council, and from all places of trust, ended by yielding these two essential points. We beg to direct the attention of our readers to No. 62 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, published in July last, in which will be found a portrait of King Otho, and a view of the Royal Palace.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—Her Majesty, Prince Albert, and the whole of the court attended divine service in the private chapel. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay preached a sermon from 5th Paul to the Thessalonians, 17th verse. The grand promenade on the terrace in the afternoon was numerous and fashionable attended. The bands of the Life and Grenadier Guards played.

MONDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert rode to Adelaide Lodge in a pony carriage. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenbourg, arrived at the Castle from Frogmore, and lunched with her Majesty. The Royal Duchess afterwards returned to Frogmore, and their Serene Highnesses remained at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Serene Highness the Prince of Honeluhe Langenbourg, and attended by Mr. G. E. Anson, went out partridge shooting in the morning. His Royal Highness was also engaged in the Great Park, and shot over Flemish Farm, and had good sport.—The same routine, with very little variation, was observed during the week.

The Duke of Cambridge and his suite arrived on the 18th at Mentz.

At St. James's Palace numerous workmen are actively employed in restoring this ancient edifice to its pristine glories. The state apartments and offices will be repaired, the garden and the court-yard put in order in constant requisition. Clarence House, the town residence of the Duchess of Kent, is undergoing thorough repair; as also the apartments of Sir H. Wheatley, Privy Purse to the Queen. In the Quadrangle facing Marlborough House (anciently called Choir Court) workshops are being built for the accommodation of the carpenters, masons, cab-porters, &c., attached to St. James's Palace.

The Earl of Aberdeen left his residence in Argyll-street on Monday on a visit to the Right Hon. Sir R. and Lady Peel, at Drayton Manor, Staffordshire.

The Hon. S. Herbert, Secretary of the Admiralty, has left town for Marlborough.

The Right Hon. Sir Robert and Lady Peel have been entertaining the Marquis of Granby, Earl of Jersey, Lord and Lady Villiers, Sir Henry and Lady Emily Hardinge, Lord Hawkesbury, Mrs. Dawson, Right Hon. Mr. Croker, Mr. Bonham, Mademoiselle D'Este, and a large party, at Drayton Manor, during the Birmingham musical festival.

DEATH OF THE HON. AND HONY. LIEUT.-GEN. JAMES A. STEWART MACKENZIE.—We regret to announce the death of the above right hon. gentleman, who expired on Sunday last at Southampton. The deceased was eldest son of Admiral the Hon. Keith Stewart, second son of the sixth earl of Bute, and brother of John seventh Earl of Galloway. Until 1832 he was elected member of parliament for Ross and Cromarty, which he represented until 1837, when he was appointed Governor and Commander in Chief of Ceylon, where he remained until 1840 when Sir Colin Campbell succeeded to the Governorship. On leaving Ceylon the deceased proceeded to Corfu as Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, in which he was succeeded a few months back by General Lord Seaton, the present Commissioner.

We understand that Rear-Admiral Edw. Hawker is shortly to be married to the Lady Williams, widow of the late Admiral Sir Thomas Williams, G.C.B. The late Sir Thomas Williams was the benevolent founder of the Royal Naval Female School.

DEATH OF PROFESSOR BELL.—We have to announce the death of Professor Bell, professor of Scotch law in the University of Edinburgh on Saturday last, after a protracted illness. Mr. Bell also held the office of one of the principal clerks of session, which by his death has become vacant.

We are concerned to hear that Earl Grey, is in a very declining state since the return of his lordship to Howick; but we trust that this aged patriarch of reform will long be spared to his family and admiring friends.

The Duke of Buccleuch has arrived, and has taken the Marine Pavilion at Cowes, until the close of the season.

The Right Hon. Thomas and Lady Fremantle and family, Sir George Baker, Lady Champagne, Sir G. and Lady Westphal, and Mr. Dunrombe, are among the recent arrivals at Ryde.

Lord Stanley leaves town early in the ensuing week for Knowsley, on a visit to the Earl of Derby, and after a short stay there proceed to Penrhos at the annual dinner of the Liverpool Agricultural Society, on Thursday next, which is to take place in the Repository of that populous town

The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Countess De Grey leave Brighton early in the ensuing week for York, in order to be present at the assembling for eight days duty of the Yorkshire Hussars, of which regiment the noble Earl is Colonel. The entire corps meet at York on Thursday next, and, as usual, previous to the review of the regiment, a ball will be given by Earl De Grey and the officers belonging to the several troops.

The Earl and Countess of Chesterfield have, we are informed, made arrangements to go to Rome for the winter. The noble Earl and Countess leave this country early in November, and it is said that a great many of the English nobility will meet there to hail with kindness the noble Earl's hands.

The Queen Dowager's health is certainly much improved since her Majesty's arrival at Witley Court, and the continuances of the fine weather has been conducive to her recovery from the effects of her severe indisposition just before her departure from Marlborough House to Bushy. On Friday last the Witley troop of the Worcestershire Yeomanry Cavalry had a field day in the park at Witley Court, when the Queen Dowager, Princesses Mary of Cambridge, Earl Howe, Sir Horace and Lady Seymour, Lady Georgiana Curzon, &c., were present. The calls at the lodge of the nobility and gentry were very numerous.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge is, we understand, expected at Cambridge House from Germany the week after next. The Duchess of Cambridge will remain some weeks longer abroad.

His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, accompanied by the Hon Captain James Macdonald, was expected to embark at Trieste or Leghorn, at the close of the week, for Corfu, from visiting the Hereditary Grand Duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz and other illustrious personages in Germany. His Royal Highness's official rank in Corfu is Colonel on the Staff, taking rank next to Lieutenant-General Lord Seaton, G.C.B., the Lord High Commissioner, and Lieutenant-General on the Staff.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE INDIAN MAIL.—The accounts received this week from the Levant put an end to all expectation of the arrival of the Indian mail until the usual period next month, when we shall have the September and October mails together, if no serious accident has occurred. The individuals that are suffering the most serious inconvenience from the delay are no numerous, in consequence of the confidence resulting from the previous regularity of the arrival of the packets, that it should furnish a strong stimulus to the adoption of measures to provide against a similar occurrence.

REPRESENTATION OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—Mr. Attwood having declined standing for the representation of the city, vacant by the death of Sir Matthew Wood, Mr. Thomas Baring is to be invited to offer himself. There seems very little doubt that he will stand. The movements of the Whig party have been to invite Mr. Samuel Gurney to come forward, who has, however, declined, and it is said that an express has been sent off to Lord Morpeth. At a meeting of the Whig-Radical party, held on Tuesday, it was determined to bring forward Mr. Pattison, one of the late members.

CITY OF LONDON GENERAL PENSION SOCIETY.—At the Annual General Meeting of this Society held on Monday last, it was stated by the collector that many old subscribers had withdrawn their support from the Society, alleging as an excuse the increased burdens imposed upon them by the Income Tax. We have no doubt that the pressure of this circumstance has been felt in some degree by all charitable institutions; but we fear there must be some stronger reason for a general secession of this kind.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—On Wednesday a quarterly general court of the proprietors in this corporation was held at the India house, pursuant to the terms of the charter, when several motions were brought forward with regard to the payment of money to the Treasury of Inggerland, and courts of appeal, but were afterwards withdrawn, on the understanding that these subjects should receive the attention of Government.

MR. HIBBERT'S DINNER.—The inauguration dinner of the New Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, (Alderman Musgrove and F. G. Moon, Esq.), takes place this day (Saturday), at Goldsmiths' Hall, Mincing lane. Messrs. Anderton and Hopkinson have been exclusively appointed Under Sheriffs.

DEATH OF MR. JOHN WEIPPERT.—We regret to have to record the death of Mr John Weippert, of Soho-square, under most melancholy circumstances. On Thursday week Mr. Weippert had a rehearsal of his band, at his town residence, and proceeded to Hampton, where his family was residing. It appears that shortly after passing the toll-gate at Bushy his chaise came in contact with another vehicle going in the contrary direction, the collision of both carriages upsetting that in which Mr. Weippert was riding, by which he was thrown out, falling on his head. He was taken up in a state of insensibility, and immediately conveyed to his cottage near Hampton-bridge, when medical aid was instantly procured. However, he lingered until Monday afternoon last, when he died from the effects of the serious injuries he sustained about his head. Mr. Weippert had for upwards of twenty years been director of the orchestra at the Court balls and Almack's, and by his enterprising endeavours he maintained a high position at all the fêtes of our aristocracy both in town and country. It is to be lamented that Mr. Weippert's death has family of five children are left to bewail the loss of an affectionate parent. His eldest son, an accomplished musician, will succeed him in the business, his band remaining the same as hitherto. Mr. Weippert leaves a large circle of friends, by whom he was greatly respected for his liberality, kindheartedness, and amiable disposition.

SWEARING IN THE NEW SHERIFFS.—A Common Hall was held yesterday (Friday), according to the ancient custom, when the newly elected Sheriffs for the City of London and county of Middlesex for the ensuing year, Mr. Alderman Musgrove and F. G. Moon, Esq., were sworn into office with the usual formalities. The Lord Mayor arrived at Guildhall precisely at two o'clock, when the oath of office was administered to the new Sheriffs, and they having signed the declaration that they would not use any authority they might possess in virtue of their office to the injury of the Establishment, they were invested with the gold chain and other insignia of their important situations. The oaths were then administered to Mr. Anderton and Mr. Hopkinson, who have been appointed Under Sheriffs. The hall was not numerously attended. The carriages and liveries of the New Sheriffs are very elegant, and attracted much notice. After administering the oaths, the hall adjourned.

COLONEL STODDART AND CAPTAIN CONOLLY.—The committee of the "Stoddart and Conolly Fund" had an interview with Lord Aberdeen on Saturday at the Foreign-office, when his lordship kindly offered to render every assistance in his power to Mr. Wolf, for the purpose of prosecuting his researches, and obtaining information as to the fate of Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly, and his lordship stated that the mission of Dr. Wolff would not in any way interfere with the instructions he had already given to Colonel Rawlinson.

DERBY CLUBS.—It may be of some interest to licensed victuallers, and particularly to those that have Derby and St. Leger clubs held at their houses, to know the decision of the commissioners. It would be useless to give a detailed list of them, this week. Mr. Cole, of the Crown, Ludgate-hill, had a Derby Club for 1843, and a party desired Mr. Cole to enter his name in the club as a subscriber, and at the same time to have paid pay for him at the Derby dinner. That, however, he did not intend. This was done, and his horses drawn and delivered to him, but some time after Mr. C. called for the amount of subscription, 23s. 6d., on the party in question, who made no excuse but was sorry, and promised to call and settle, which he has left to be omitted to do, and Mr. C. called many times, always receiving the same answer. At length he summoned him to the Court of Requests, and the case being clearly proved to the satisfaction of the commissioners, the defendant was ordered to pay debt and costs.

RICHARD DADD.—Considerable doubt seems to exist as to the actual position of this unhappy young man. It is supposed that, because no official intelligence of his capture has reached either the Home or Foreign Office, there is no truth in the rumour of his being in custody, but this circumstance, we observe, is accounted for in the following manner by the Art Journal:—"It has been stated (we believe in the French newspapers) for attempting to kill a fellow passenger in the diligence at Montereau, not far from Fontainbleau, and on the direct line of road from Paris to Lyons and Marseilles. At Fontainbleau he now remains in custody. When arrested he unhesitatingly avowed that he had taken the life of an individual who called himself his father; and his conduct since has been such as to induce strong suspicions, in the event of a jury pronouncing him responsible, according to the laws of France, no trial is necessary; the poor maniac is at once consigned to a lunatic asylum. Such an Englishman, however, he would of course be given up to the proper authorities, in the event of a demand being made. We understand the afflicted family have memorialized the Home Secretary for permission to allow him to remain in France, where he will be properly taken care of (of course, at their expense, their means being ample), and not to the county gaol, the country which can terminate only in his confinement for life—but the progress of which must satisfy any one the friends of those who have been heavily and gratuitously tried. His family appear to consider that all has been done for him that can be suggested; if it be so, they have indeed had to contend with sorrows of no ordinary kind, and to feel a degree of misfortune such as few have to bear."

THE "BLOOD MONEY" SYSTEM.—The case of James Spelman, who, it will be remembered, was committed from Worship-street Police-office to take his trial on a charge of uttering a poor lad named Nicholls into the offence of passing counterfeit coin, was tried at the Central Criminal Court on Friday last, and having been found guilty was sentenced by Mr Commissioner Bullock to nine months' imprisonment. The learned judge, in this sentence, it is said, created the utmost astonishment in court, and certainly not without some cause, for a more atrocious case never came before a tribunal of justice. Another circumstance connected with the transaction, which was a subject of much wonder and amusement, was the fact, that neither the commissioners of police nor the authorities of the Mint came forward to prosecute. It was said, indeed, that so far from coming forward, the Mint had actually refused to prosecute, and not even the inspector of coin was present to give the ordinary and customary evidence as to the coin being really counterfeit. The three shillings were merely, at the close of the case, handed up to the jury, and it was only on their own motion that the learned judge consented to allow them to examine the coin, and form their own judgment that they pronounced the verdict. These facts will go far to give a colouring to the rumours that the odious "blood-money" system has been revived, as was more than hinted at by the committing magistrate. The jury, however, did their duty.

COUNTRY NEWS.

CAMBRIDGE.—DISGRACEFUL AFFAIR.—St. Botolph's church, in Cambridge, a very ancient and beautiful structure, had been lately subjected to some repairs and alterations, and the restoration, externally and internally, of this sacred edifice effected in a manner highly creditable to the worthy churchwardens and also the Camden society. Some malicious wretch, a day or two before it was reopened for divine service, fired a bullet through one of the windows, which pierced a hole in the superior pipes of the organ the damage was of a very trifling nature and can be easily repaired

HASWICH.—SEIZURE OF TOBACCO.—On Friday last, her Majesty's cutter Scout, Lieutenant Saxby, brought in a Dutch galliot, the Jan Van Amsden, John Somerway, master, and a crew of six men, who have been committed to gaol for a further hearing. The vessel had on board about 8,000lbs. weight of tobacco and cigars, and was captured off Orfordness, within the revised guiley of the waters.

HUDDERSFIELD.—Last week, as one of the clerks in the Huddersfield post-office was stamping the letters for delivery, one of the letters, containing a quantity of lucifer matches, exploded, and set the letter on fire. He threw the letter supposed whilst it was in the bag, it might have been of serious consequence, as the bag contained with bankers' parcels, all of which might have been destroyed.

LEWES.—On Wednesday a preliminary meeting of the principal gentry, merchants and traders of Lewes was held at the Star Inn, in that town, to adopt measures for the obtaining of a railway from Brighton to Lewes, and if thought expedient, to extend to Eastbourne and Hastings. Several of those present addressed the meeting at some length on the importance of having a railroad from Brighton to Lewes (the county town). It was eventually agreed to call a public meeting to take the subject into consideration.

LIVERPOOL.—DISAPPEARANCE OF MR. DYCE SOMERS.—Some speculation, mingled with alarm, has been excited by the sudden disappearance from the Adelphi Hotel, Liverpool, of Mr. Dyce Somers, a relative of the East Indian, who married the daughter of Lord St. Vincent, and was lately pronounced insane by a court de lunatico inquirendo. About ten days ago Mr. Somers arrived in Liverpool from London, accompanied by a physician and three servants, and put up at the Adelphi Hotel. The object of his visit to Liverpool was change of air and scene. It was intended to purchase a pleasure yacht, in which Mr. S. was to take pleasure trips on the Mersey. Occasionally he walked about the streets of the town, and conversed with several individuals on the docks, shipping, &c., in a very rational manner. His attire, when he thus went abroad, was magnificent. On the night of Wednesday week last, a servant, as was his wont, went to the room of his master. His last visit was at twelve o'clock, and he then found him apparently asleep. It appears, however, that about four o'clock on Thursday morning, he came down stairs in his night-dress, opened the hall door, which had a very peculiar latch, and went out. He has not since been heard of. Persons have been despatched through all parts of the town in search of him, and on Friday week one of them went to the Adelphi, "breathless with haste, and fery hot with speed," to announce that the lost one had been found, and was approaching in the care of a constable. The anxious friends of the gentleman rushed to the door, and saw a tall black man coming towards the house in the custody of an officer; but the captive turned out to be the steward of a vessel in the King's Dock, who had been captured because, like the East Indian gentleman, he was a tall and handsome man of colour. It is supposed that the missing stranger took with him a considerable sum of money, as that he has fallen into the hands of crimps, who are keeping him locked up until his gold shall have been exhausted.

LIVERPOOL.—SERIOUS BOILER EXPLOSION AND LOSS OF LIFE.—A very serious accident occurred, between three and four o'clock on Sunday last, in the extensive works now in progress for the construction of the New Albert Dock, on the bank of the river, in the eastward of the Custom-house. One of the engines, of twenty horse power, was attended by a considerable number of men, eight of whom were in the immediate contiguity of the boiler. From some cause, which at present is beyond all ascertainment, the boiler suddenly was suffered to become over-full, the consequence of which was, that it at first collapsed, and then exploded with a very loud report. All the eight men were instantly thrown by the concussion, five of them, indeed, to a considerable distance upon the works. They were all injured more or less, five of them very seriously. Two are now lying in the Southern Hospital with scarcely any hopes of recovery, and one has died after suffering dreadful agonies.

NEWTOWN TURN-OUT.—It is much to be regretted that the turn-out among the spinners and weavers at Newtown still continues, notwithstanding the efforts made to effect an amicable arrangement. On Monday evening a small party of operatives from Newtown waited on the Earl of Powis, at Powis Castle, when his lordship, with that urbanity and kindness which characterises every act of his life, gave them a most patient hearing. Although the interview has been a lengthened one, and Mr. Owen was of a private nature, sufficient has transpired to induce us to believe that the noble earl has determined to devote his best energies towards the reduction of that most disastrous principle of trading, unfortunately too well known as the truck system.

SUSSEX.—INCENDIARY FIRES.—A stack of oats, near Broadmarsh-lane, Ruthington, the property of Mr. George Hide, of Lilliehampton, was discovered to be on fire about four o'clock on Monday morning, and was soon entirely consumed. About the same time a barn at Rustington, the property of Mr. J. Oliver, also containing unthrashed grain, belonging to Mr Compton, of Lindfield, was discovered to be on fire, and in a short space of time was totally destroyed. Considerable suspicion attaches to a labouring man, who has been taken before the magistrates at Worthing, and remanded, and is kept in custody waiting the examination of parties known to be in their service up to Sunday night.

SINGULAR AND ECCENTRIC CHARACTER.—On Friday evening died Miss Elizabeth Corke, better known as "Betty Corke," proprietor of those singular houses on the south parade at West Cowes, and on that account, and her very peculiar and curious dress, well known to many of England's aristocracy. At one time this season her houses were tenanted by Lord Wharncliffe and Ranelagh, and, though distinct houses in front, they were connected in the rear all upon a small court, in which some vines were trained, and from which she named them "Vine Court." Her eccentric conduct would not possibly define why they should have this name, but Old Betty always considered the back part of the house the better part, and for months barred up the front doors and windows. Even the tax-gatherer, from the alarm he received (which was lightly said on the first meeting), had to watch for weeks ere he found a door open. Upright, honest, and independence, she had no enemies—friends she sought not, and in her last moments would admit none. When she felt herself mortally wounded she replied that she had plenty of medicine in the house. She had been ill but a few days, and was hardly aware of her danger. Another bill has also been issued, offering a reward of £100 for the detection of the parties who destroyed the Llecbryd Fishing Weir on the 14th inst. About fourteen different toll gates and bars have been pulled down during the last month, and a reward of £50 has been offered for each of them, and the matter is only worth mentioning to show that the system of lawless violence is scarcely, if at all, abated. Another act of incendiarism took place on Thursday week at the village of Mr J. R. Lloyd, of Bollaeiog, one of the members for the county of Carmarthen. About £800 worth of property was

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE WIFE OF THREE SUICIDES.—On Monday, Mr. Baker held an inquest at the Plume of Feathers, Gould's-hill, Lower Shadwell, on the body of David Nixon, aged 45, of No. 33, Lower Shadwell, a cffiial watcher. Ann Mason, widow of deceased, stated that for the last three months he had been in a most desponding way, fearing that he would lose his employment, and that his wife and family would be reduced to want, and that he would be compelled to seek an asylum in the parish workhouse. He frequently used to fancy that the brokers were coming to seize upon his furniture for rent, and recommended the witness to exercise the property to prevent its being disturbed upon. This was quite a delusion on the part of the witness, in order to pacify him, told him she would pay a year's rent in advance On Sunday afternoon, being much fatigued in watching him, witness went to lie down for a short time, but previously to doing so requested Mr. Dimmer, a lodger in the house, to look after him. The deceased, however, took the opportunity of persuading her to go up stairs and dress herself. In about three minutes she heard a noise, and ran down stairs to ascertain the cause, when she discovered the deceased suspended from a beam in the shop by his pocket handkerchief. She immediately alarmed witness, and they together took him down. Mr. Cleland, a surgeon, was sent for, but every means were used to restore animation, but without effect, life having become extinct It is a remarkable fact, that the deceased was the third husband of the witness who had committed suicide in a similar manner. The jury returned a verdict of "Temporary derangement."

ATTEMPT AT MURDER.—On Monday night, between seven and eight o'clock, several Smithfield drovers, residing in White Horse-alley, quarrelled with some other persons, and a skirmish, in which sticks were used, ensued. At length one of the drovers, named Tyrrell, having received a blow in the stomach, a man named Robert Seaward, quietly obtained a table knife, and, rushing up to Seaward, thrust it into the thick part of his thigh, the point of his weapon passing out at the groin, causing a wound of about six inches in length, and of an alarming depth. The poor fellow was immediately carried into his lodgings in White Horse-court, apparently in a dying state, and Mr. Hylett, surgeon, of Cow-cross, having been sent for, promptly arrived, but his patient is not expected to survive. The cowardly assassin unfortunately managed to effect his escape

DESTRUCTIVE FIRES.—On Monday afternoon, soon after two o'clock, another most destructive fire took place on the premises belonging to Mr. Ford, wholesale stationer, 69, Wood-street, Cheapside, within a few doors of Noble street. The fire was first discovered raging in the first floor. The engines were quickly got to work, but to save any portion of Mr. Ford's premises was a matter of impossibility. Engagements, therefore, directed their attention to the preservation of the adjoining premises, in which they were successful. The building in which the fire originated is completely destroyed, and is partially insured. A poor lad named Goddard was nearly killed by the falling of the ruins; when dug out, which was nearly an hour after-ward, his legs were found fractured, and he now lies in St. Bartholomew's Hospital in a dangerous state.—On the same night all the engines at the East-end were required at another fire in Bermondsey street, which was not got under until the stores attached to the premises of Mr. Smith, cornchandler, were consumed. The property is insured in the Licensed Victuallers' Office.

GUN ACCIDENT.—A corporal of the 58th regiment, named Henry Donnelly, was accidentally shot in Brompton barracks on Saturday, while at his dinner, by another corporal, named Thomas Lawrie. The deceased had, on his return from Manoeuvre good with a prisoner, forgotten to draw the charge from his musket, and Lawrie entering the barrack room, he took it up not thinking that it was loaded, when it went off and shot him. The two corporals were intimate friends.

SUICIDE THROUGH DISTRESS.—The body of a poor woman, wretchedly clad, was found on Tuesday morning, imbedded in the mud beneath some logs of timber recent off Marygold-stairs, Upper Ground-street. From the appearance of the deceased, there can be no doubt that she committed suicide through distress—and, indeed, there is too much reason to fear that her child has also suffered the same fate. In one of the pockets of deceased was found an order for admission into the Stepney Union workhouse, filled up in the names of James Brotherson, and his wife, Jane Brotherson.

FRIGHTFUL DEATH.—On Monday evening last a girl, twelve years of age, the daughter of a carrier named Ferguson, residing in Hethnal-green, was burned to death in consequence of the snuff of a candle falling on her pinafore, which set fire to the whole of her dress.

ALARMING EVENT.—Last week Francis Bush, Esq., one of the guardians of the poor at Frome, attended at the Union-office in Bath-street, while engaged in pleading the cause of the distressed, and in the very act of examining the pauper of their breast, he was suddenly seized with a fit, dropped down, and immediately expired.

SINGULAR AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—Last week a cricket match was played on Richmond-green, the players being the captains and mates of the various Richmond steam boats Mr. Thomas Neale, the captain of the Richmond steam vessel, was at his wicket, preparing to strike a ball, delivered by Sharplin, the captain of the Kew, when the ball took what is called a "ground hop," and came with great force against the lower part of Mr. Neale's abdomen. The unfortunate man was afterwards able to perform the requisite duties, but on the vessel coming to her moorings it was found that inflammation had set in, and notwithstanding the most solve medical assistance, he died in the greatest agony on Saturday morning.

SUDDEN DEATH OF AN ALDERMAN.—Tuesday night the premises of Messrs. Allison and Evernigton, St Paul's churchyard, were entered by thieves, who remained there about twenty seven pieces of silk handkerchiefs and other property belonging to the firm. In all probability the thieves gained entrance whilst some Manchester goods were being taken in the previous day, and secreted themselves in some part of the premises seldom visited.

ALARMING FIRE.—On Wednesday morning, about half past ten o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in a private house (unlicensed) situated in York street, Kingsland-road. The premises contained about six rooms, and were but recently erected. When the flames were first discovered they were raging with great fury in the lower part of the building. The fire spread with such amazing fierceness that, in less than a quarter of an hour after the outbreak, the whole of the premises were in a blaze, and great fears were entertained lest it would have extended to the many adjacent tenements. The engines were, therefore, brought to such a position as to throw the water upon the adjoining houses, and thereby cut off the communication between them and those on fire, which expedient was highly successful, for by half-past eleven o'clock the fire was extinguished, but not before the place was entirely gutted, nothing more than the bare walls being left standing.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—At about half-past six on Saturday morning, as Mr. Langley, butcher, of Hampstead, was driving a light cart rapidly along Turnmill-street, one of the wheels flew off and the unfortunate man was killed on the spot. The horse, exceedingly frightened, proceeded at a fearful pace along Skinner-street, but was fortunately stopped at the corner of Brooke-hill by Mr. Folkhard, of the General Graham public-house. Mr. Langley was a highly-respectable tradesman, and has left a numerous family to deplore his loss.

FATAL OMNIBUS ACCIDENT.—A distressing fatal occurrence took place on the same afternoon in the New Kent-road, to a lad named James Wild, 12 years of age, whose friends reside at No. 10, Lyon-street, Dover-road. It appears that whilst the deceased was crossing the roadway, near the Bricklayers' Arms, he was knocked down by one of the Greenwich omnibuses, and, before the driver had time to stop the horses, both wheels passed over his body. He was immediately picked up and placed on a shutter, and conveyed to Guy's Hospital, where he expired shortly after his admission.

ORDINATIONS.—The Lord Bishop of Exeter held a general ordination in the cathedral church of his diocese on Sunday last.—In consequence of the continued indisposition of the Lord Bishop of Hereford, at All Saints Church, Hereford, on Sunday last.—A general ordination was holden on Sunday last at Peterborough Cathedral.—A general ordination was held on Sunday last in the cathedral church of the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Queen will hold a Privy Council on Monday next, the 2nd of October, at Windsor Castle. The Council is appointed at three o'clock P.M. Summonses were issued for the Council on Thursday from the Council Office.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR.—Friday being Michaelmas day, a common hall was held in the Guildhall, according to annual custom, for the purpose of electing a Lord Mayor for the year ensuing. The names of the Aldermen below the chair were then read over, previously to being put to the court. The name of Alderman Thomas Wood was about to be put, when Alderman Thomas Wood came forward and said, he had some few days before last year under circumstances similar to the present; he now made his appeal with greater confidence, feeling that there was nothing to deter him from aspiring to those high honours which belonged to those who had faithfully discharged their duties. He said he had gone through the most searching ordeal; and although the most persevering industry had been shown in the investigation of his case, there he stood before them, after the lapse of a year, without a charge being brought against him. Deeply-given next came forward to propose the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor for their election as one of the two gentlemen whom they should return to the court of aldermen.—Mr. Lake seconded the motion.—Mr. Coates said, time was when the election of Lord Mayor was vested in the Livery, but, by an usurpation of their rights, a vote was put upon the exercise of such privilege. After some remarks upon the court of aldermen, he proceeded to say that whatever mistakes Alderman Thomas Wood might have made, he had never been guilty of any act which affected his character. He recommended the Livery to return him to the court by their suffrages.—Mr. Richard Taylor complained that the court of aldermen had allowed them to assemble without giving them information upon which to judge of the merits of the charge against Alderman Thomas Wood. A show of hands was then taken, and the election of the Livery was declared to have fallen upon Alderman Magnay and the Lord Mayor, amid loud cheers. A poll was immediately demanded in favour of Alderman Wood.—The Lord Mayor came forward and stated that it was his wish to retire together from the poll. He stated, however, that he should record his own vote in favour of Mr. Alderman Wood.—Mr. Coates said that if Alderman Wood were returned at the head of the poll, it would be of no benefit, because Alderman Magnay, though the lowest on the poll, would be sure to be elected by the Court of Aldermen. Mr. R Taylor also said that the poll was a delusion, as a mere farce.—The Town Clerk began polling.—It appeared by the Act of George I. neither the sheriffs nor the aldermen have a vote

At the poll, after once it has been opened. The poll must, therefore, be kept open for eight days; when it closed after the following were the numbers:—For Alderman Magnay, 207 ,Alderman Wood, 43; the Lord Mayor, 26.—Mr. Alderman Magnay returned thanks, and said that his conduct, if elected to the office of Lord Mayor, would be such as to give universal satisfaction.—The meeting then broke up

LILSFIELD AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATION.—The annual show and meeting of this association took place on Tuesday, and terminated as usual, with a public dinner at the George Hotel next day. On Wednesday morning the cattle and implement show took place in a field on the Burmmaham road, and was numerously attended. Amongst the company on the ground were Sir Thomas Aubrey and Viscount Villiers. Sir R. Peel, the Right Hon W. Yates Peel, Lord Hatherton, Mr. Blackstone, M.P., Viscount Leveson M.P., Lord Ingestre, Mr. Fye, Mr. Bass and a numerous host of agriculturists and gentlemen connected with the district. Sir R. Peel, who was accompanied by his son-in-law, Viscount Villiers, entered the ground shortly before 2 o'clock, and, as a matter of course, became the object of universal attention. The right hon. baronet appeared extremely well and appeared to be in the highest spirits The show of cattle was described by judges to be exceedingly good; but, notwithstanding the contiguity of Birmingham, there was but a small display of agricultural implements. Lord Hatherton, as President of the association, for the year, occupied the chair, and Sir R. Peel officiated as Vice President. The novelty of Sir Robert's position created no small degree of laughter, and the usual toasts were given, but all allusions were ominously abstained from, and that the utmost harmony prevailed

ANTI-CORN LAW DEMONSTRATION AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE! On Wednesday evening a meeting of the Anti-Corn Law League was held at Covent Garden theatre. The theatre was crowded on the occasion, and the stage was occupied by the immediate friends of the League. George Wilson was called to the chair, in which he was supported by Messrs Bowring, Bright, Colden, Hargreaves, Hudson, the chairman opened the proceedings in a lengthened address, which was a mere recital of the report. Mr. Poulton read the report for the past year, from which it appeared that the operations of the association were confined to the distribution of tracts and lectures on the repeal of the Corn Laws, and to the registration courts. During the year tracts were distributed amongst twenty-six counties, consisting of 1,000,000 pages, and in 178 townships, amounting to 1,600 sheets, or a total of 4,000 000 of tracts given to the working classes, and non electors, making a total of 9,000,000 of tracts, weighing 100 tons. There were also 420 000 tracts, stitched up in pamphlets and magazines. Twenty-three boroughs and forty-seven counties remained unvisited by the League. In fifty-six counties of England, Scotland, and Wales, 650 lectures were delivered by fourteen lecturers, and 140 towns were visited by deputations from the League. The great Manchester meeting was attended by 20,000 persons, and 501 deputies. The receipts were £20,280 14s , and the expenditure amounted to £17,814 5s. 9d., leaving a balance of £2,476 16s. Mr. Bright moved the adoption of the report, which was carried, and the meeting was subsequently addressed by Messrs. Bright, Colden, and Fox

FATAL OCCURRENCE.—On Thursday afternoon, between four and five o'clock, the following fatal and distressing occurrence took place, by which a respectable young man, named John George Bayliss, aged about 30, came to his death, and another man, named Payne, had a narrow escape from drowning. About the time abovementioned the deceased and his friend (Payne) were proceeding up the river in a small skiff, hired at Westminster, and had reached as far as Battersea park, when the tide, which was running up very strong, drove them athwart a barge named the Fame, the concussion being so great that the latter was instantly upset, precipitating them into the water. Their cries for assistance were heard by a gentleman named Harding, who was rowing up to Putney, and he hastened to their assistance, but the unfortunate men had by this time sunk for the last time, before he could reach him. Mr. Payne, who had been clinging to the vessel's side, then let go his hold, from exhaustion, and had sunk twice, when Mr. Harding grasped him by the hair of the head, and thus saved him.

FLAMING FIRE.—NARROW ESCAPE OF A FAMILY.—On Thursday morning, about half-past two o'clock, a fire was discovered in a tallow-chandler and grocer's shop, No. 1, London-street, London-road, opposite the Magdalen Institution. The police constable was the first person to alarm the inmates, who, from the smoke issuing from the premises, were all asleep at the top of the premises, which they fortunately accomplished without injury. In a few minutes the engine and firemen from Southwark-bridge-road, as well as those from Waterloo-road and other stations, arrived on the fire, where a powerful stream of water was obtained, and the fire was soon arrested in its progress, but the stock of the shop, counter, &c., were nearly consumed.

FOREIGN

SPAIN.—The subjoined telegraphic despatches reached the French Government at Paris on Wednesday

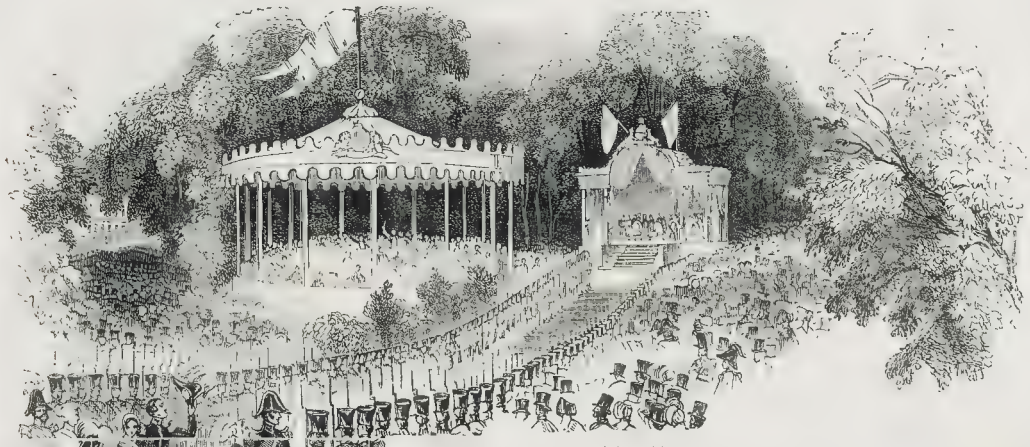
"MADRID, Sept. 23.—One of the powder magazines, at some distance from Madrid, name the Fuencarralles, blew up yesterday morning. Some workmen and guards of the powder have been killed. The city has sustained no serious damage. The cause of this accident is as yet unknown. General Mazarredo, Governor of Madrid, has been appointed to fill, at the same time, the office of Political Chief."

"PERPIGNAN, Sept. 25.—Yesterday, the 24th, Barcelona had not yet been attacked by the troops as had been expected. The day before yesterday, in a sortie, three hundred insurgents were unexpectedly brought back into the town.

"Ametller, on learning the defeat at San Andreu, returned from Tarbes. Two hundred insurgents, who had marched as far as Martorel, have been dispersed by the inhabitants. Fair de Gracia, Mataro, and Arenys de Mar have been brought back 650 soldiers from Valencia, has again taken its departure for that town with the 800 prisoners made by Prim.

BARCELONA, SEPT. 24.—The Saragossa diligence, which arrived here yesterday evening, brought intelligence from that place to the 20th. But as General Bassa had intercepted all communications, not even permitting a diligence to enter the province of Aragon, there is, consequently, a paucity of news concerning this momentous demonstration. Five battalions of militia are organized, and are constantly under arms, or making preparations for the defence of the place, which, if attacked, will, no doubt, be defended with the same heroism as Sarragossa and Gerona did in days of yore. The Count de Palafox and "The Maid of Saragossa," immortalized by her own heroism and the pencil of Wilkie. From some cause, at present unknown, Brigadier Echalecu declined taking the command of the insurrectionary forces, and Colonel Cruf, who distinguished him self in the war of independence, has been named Commander-in-Chief by the Junta. This officer is making every effort to meet further exigencies. Fortifications are being erected, powder and bullets manufactured, and a strong foraging party went out on the 19th and bought a quantity of provisions from the adjacent villages. General Bassa, to the surprise of every one, did not attempt to molest it. He despatched a courier to Madrid on the 17th, and shortly expects to be joined by General Concha, or Narvaez, with a strong division.

HER MAJESTY'S EXCURSION TO BELGIUM.



THE CONCERT IN THE PARK, BRUSSELS.

siasm which Brussels presented on the above occasion. The whole of the streets were lined on the right hand side only by the civic guard the windows and balconies were adorned profusely with garlands, and flags streamed in the air above in great numbers. The streets were thronged with spectators, and the windows on each side of the way were crowded with elegantly dressed ladies, who cheered and waved their handkerchiefs as the cortège passed.

The entry of her Majesty into Antwerp, it will be recollected, was on Tuesday afternoon; and, immediately after the arrival of the illustrious visitors at the royal palace, the city functionaries treated them to the celebrated procession of "the Giant," represented on the annexed page. The procession of the Giant debouched from one of the avenues leading into the Place de Mer, and moved along the street in front of the Palace, affording to the Royal party an admirable view of this strange spectacle, the most perfect vestige of the ancient pageants now in existence in any city in Europe.

It consists in a procession in which are two cars. In the one is seated an enormous figure of a giant, and in another the effigy of a giantess of nearly equal proportions. On an immense platform, on wheels drawn by eight horses, is a whale, about four times as large as the largest fish in the Polar Seas, and from the head of this animal water is squirted forth amidst the crowd by a Cupid who sits astride the nose of the monster. There are other cars in the procession, in one of which is a model of a ship, with masts, rigging, &c., with boys climbing the shrouds and managing the sails. As this long train of cars passed before the eyes of the royal party, our sovereign lady the Queen appeared highly amused at the novelty and grotesque display of the whole scene

Besides the above, there were borne in the procession several relics and emblematic "properties;" as the chair of Rubens, a huge figure of Britannia, a complimentary introduction, &c. The only civic pageant in England to be compared with the Belgic procession is that of Lord Mayor's Day; but the climax of absurdity must be awarded to the former, since the people of every degree laughed "consumedly." About three years since, this procession was exhibited to more than 200,000 spectators, at Antwerp, on the occasion of the inauguration of the great statue of Rubens.

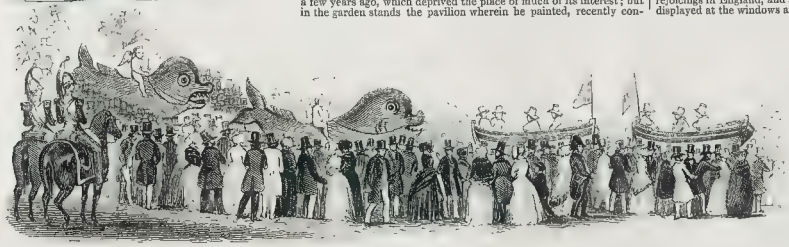
"The Giant," it may be as well to state, is the most important personage in all the fêtes at Antwerp; he stands some 80 or 100 feet high, and is drawn in a car by eight strong horses.

The grotesque pageant having passed, the royal party left the

RUE ROYALE, BRUSSELS.

PROCESSION OF THE GIANT, ON HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO ANTWERP.



The yachts of the royal squadron on the Scheldt were illuminated with blue-lights, which reflected far and wide along the quay and the banks of the river, and lit up the whole scene with an almost temporary daylight, and about nine o'clock fireworks were discharged from the vessels.

Blue-lights were also lighted at the Hotel of the Great Labourer, in the Place de Mer, by some of the English gentlemen staying there, by which the whole street was rendered for the time as bright as at daylight.

Our next engravings illustrate the departure of her Majesty and Prince Albert from Antwerp, on Wednesday, the 20th. At one o'clock the Queen passed, in company with her Royal uncle and his Queen, through the streets leading from the Palace to the quay, amidst the best demonstrations of good feeling from the inhabitants assembled at all points where a view of the cortège could be obtained. On approaching the quay, close to which the Royal yacht was moored, the military band struck up the anthem "God save the Queen," and the cheering became general. Her Majesty was handed on board by King Leopold, the Queen of the Belgians by Prince Albert; Lords Liverpool and Aberdeen, Lady Canning, and Miss Hamilton followed, with the others of the suite and attendants. The Royal yacht immediately got under way under the roar of artillery, the citadel and batteries firing salutes, and the vessels in the Scheldt returning them. As the Victoria and Albert moved gallantly down the river, the cheers from the crews of the yachts of the royal squadron, all of which had their yards manned, rent the air with a true British hurrah. The sight from the quay was a truly glorious one; it was characteristic of the two nations whose connection will be still more closely bound by this re-union of the monarchs who preside over the respective destinies of each.

The basin and entrepôt, and the line of quays that form so grand a characteristic of Antwerp, were the most animated and brilliant ever beheld. The houses and the inhabitants—the ships, merchantmen, men-of-war, the sailors, all wore their gala dresses, and every face was smiling with astonishment and satisfaction. The ships in the basin, as well as in the river, manned their yards and saluted the cortège with shouts and cheers and waving of caps.

The Royal yacht, with the imperial party, steered for Fort Lillo, at which place she lay to for some time. Here the King of the Belgians and his Queen took leave of her Majesty and Prince Albert in the most affectionate manner, and reluctantly quitted the Victoria and Albert for the shore in the royal barge, and, upon the barge's return to the yacht, she proceeded on her passage to England.

From Forts Lillo and Lieffkenseek, the city of Antwerp appears, with its tall spires. These strong works remained, after the Belgic Revolution, in the hands of the Dutch down to 1839, when they were dismantled and given up to the Belgians in exchange for Venloo in Limburg, and abandoned in conformity with the Treaty of the Quadruple Alliance. They completely commanded the passage up and down the Scheldt, which have put on it the appearance of a river; below it is more an arm of the sea, flowing between the island of Zealand.

At five o'clock the Royal yacht passed Flushing, which is about sixty-two miles distant from Antwerp. Here lay the King of Holland's yacht, which our artist has sketched; and it had been re-palace, to visit some of the sights of Antwerp. They first proceeded through the streets to the Place Verte, in which a pavilion and orchestra were erected for a concert, to be given by one hundred members of the Société d'Orphee. The concert was both vocal and instrumental; but her Majesty did not remain till its conclusion, the crowd being very dense, and the noise in the streets so great, that the merits of the performance could not be appreciated. Our engraving shews the Place Verte, or Park, with the colossal statue of Rubens by Geefs, a native of Antwerp. The house in which the great painter resided and died was situated in the Rue de Rubens, not far from the Palais du Roi. The original front was taken down a few years ago, which deprived the place of much of its interest; but in the garden stands the pavilion wherein he painted, recently converted into a dye house! The chair of Rubens, president of the Academy of Painting, is preserved in the Museum at Antwerp; but his château at Steen, in the neighbourhood, is fast falling to decay.

The illumination at Antwerp in the evening was very splendid. The appearance of the streets was brilliant from the immense number of lights at all the windows, and from the lamps suspended to the temporary arches and triangles of wood placed at short intervals from each other on the sides of the pavement; the lights mingled with the firs stuck in the streets, and the wreaths of various coloured linen, and the festoons of flowers, had a very pleasing appearance, creating an effect totally different from anything seen on occasions of public rejoicings in England, and increased by the addition of various flags displayed at the windows and along the houses.

LITERATURE.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE, No. VI.

This number, completing a volume, opens with a somewhat garrulous paper, entitled "England Sixty Years Ago," by Dr. Roden, who in it glances at "the changes that have taken place within the last century in the whole fabric of society—in dress, manners, feelings, habits—in roads, in locomotion—in morals, politics, and religion." These are important matters to press even into a dozen pages—the extent of the Doctor's lucubrations. There is little or no novelty in the treatment of the subject, or rather subjects; the paper only rises to the equivocal literary merit of being respectable. The pair of embellishments, the waggon and the locomotive, connected by "Sixty Years Ago," is a pleasant conceit. We quote one or two of the Doctor's anecdotic illustrations:—

"The improvement in the manners of the aristocracy (always imitated by the class next below them, and thus downwards) led to the improvement of the middle classes; but it was much later ere the immense body of artisans and mechanics began to partake of the general amendment. The high excitement of the war, and the enormous taxes it occasioned, aided the process with the employers, but aggravated the evil among the lower classes. Every man was sure of employment and high wages, while, naught but the character of time of war, the country be not itself, the vast mass of the multitudinous of the labouring class, the cruel and desperate of the large capitals in loans to the government spent a fortune in luxury and drink, and the wages they obtained would scarcely be believed in the present day. I was once present when the clerk of one of our principal brewers was paying his labouring coopers. 'Is it not extraordinary, sir,' said he, 'that although these men gain on the average four guineas a week each, not one can wait till Saturday for his wages, but is compelled to have a portion on account?' In the sudden calls for extra exertion, I have known a packer to the East India Company pay his men twenty shillings for a day's work; it is true it was a day of eighteen hours' labour.

"At this period the labourer had no resource but the public-house: there were no exhibitions open to him, no ornamented park, no wide and elegant streets, no steam-boats, no omnibuses, no palaces or museums accessible to his curiosity, no coffee-shops, no reading-rooms, no cheap publications, no literature, nothing to elevate or inspire self-respect—all was sordid, stupid, soul-deadening debauchery and vice; he was not respected, he was not respectable, he did not respect himself, he lived the life of a beast, and he died careless of the future."

"A Trip to Havre de Grace," without a name, is a slight incident, narrated in a rambling, lively style. Next is a pretty story of "The Stolen Shoulders," by the late author of "Three Courses and a Dessert." Of the remaining papers we can only notice the continuation of Mr. Peake's amusing "Dogs' Tales—The Author's Dog." Here is the opening:—

"A spaniel with a sore eye, which evidently looked as if it had seen better days, was now on his legs.

"After a respectful bow (wow, wow), to the assembled members, he began as follows:—

"I was one of six fubsy puppies that resembled balls of wool, and born at Leatherhead, in Surrey; and after passing the first nine days of my life in a state of blissful darkness, I awoke suddenly one morning, and saw the amiable being to whom I had the honour to be son. The poor old thing was gazing at me with delight as she administered the nourishment customary on infantile occasions.

"My mother's master, Mr. Merrypebbles, was a gentleman of landed property, but who was never perfectly happy if he had not a jolly party visiting at his house, consisting of several odd characters, which it was enabled to describe as 'queer.' I was about three months old, I was presented to a favoured frequenter, one Mr. Delawhang, an author, and thus became an author's dog.

"Mr. Delawhang was a stranger being: he had a good heart, but rather an emollient head. In the precarious profession he pursued he was occasionally in embarrassed circumstances: he was not quite so weak as Oliver Goldsmith, but then, to balance that, he had not his learning or his genius. He could laugh at his own misfortunes, and never cared at raising a laugh against himself.

"'Very hard times, Mr. Delawhang,' remarked a friend.

"'Very,' replied Mr. Delawhang; 'my butcher will not trust me with a leg of mutton, which circumstance causes me to think that 'the times are out of joint'

"Another of the visitors of our host at Leatherhead was a Mr. Roughwood, an attorney of the old school, who had resided in one set of chambers in the Temple for forty-nine years, and during that forty nine years, although he lived freely, he had only once been attacked by indisposition. He felt himself ill about three o'clock in the morning, so he opened his bed-room window, and sprung his rattle. One of the Temple watchmen hearing this, hastened to the spot, and inquired what was the matter? Roughwood, finding himself better, apologized to the watchman for disturbing him, shut his window, and went to bed again. The fact is, he had dreamt that he was very sick.

"Roughwood's principal practice had prospered in those glorious times, before modern innovation had applied itself to simplify the law of this country, and to endeavour to abbreviate the duration of causes.

"Roughwood thus soliloquized: 'Please God, these four Chancery suits will keep me comfortable for the remainder of my days.' He had also a favourite toast, which he was in the habit of proposing when he dined in the hall of Clifford's Inn (a small chapel of ease to the Temple),

> 'Here are plaintiff and defendu t,
> And may they never know the end on't;'

which was, of course, always drunk with heartfelt enthusiasm.

"Then there was old Peabank, the apothecary, who, though no M.D., was called by courtesy Doctor Peabank. He was fortunate in having about a dozen patients, principally ancient ladies, who were never any better nor any worse; good old tough wearing articles, who imagined they were kept alive entirely by the efficacy of Dr. Peabank's draughts and mixtures; when it would not in the least have mattered if Mrs. Jones had taken Mrs. Brown's medicine, or Mrs. Spooner had swallowed Lady Todel's electuary. Peabank's grand secret was in playing whist with his patients, and thus, by losing his points, he made them. Mr. Peabank was an oracle at Apothecaries' Hall, as it was then constituted; and he ordered all the good dinners for the council, &c., at Canonbury House, and was no mean proficient in consuming his share of the same.

"We had other visitors, amongst whom were a newly married couple, a Mr and Mrs Gwillim. He had been a widower, and she a widow twice before. Gwillim was a haughty, ignorant bashaw sort of fellow, but his wife was a dasher, with a pretty face, and a figure that set off a riding-habit well. She drove a pair of horses skilfully, and, if there was occasion, did not make the slightest scruple in rapping out an oath. She had been bred in the country, and had the qualifications of Diana Vernon, without her educational acquirements and taste for literature. Mr. Gwillim fell in love with her riding-habit in Hyde Park, and made her the offer of his hand. She accepted it at a hand gallop, and they came down to Leatherhead to pass a portion of their honeymoon

"And here all the parties were as happy as good eating and drinking, and a change of scene, and country air, generally make people. As for myself, I was a joyous little dog, much caressed, and had plenty of chicken bones.

CHAPMAN'S WEEKLY MAGAZINE. Edited by J. K. CHAPMAN. No. I.

This is a new enterprise of considerable promise for the winter's hearth. Judging by the number before us, the staple of the work will be Nouvellettes and Tales, Adventures and Sketches of Life and Manners. Thus, the work opens with a tale entitled "The Exile," by the Countess of Blessington, in which we recognise the usual clever individuality of character in which the accomplished authoress excels. This paper is followed by an "Adventure of a Commercial Traveller," by Sheridan Knowles. Both papers are only commenced in this number; but as the publication will be weekly, the readers will not be kept on the tenters of suspense for the continuation, as in the monthly magazines. Probably, the most life-like and amusing paper in the number is "A Winter Trip through Georgia and Alabama, U. S.," by Mr. Buckstone, the popular dramatist. We quote a page or two of his experiences:—

"Milledgeville was a resting-place for our dislocated members, where we were allowed half an hour's repose, and another meal of turkey, ham, and eggs, for which repast we paid fifty cents. each, the unvaried charge upon the road. Again we started in our heavy stage, the springs of which would be a matter of much marvel to any of our high-road dragsmen. The red clay for miles was up to our axletree, which caused us to proceed at a very snail-like rate; but, slow as then was our progress, it afforded us the consolation of knowing that our dislocating jottings could not then be so frequent. Still we had to endure them often enough, more especially when, emerging from a mile or two of deep unctuous and tenacious earth, we alighted upon a corduroy-road,—a road made of the trunks of pine trees, laid down transversely; then the driver's crack of his whip, and his command 'Go ahead' to his team, were the signal for a series of sharp and rapid jostlings that no powers of description can perfectly illustrate. The rattling of dice in a box—the shaking of barcolonas in a bag—a seat on the bare back of a sharp trotting nag can convey no similitude to the constant motions of one's body while travelling at a smart pace over a corduroy-road. Every passenger's head was nodding and vibrating as if it must inevitably be shaken off its shoulders, and when at the end of the road, the wheels of the stage suddenly plunged into a three-feet bed of clay, there to rest awhile, the panting of the horses could only be equalled by the panting of the passengers; and as to travelling by steam, the vapour rising, both from the cattle and the breathless insiders, would have put to the blush any of the gigantic locomotive Cyclops or Etnas of our English railroads. Again, to our great relief, we alighted to a repast at a wooden shanty, where a long table was arranged for our reception, and where turkey, ham, and eggs, once more constituted the refreshments, with the usual demand of fifty cents. By night we arrived at Macon, where we descended to supper, which we found to be a repetition of the dinners, breakfasts, and suppers of the previous days—viz., turkey, ham, and eggs, or, perhaps, for supper there might be coffee, eggs, and hot cakes. Off again we jostled with fresh horses, which were always the consequence of our stopping for turkey, ham, and eggs, for our night journey. Amongst our passengers were two stout Kentucky farmers, six feet high, and the merriest fellows that ever helped to alleviate the tortures of such a journey; and though the roads had been rough enough before, they now became worse, and but for the skilful trimming of the coach by my friends the farmers, upset we must have been a dozen times at least; for, on blundering and tumbling down some rough and steep declivity, 'Hold hard!' would the farmers cry; then, as we were all thrown in a heap to the left hand side of the coach, as it appeared to be turning over in that direction, the stalwart Kentuckians would hang half out of the vehicle, on its right hand, and seizing some alarmed passenger to lend the required counterpoise for the mechanism, set us steadily on our wheels, when we would again proceed, amidst the laughter of those that were accustomed to such coaching and the expressions of terror from those who were not. In this way we continued our midnight course,—sometimes with our four horses at full speed; then, again, slowly moving with the usual insidious silence previous to our certain dislocations. Whenever the stage stopped it was the signal for the male passengers to alight, and for all those who were the writer of the present description and farmers escaped a stoppage to his career that he never anticipated. The night was inky dark; the coach had laboured up a rugged ascent, and when at the summit it paused, for the purpose of affording an opportunity for those passengers to descend who preferred walking down the rough hill over which the stage was to rumble and bump in a more than usual degree of enduring the comforts of riding on such an occasion, several availed themselves of the last to alight; and, supposing that we were but resting on the high road, I leaped with considerable agility from the stage, turning at the same time a pirouette previous to standing, as I thought to do, with my face to the coach, in order to survey the descent that I had been many terrific shakings, when I found myself suddenly seized by the powerful arm of one of the Kentuckians, and seized where?—by that portion of my nether habiliments called the seat. I was lifted off my feet, and, to my utter surprise, discovered that I was hanging over a frightful precipice with a torrent rushing some fifty feet beneath; that the supposed high road was a high bridge, with neither railing nor protection on either side to prevent the stranger traveller from toppling headlong into the abyss below, and but for the stout Kentuckian's ready gripe I should, in leaping out of the stage, have precipitated myself into the raging and swollen creek beneath. And there, for the space of ten or a dozen yards, was I suspended over that fearful height, sustained only by a stout grasp of the meanest part of my pantaloons! On being pulled back from my perilous situation, my friend's observation amounted to no more than 'Whar on airth did you thing you were going?' A fine fellow was that Kentuckian! We journeyed through the night and morning till we reached Talbotton, having twice during the time been regaled with the eternal turkey, ham, and eggs. At Talbotton, which, when the railroad from Savannah is completed, promises to be a flourishing place, we passed an aristocratic old gentlewoman, a widow, in her state coach. She was changing her residence, and her appearance on the road, surrounded by her slaves, who were carrying large bundles and articles of furniture on the lady herself, 'with spectacles on nose,' and doubtless with a well filled 'pouch on side,' sat enthroned on her high and antique carriage, drawn by four fine horses and a very imposing effect. On each side of her lady-ship's coach, which must have recalled the sea with the cavaliers in Cromwell's time, walked a body guard of six powerful negroes, and no Queen ever bore a loftier presence or a more regal air than did that fine old dame on her way to her new habitation. At length we reached Columbus, a city on the southern edge of the state of Georgia, where the General Oglethorpe Hotel received us, and where for awhile we not only rested our much-shaken bones, but experienced an agreeable variety to our accustomed viands in some excellent beef and venison, and in the possession of other comforts which a good hotel can afford and a weary traveller knows so well how to enjoy. At Columbus we came up with our fellow-travellers who had taken other roads in the two remaining stages that had started with us from Warrenton, where we had left our snail unharnessed with his twelve boxes. Loud were their complaints against the rugged way they had journeyed. We described what we had endured, but though they had arrived by the best road, their sufferings had been worse than those we had borne, and which was fully proved by their appearance,—one had a black eye, the faces of the little boy and girl were much scratched, one lady's nose had bled profusely,—in short, they had been upset four times; we had escaped any such disaster, which I entirely attribute to the skilful management of our stage by my excellent friends the two Kentuckians."

We wish the new magazine success, which, from the editorial judgment displayed in the number before us, the enterprise well deserves.

THE NEW LINCOLN'S INN HALL.—This very extensive and commodious edifice, in the Tudor Gothic style, has so rapidly advanced since the commencement of the year as to insure its being roofed by the early part of the ensuing spring. In the southern section is the banqueting room, of sufficient dimensions to conveniently dine upwards of 400 persons. In the northern is the library, destined to contain the finest collection of books on British and foreign jurisprudence to be met with in Europe. Superb windows of painted glass will adorn these two principal apartments, which, together with the numerous heraldic emblazonings of distinguished alliances, will produce an effect perfectly in keeping with all around it. The offices and other minor rooms are admirably planned, and the spacious and well-arranged kitchen, will be the first of its kind in the metropolis.

THE FASHIONS.

Paris, Rue Chaussée d'Antin, 21st Sept. 1843.

Mon cher Monsieur,—The engravings which have from time to time appeared in your columns, will no doubt have given you an idea, though perhaps but a slight one, of the fashions of this city. I do not know that I can furnish you with images of any very remarkable variation on any thing there, you will, therefore, I trust, be satisfied with my relation of such fashions as now are in existence, and in the first place you will permit me to draw your attention to two town dresses, whose distinctive character really merits a few words of analysis. The dresses I allude to are made of poult de soie. The first of them being of a sea-green shade, trimmed with two deep flounces, festooned and made of green silk of a somewhat deeper shade, and surmounted with a ruche similarly festooned. The corsage is half high and plain, a fichu à la Marie Antoinette of the same stuff, festooned like the flounces, Oriental sleeves festooned, and long under sleeves of bouillonné muslin, with a sash of green taffety ribbons completes the dress. The second dress was of pearl grey poult de soie. The corsage plain, high, and brought to a rounded point. The adjunct was a mantelet of white lace rounded behind, gathered at the arms, and falling in front in rounded ends trimmed completely round it by deep lace. Whilst I am on the subject of dresses I do not know that I can do better than to describe three robes from the atelier of one of our most fashionable modistes, which have just been exhibited to me. The first is an in-door dress of straw-coloured poult de soie, open in front, and rounded at the bottom, bordered all round with a frilling à la vielle; the corsage is high upon the shoulder, open in front down to a point, and edged by a frill which meets that on the front of the skirt; sleeves à la religieuse, with wide under sleeves of muslin, with the spaces between them with ruffles of lace. The next was a robe of camelion foulard, with a single skirt, the corsage plain and high, with a rounded point, and flu sleeves. With these I saw a ball-dress of embroidered cheek, with a double skirt, the first of which was rose coloured, and made very long; the second, which was infinitely shorter, was of a deep blue. The corsage was very low and brought to a point; the dress was rended complete by a fichu Marie Antoinette of embroidered muslin, trimmed with three rows of lace and fixed in front by means of rose taffety ribbon with long depending ends. As yet our autumnal secrets have been well kept, but it is difficult to visit many of our first rate modistes without gaining some idea worth retaining, and amongst this class I may cite two or three fashions which strike me as very new and very pretty. These are rose coloured crape hats bordered all round the page by a double row of lace, and trimmed with white marabout feathers. Nor should the pailles de ris hats with their rose-coloured plumes, or those in English application lined with white crape and trimmed with a branch of roses, or the fancy bonnets trimmed with two rows of frills in lilac taffety ribbon, and with a yellow plume, tipped with lilac, placed upon the left side of the bonnet, be allowed to pass unmentioned. They are both pretty, fresh, and novel, and really deserve the vogue which they seem to enjoy. I do not know that I have any further news worth your acceptance, beyond the fresh, still fancy Bouquet, one of our shining lights in the world of millinery, is out of country herself, and her unquestionable talents in every thing regards taste in dress, to St. Petersburg, where we are proud to take the Parisian as our particular line. I have often had occasion to cite her exquisite perfections here. I trust that a colder climate may not impair her genius or her fancy.

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'S THEATRE.

Mr. Alcroft, who is an annual beneficiare (about this time of the year) gave a concert at this house on Monday evening last, which was numerously and uproariously attended. The absence of Grisi, who, though announced in the bills, did not appear, irritated some who had made up their minds to hear the last farewell of the celebrated cantatrice's powers, and others contributed not a little to the general din, by vociferously demanding the presence of Richardson, the first flautist of his day, who was also announced, but appeared not. The entrepreneur for the night came forward in the hope of conciliating the malcontents by his oratory, of which the following is a specimen:—"Ladies and Gentlemen, whatever I promise I perform. I mean, I try to perform what I promise—that is I keep my promises when I do promise." This was received with a loud and general laughter, and the performance was allowed to go on without further interruption.

Miss Birch sang the music allotted to Grisi most admirably. Her sister is a vocalist of considerable promise. Mrs. W. H. Seguin gave one of Spohr's songs very charmingly, and Miss Hawes was pointedly effective in "The Minstrel Boy." Mario was in excellent voice and humour, and sang deliciously. John Parry, as usual, was the vocal "clown of the ring," and was encored in both his songs, which call he obeyed in the Irish way, of "singing another thing for the same." Sivori performed the Clochette and his own andante to "The Carnival," with Ernst's variations, most superbly; and Madame Dulcken executed Thalberg's fantasia on subjects from "Guillaume Tell" in a most finished style. One of the chief incidents of the evening was the recognition of Espartero, family, and suite, in one of the stage boxes. He was greeted warmly, and returned the salutations of the audience in a most gracious manner. One of his suite, however, who was mistaken for Nogueras, was howled at and hooted for awhile; but it was soon found that he was not "the murderer of Cabrera's mother." The house was fully, but not over-fashionably, attended.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

OPERA COMIQUE, PARIS.—The long-promised posthumous opera, by Monpiou, entitled "Lambert Simnel" (libretto by M. Scribe), has just made its appearance at this theatre with rather mediocre success.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.—Independent of the new play and new farce which have been announced for production nightly, another novelty will make its appearance, which we sincerely hope will prove to be more fortunate than its unroading predecessor, still recollected by many, under the significant initials of O. P. We allude to the reduction of prices which Mr. H. Wallack has judiciously resolved upon.

EDINBURGH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—This festival will take place on the 9th of October, in the New Town Hall, under the superintendance of Sir H. R. Bishop. The following is a list of the intended performances:—Monday evening, 9th. A miscellaneous Concert. Tuesday morning, 10th. Handel's "Messiah." Wednesday evening, 11th.—A Concert. Thursday morning, 12th.—A selection of Sacred Music. Ditto evening. A grand Ball and Supper. Friday evening, 13th. A Concert. Saturday morning, 14th. A selection of Sacred Music, and a performance on the new organ, by Dr. Gauntlett. This last item pleases us much, with the revival of good organ playing will return genuine counterpoint; but we are at a loss to know what is meant in the programme by the distinctions of "Concert," and "Miscellaneous Concert," or what a "Grand Ball and Supper" can have to do with a "concert of sweet sounds," unless knives and forks be supposed to be obligato instruments.

HIC ET UBIQUE.—If any man possess the power of ubiquity of presence or thought, of a certainty it is Donizetti. The bare penmanship of his partitions would cost some other man their lives, and the facility with which he is quis et ubi would, and does, task credulity, but that we know that the age for miracles is past, and whatever is now, must be bona fide. So, therefore, we hail as a surety of enjoyment another novelty from the pen of this voluminous composer and genius in his art.

MONUMENT TO BEETHOVEN.—The model of this musical giant's statue has just been completed at Bonn, by Professor Hahnel, of Dresden, and it is certainly a most splendid specimen of art. A grand festival will take place next year, on the occasion of the monument being erected, preparations for which have already been commenced.

TOM MAKE YOUR COOKE.—A new ballet, in three acts, is in active preparation at the Grand Opera, Paris, the music of which is to be composed by three different composers. The first act is intrusted to M. de Flatman, a native of Prussia; the 2nd to M. Deldeves, who is also podet-maestro of the Grand Opera; and the third to a M. Baguiller. We know one Tom Cooke that could do the work of the three underlakers, and not catch his death by it.

CHANGE IN MUSICAL TASTE.—The opera of "Stradella," by Niedermeyer, which on its first appearance was received with a storm of disapprobation, has been revived at the Grand Opera, Paris, with immense success. M. Niedermeyer has an act per fatuum in preparation.

HALEVY IN OPERA.—Another composer of that kind, Vincenzo Bellini, who, like Halevy, is Italian-born, is equally distinguished for his knowledge of severe science as for his music. A skill has just composed an opera on the subject of our "Hamlet." It will be amusing to the lovers of English instrumental art to hear the philosophical reveries of Denmark's Prince given forth by the contralto of Madame Stolz!

ULTIMUS ROMANORUM.—Gabriel Frotta, the only surviving disciple of the Scarlatti and Durante Academy, has just died at Vienna, aged eighty-nine. He was the author of many compositions in the church style, celebrated for their taste and learning, and early in life had also written dramatic music. His opera of "Enzio," which was first produced in 1784, obtained the highest success throughout Italy. He was, moreover, the intimate of Cimarosa and Zingarelli, "men renowned in their days"—and still!

LISZT.—This great man is about to proceed to Weimar to perform his three months' resident duty of hospit-meister, after which he will repair to Paris; thence, probably, he will visit Vienna—as to England, it is problematical that he will ever come again.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Let them say and write as they will about our commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, but after all what would England be without her recreations? Not her St. James's, or her Almack's, but her pleasant pastimes under God's own roof, where man meets man in Nature's brotherhood; and in whose honourable encounters none is afore or afore other save as his own good hand shall help him. The aim and end of our popular exercises is in this wise, and in their commonwealth of good feeling such principles of the British character is shown more than in any other of its social phases. Every county has its sports—as an individual her pride has its match with those of a great people all having similar tastes, and pursuing them when and where the chance may offer. If the cards laid aside, it is only to take up the double-barrel: if the rod is dismantled, it is because the purple heather serves its welcome to the highlands. Cub hunting hath begun, and the crisp mornings of the autumn will take no excuse for your presence with your four-footed family among the woods—we know it, but give us a few hours upon the still green turf—come to Newmarket for yet a few brief visits.

Thither, at all events, did ourself wend, what time the present week came in with its brisk breeze, refreshing tonic, after an autumn fracadingy. There was a goodly company, the sporting sport must tell its own quality. So far as the season had gone, the racing—when it made its own running—came off according to the "lines" the intelligent in such a mystery would calculate. At Newmarket "a change came o'er the spirit of our dream." The first October did possess enough interest to extract a solitary wager prefatory at Tattersall's. On Tuesday there was a tolerably active ring in the heath, and some betting was done; but as the events to which it had reference are also done, so let by-gones alone. The plates and handicaps—weak inventions—we also pass over and come to speak of the issues fraught with interest, both instructive and astonishing. The Grand Duke Michael, the important three year old trial of the tried, brought to the post a strong company of the beaten and conquering—Napier being the best public horse by odds. Well, the Lucetta colt, said to have a broken leg at Doncaster, beats him, and four others for pace and bottom, winning a splendid race by a head! The Hopeful—the great two-year-old attraction of the meeting—brought a field of eight to the post, which also ran a fine race, awarded to Mr. Hubert's Antler by a head. But, woe is us! Antler, being named for the Derby as the son of one sire, instead of the son of two (no uncommon mistake), is disqualified for his Epsom engagement. Then came the St. Leger of the south, for which they said Scott must win, and Napier would but they are wrong, for not only did Gaper win—whose forte up to that hour had been a mile—over the D. I, but Lothario, who couldn't win the Great Yorkshire handicap at 6st, beat Gaper with 8st 7lbs up. A fact for your cunning lines and measurements! ex uno the glorious uncertainties of Olympia! As the Derby betting is still in abeyance, and so will continue for some space, we shall pass it, disposition to get on Scott's lot at the snare price, 5 to 1, and to back six against the field for the Cesarewitch — namely, Trueboy, Armytage, Shocking Mamma, Whistle Binkie, Una, and the Currier. There is every promise of brilliant doings at the second October and Houghton meetings.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

NEWMARKET FIRST OCTOBER MEETING.

FIRST DAY.

The Trial Stakes did not fill. The match between Lord Orford and Mr. Sloane Stanley went off in a forfeit. The only races, therefore, actually run were the Grand Duke Michael Stakes, of which the following is a report:—

The Buckenham Stakes of 300 sovs. each, h ft; colts, 8st 7lb; and fillies, 8st 4lb. T.Y.C. One to the post.

Mr. Wreford's b f, by Sultan Junior, out of Mousnia, walked over.

Arrangements are now in active progress for the holding a grand meeting of the archers of Great Britain at York, in August next, when it is proposed that a gold cup, value 100 guineas, and several other prizes of pr portional value, shall be shot for.

CRICKET.—A very excitement match has played on Monday between the officers, &c., of the 1st Regiment of Life Guards, in garrison at Windsor, and a party of Household troops, Gloucester Mews, from the neighbourhood of Langley and Cranbrook, upon the lawn of the cavalry barracks at Windsor. The lawn and several sequestered spots during the whole afternoon by most of the principal families residing in the vicinities of Windsor and Eton to witness the play. The excellent band of the regiment was also stationed upon the lawn, and performed until the conclusion of the game, which was not, however, played out in consequence of the rain, which commenced shortly before five o'clock. The following is the score:

The 1st Life Guards: First innings 103, second innings 97; total 200. Household Troops: First innings 56, second innings, 61. An entertainment was given in the evening at the barracks, to which the officers of the 1st Life Guards sat down to the number of 100.

ARCHERY.—On Tuesday, the 19th, the final day of shooting for this season of the Society of Thirty Bowmen, the great prize intending to contest for the prize assembled on their ground, near to the town of Enfield Wash. The shooting at the distance of 100 yards commenced at half past eleven, and continued till half past one, when the whole company, including many ladies, sat down to a collation. At three o'clock, the shooting was resumed, and continued till six o'clock, when the sound of the silver bugle terminated the contest. The prizes were then awarded to the successful shooters. Mr Sharpley was the winner of the silver arrow and gold spoon, having the most central gold, and declared captain; Mr. Higginson, the winner of the silver bugle, for the greatest score, and was declared lieutenant.

GREAT FOOT RACE FOR 150 SOVEREIGNS.—A match for 50 sovereigns aside, between James Openshaw, a native of Bury, Lancashire, and Robert Williams (better known as the Welsh Runner), a native of Llantrisant, Glamorganshire, three miles, came off on Monday last on the race-course. This match had excited considerable interest in consequence of both parties having been successful in various races, but they had never been together. On the day of the race several hundred pounds were betted, and the sum of £300 deposited in the hands of Mr. Richard Tay, or the security—each party making sure of winning. At the time of starting there could not have been fewer than five thousand persons assembled. A little before two the men paraded before the stand, the colours of the Lancashire man being blue sleeves and blue and white cap, while the Welshman sported white drawers trimmed with red, and a black handerchief on his head. They were led to the starting place (the Judge's chair) by their respective seconds. The shooting at the word "go" was given, and off they started—the Welshman going at a very rapid pace, running at the rate of 30 yards in front of his opponent. But at a short distance from the pit, on the far side of the course, the Lancashire man came up with and went by him, and passed the grand stand first as well as least 150 yards in advance. The distance he preserved during the whole of the race and won his match by upwards of 200 yards, in 16 minutes and 15 seconds. The betting was 2 to 1 on the head ported that his Majesty would, in this beautiful vessel, visit the Victoria and Albert yacht. It was also expected that she would have hove to a short time off Flushing, so that the authorities and inhabitants might have bade our Queen welcome on her voyage to her happy island home. The consuls of Rotterdam and Zealand went out in a boat for this purpose; but as the royal steamer did not stop her engines, they put back without effecting the object of their mission. In the meantime the cannon on board the Dutch frigate the Maes, and that on the batteries, fired royal salutes, and the people, who were assembled in crowds upon the shore, cheered most loudly, and waved their hats: from this point, our artist has sketched a group of Dutch boats, &c.

THE ROYAL YACHT LEAVING ANTWERP.

Penelope has realised all that we predicted of her superior speed, in the description accompanying our engraving of her, in No. 61 of our journal.

Lastly, her Majesty's progress through Belgium, which we have now pictorially chronicled, claims this ample record; for it is an event totally unexampled in history, when considered with the friendly nature of her visit, and the manner of her reception everywhere, and by all classes of the population. It has exceeded, as far as cordiality, good feeling, the honours prepared spontaneously by the people of the great cities and villages through which she has passed, anything that the records of former days detail. Not Queen Elizabeth, in her progress through England, was received in so welcome, so noble, and so national a manner as Queen Victoria has been, in a land to which till now she was a stranger. This visit will form a remarkable epoch in history, and will be looked upon by posterity as one of the signs and features of a prosperous and pacific age.

The royal squadron then took the southern passage, and were saluted from the forts at Bresken as they passed. After making a gallant passage from thence at the rapid rate at which this admirable vessel can so nobly proceed, she arrived off the North Foreland at eleven o'clock, where she anchored during a lovely night.

Seven yachts formed the royal squadron, viz., the Victoria and Albert, the Cyclops, the Blazer, the Tartarus, the Prometheus, the Fearless and the Penelope. This last-named vessel, which, it will be remembered, is a man of war cut in two and lengthened, and made into a steamer, has, in the trip from Ostend to Antwerp, proved herself a fast vessel, and is, perhaps, superior to any steamer in the squadron, with the exception of the Victoria and Albert. Hence, the

It is more than 500 years since an English monarch was in Antwerp. Edward III. visited the city in 1338.

We may here correct a mis-statement that her Majesty and Prince Albert visited the field of Waterloo on the evening of the 19th. The mistake originated with a Brussels paper, and probably arose from the fact that the Earl of Aberdeen went to Waterloo to visit the grave of his gallant brother, Sir Alexander Gordon, who fell upon that field, and the account of whose death is so feelingly recorded by the Duke of Wellington in a despatch written to his family.

IMPROMPTU LINES ON HER MAJESTY'S EXCURSIONS TO THE CONTINENT.

Non cuivis homini contingit adire Corinthum.

How few—how few—the favour'd few
That have the health—the means, to view
The meeting of the mighty ones
Whom destiny has plac'd on thrones!
It must, in truth, be gladsome thing
To see a Queen salute a King
With all the honest truth and grace
That we, in humble village place,
Bestow, with heart, on one another—
A sister here—and there a brother.

But, oh! it makes each bosom thrill,
To think that something better still Than merely formal salutation
Results for good of either nation!

In ancient times 'twas Kings' ambition—
Thrones that stirr'd the crowd's sedition!
Million-slayers of their race,
Falsely deemed heroes—for some place
Of paltry grandeur, would not pause
To break through e'en divinest laws;
And for their own and selfish plunder
Tear a people's peace asunder!

Such is the picture that we view,
From doubtful Troy to Waterloo,
Of sad reality!—the scene
Of what, too many a time, had been Before, in other theatres,
A tragedy for the universe;
If Peace had not her olive spread
Above that mighty field of dead;
And told the living, to its sway
The laurel should henceforth give way—
Not the sweet laurel that doth bind
The brows of him with poet-mind,
But that coronal chronicle
Which but of war and blood can tell!

DUTCH BOATS, ETC. ON THE SCHELDT.

Happier days are smiling o'er us—
Happier still are yet before us,
If the great ones of each land
Will but kindly, hand-in-hand,
Follow up the bright example
Lately shown to us, and trample
On all prejudice of nation,
Meeting but in emulation
Which should most sincerely prove
To Heav'n their duty, and their love
To fellow-creature, tho' in PLACE
Where heretofore 'twas held disgrace
To have aught feeling for their kind,
Or think the SOVEREIGNTY OF THE MIND,
Like death, can make impartial call
At cottage door, or princely hall!*

Halcyon now the future seems,
Hence!—away with anxious dreams—
Dreams, where vision'd peace hath spoken;
But too oft they have been broken,
And her gentle accents drown'd
In the thund'ring waves of sound,
With which wild war in rude commotion
Lov'd to deluge land and ocean!

The storm is past—the tempest done—
Fix'd the light of Albion's sun,
As when the patriarch of old
Imposed on his its heav'n-ward hold
Till all resisting foes were gone!
SUCH LIGHT IS 'ROUND VICTORIA'S THRONE! W.

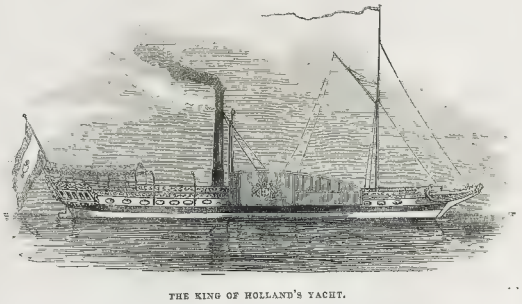
THE KING AND QUEEN OF THE BELGIANS TAKING LEAVE AT LILLO.



THE KING OF HOLLAND'S YACHT.

THE LATE SIR MATTHEW WOOD, BART, M.P.

Sir Matthew Wood, whose name is so well known to the public for the active part he took in most of the political struggles of the last twenty-five years, and particularly in all the proceedings relative to the differences between George the Fourth and his Queen, died on Monday morning last, after a long and severe illness, at Madstone, near Gloucester, the seat of Dr. Maddy, his son-in-law. He had resided there about a week, for the sake of change of scene; it was destined to be the last scene of a not uneventful history.

Sir M. Wood was born on the 2d of June, 1768. At the period of his demise, therefore, he was in the 76th year of his age, and that long term of life was an exceedingly busy one. He was extensively engaged in mercantile pursuits, an occupation which alone engrosses the whole lives of many men; and, in addition to that, he was an active politician, an earnest partizan of the cause he espoused, which was that of the liberal party, sparing no personal exertions in support either of persons or principles which he considered to be unjustly attacked. Hence, his interference on behalf of Queen Caroline, when she seemed "evilly entreated" by those who were, above all others, bound to defend her from injury. It is a sad story, and one which it is useless now to revive even for the sake of paying a tribute of admiration to the zealous and disinterested exertions of the subject of our notice, who acted only from the purest motives, whatever might have been the personal faults and indiscretions of the chief object of his endeavours. We fear there were many about the person of the unhappy Queen whose zeal was not quite so single-minded. But be all this as it may, it is certain that the course pursued by Sir Matthew Wood, during the whole of these humiliating transactions, made him exceedingly popular at the time; and, more fortunate than many of those who float for a while on the wave of public favour, the esteem he won he maintained down to the hour of his death. His name is linked with a chapter of English history which the future annalist of the century that is passing cannot treat with neglect. Two other men, more gifted with the talents that command admiration from all, and who were equally conspicuous at that period, still survive—Lord Denman and Lord Brougham. They have each since played higher parts on the stage of politics; but as far as regards the transactions to which we have just alluded, the name of Sir M. Wood is linked with their own.

Sir Matthew Wood was the son of William Wood, Esq., of Tiverton, in the county of Devon, and was born in the year we have above stated. He married, in 1795, the daughter of John Page, Esq., of Woodbridge, in the county of Suffolk. He embarked extensively in the commercial world of London, where he was engaged in business as a hop merchant. It was the public career which the civic honours of this great corporation throw open to its members that introduced him to the wider sphere of politics; he was elected an alderman of Cripplegate Ward in 1807, at a comparatively early age, and filled the civic chair in 1815-16; he had the honour—very rarely accorded—of being elected Lord Mayor for the next year. He was first returned to Parliament in 1812, since which year he has always been elected as one of the representatives of the City: he has been a member of the House of Commons in nine parliaments, supporting in the last the same liberal principles which returned him to the first. He was created a baronet in 1837. For this long hold upon the suffrages of the largest representative body in the kingdom, to what was Sir Matthew Wood indebted? Not to his abilities—for they could not be considered to be above the average: as a public speaker he had very many superiors, his style being as little elevated as can be imagined; he had none of the powers of an orator either to rouse the feelings or rivet the attention of an assembly. Nor was he an intriguer or a holder of office; for the greater part of his political life the party to which he attached himself was condemned to the "cold shade" of Opposition. His career proves that there are other qualities which men honour and respect, besides commanding talents or brilliant eloquence. Sir M. Wood retained his hold upon his constituents by the force of his consistency and the integrity of his political principles. In his politics he was strictly honest; having chosen his path he kept it, turning neither to the right hand nor to the left; and, as he began, so he continued, "even unto the end." When the Reform Bill was introduced, he gave it his strongest support; though, years having then begun to tell upon him, he was less active in his advocacy than he would have been had that event occurred some ten years sooner. Since that period, increasing years brought with them their increasing infirmities; and he gradually withdrew himself from the scenes of political contest, though still ready with his vote for the Liberal cause on all questions of more than ordinary interest. Many a political reputation has been more brilliant, but none have exhibited to a greater degree that consistency on the part of the representative, and perfect confidence in the represented, which gives strength and endurance to the mutual connection, than that of Sir Matthew Wood.

The deceased baronet has left behind him immense wealth, to the greater portion of which he had but lately succeeded: the decision of the House of Lords, given in August, 1841, put him in possession of the bequests left him, as executor to the will of the eccentric Jemmy Wood—as he seems to be invariably called—the rich banker of Gloucester. The mass of wealth which this miser left behind him, though subjected to the "sweating process" of the most enormous litigation, which lessened it by an amount equal to three or four splendid fortunes, was still of immense magnitude. Sir Matthew Wood is said to have succeeded to about one million sterling. The manner in which the connection between them was brought about is not a little curious, and shows in a striking manner "what great effects from trifling causes spring." At the time the proceedings against Queen Caroline were in agitation, they excited the greatest interest all over the country, and, among other places, at Gloucester, and, among the inhabitants of that city, in the sister of the ever-getting banker. She was so enthusiastic in the cause of the Queen, that she sent a donation of one hundred pounds towards a fund then raising, which sum, of course, passed through the hands of Sir Matthew Wood. This led to a correspondence, and the correspondence to an acquaintance. The late baronet subsequently visited Gloucester, and paid his personal respects to the munificent contributor to the cause of persecuted Majesty. The lady, we presume, was well pleased with the popular advocate of the Queen, as she left him her house in Gloucester by will, to which he, in course of time, succeeded. On the death of the sister, however, the old banker grumbled not a little at the property being left "out of the family," for though bearing the same name, they were not related. Sir Matthew, who, it may naturally be supposed, did not particularly require the small addition to his income, instantly offered old Wood the whole and entire possession of his sister's house during his natural life. The offer was not accepted, but the spirit in which it was made pleased the old man very much, and a friendly connection was kept up between them; during this period, the penurious banker made frequent use of Sir Matthew's parliamentary privilege of franking letters, to the saving of many shillings annually in his postage, an object of no small importance in his eyes. This drew the connection closer, and the result of the friendship thus created was, that the late baronet was left executor to the strangely-drawn will of the wealthy man, who, as far as the true enjoyments of life are concerned, might have been looked down upon with pity by many a London mechanic. The executorship, though it gave him an immense addition to his property, must also have occasioned Sir Matthew great anxiety; we shall scarcely err, perhaps, if we state that the inheritance contributed to hasten his end. His demise occasions a vacancy in the Court of Aldermen, and in the representation of the City. Our engraving is taken from a family portrait, painted many years since. A view of the house of "Jemmy Wood," at Gloucester, will be found in a late number.

HEAD OF "THE QUEEN OF BEAUTY." BEHNES SCULP.

MARBLE HEAD OF "THE QUEEN OF BEAUTY," BY BEHNES.

The great beauty and value of the pet horses of the English nobility are unrivalled throughout the world; and the annexed is a superb sculptural memorial of one of the finest specimens. It represents the bust of the celebrated mare "The Queen of Beauty," so highly admired at the famed Eglintoun Tournament. She was the property of Lord Seymour; her colour was a bright chesnut; her descent not well known, but possessed a considerable share of Arab blood; her form was extremely graceful, and her action noble. This beautiful creature was killed through the cruelty of a groom, by over-riding. Her noble owner, anxious to possess a memorial of so fine an animal, commissioned Mr. W. Behnes to execute her bust in marble; and the remarkable fidelity with which the sculptor has executed his commission renders his performance more valuable as a portrait than an ideal head. It is the great attraction of Mr. Behnes' studio, and has added to his fame for equestrian sculpture.

The mare was ridden by Lady Seymour at the tournament; the superb group from which, in silver, will be found engraved in No. 38 of our journal.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE; OR THE SISTERS.
A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXV.

WHEN the news of Charles and Frederick having been permitted to leave France arrived in England, Sir Arthur—who was still extremely ill, and who daily grew more and more feeble—was so delighted, that, notwithstanding the fact was imparted to him gradually, Dr. Hawtree had reason to fear that the transition from grief to joy would prove immediately fatal, and as Alice—who received a communication direct from Fred.—ran about the house in a state of wild rapture, he found, while attending to both and endeavouring to subdue their sudden ecstacies, that he had quite enough on his hands

To Caroline, however, this intelligence afforded no pleasure: it was, on the contrary, highly depressing, for she felt that the influence of Charles over Sir Arthur would be infinitely greater than before, while her power would be in proportion diminished. So long as she imagined that Charles would not return until after Sir Arthur's death—which all daily expected—she was content; but now there existed in her mind no doubt of his returning before that event, she became quite alarmed.

Having dwelt for some time upon the course which she ought to pursue in this extremity—for an extremity, under the circumstances, it was held by her to be—she, taking advantage of a long deep sleep which Dr. Hawtree, with the view of tranquillising the mind of Sir Arthur had induced, called upon Darnley—whom she had not seen, although he had written to her, since she and Jane were discovered in his room—and proceeded to communicate to him the intelligence which had been that morning received, and which had a direct tendency to strengthen the latent hope he had entertained.

After a short interview, in which he expressed his determination to defend her against any slanderer, he renewed his protestations, which she treated with more than her usual coldness.

During Caroline's absence, however, Falkland, conceiving that his zeal would be handsomely rewarded, entered Sir Arthur's room on great haste, and when he had intimated to him that he wished to communicate something in private, the other attendants were ordered to withdraw.

"I am sorry, Sir Arthur," said he, when they were alone, "very sorry indeed, to inform you of what I have just seen, but I feel it my duty to tell you, Sir Arthur, however unpleasant to my feelings it may be."

"What is it, Falkland?" enquired Sir Arthur, faintly.

"During occasion, Sir Arthur, to pass Mr. Darnley's, about half an hour ago, I saw my lady get out of a coach that stopped very near the door."

"You did!" cried Sir Arthur, with a start which shook his frame. "Well, did she go to the house?"

"She did: I saw her enter."

"Are you quite sure of that?"

"Certain, Sir Arthur: oh, certain."

"Might you not have been mistaken?"

"Impossible! impossible."

"Was she alone?"

"Quite alone."

"Was not her maid with her?"

"No: she has not been out of the house."

"Falkland, you have surely, in this instance, made a mistake!"

"No, Sir Arthur, I could make no mistake; I was too near, and watched too closely for that."

"Might it not have been some one dressed like her? Did you see her face?"

"I did."

"Well and did you see her come out?"

"I left her there, thinking it my duty to hasten back to you."

"And she has not yet returned?"

"Not yet."

"Very well. Leave me. But remember!—not a word—not a word."

Falkland—who expected a legacy for this, and who had gone out expressly to watch his mistress on speculation—then quitted the room, and Sir Arthur was again plunged into misery.

The constant attention of Caroline during his illness, her anxious care, and apparently strong hope of his recovery, had in some degree removed his suspicions; he had felt that although indiscreet, she might be virtuous: he wished to believe that she was pure, but now, every hope of her being so vanished: her faithlessness appeared to him in far deeper colours than ever, and while he ascribed her recent seemingly-kind conduct to accomplished duplicity, he could not but feel that she was infamous.

When, therefore, Caroline repaired to his bedside on her return, she found him groaning beneath the weight of his afflictions, unconscious at the time of her having entered the room.

"Do you not feel so well, my dear?" she enquired, bending over him, and taking his hand.

Sir Arthur, on hearing her voice, turned with a look of anger, and withdrawing his hand, said with all the energy of which he was then capable, "Where have you been?"

"Not far, my dear; I have not left you long. do not think me unkind: you have frequently wished me to take a little exercise: nay, you have scolded me for keeping so constantly at home."

"That is no answer. My question is, where have you been?"

"Why do you ask, my dear?" rejoined Caroline, who now perceived that he, at least, suspected.

"Look at me, madam!" cried Sir Arthur, "now, tell me at once, where you have been!"

"Nay, I will not, until you have explained why you ask me."

"Whom have you called upon? Whom, madam, have you been to see?"

"Why shake thus with passion? Why will you thus injure yourself? What new fancy is this?"

"It is no new fancy: alas! it is now no fancy at all. You have again been to see that villain!—that Darnley!"

"Is the no fancy?"

"No, madam, no!—I know you have!—I know it!"

"How? tell me that."

"Have you the audacity to say that you have not?"

"Why should I subject myself to the charge of audacity? You say that you know I have been there! If so, of what value, in your estimation, will be any declaration of mine to the contrary?"

"If of you declare to me now, that you have not been there this morning?"

"Why assume—well, sir, to do so—when you state that such a declaration would prove my audacity? But surely, presumptuous as I have been, it is not too much for me to ask how you came by the information respecting those diamonds?—That, however, must have been my infamous aunt, who was the only one to whom I ever said a word about them—but who led you and the Mayor to Dursley's, when you found me there; and who has now told you that I have been there again? Until I know, I will not make another attempt to satisfy you upon any one point."

"I am already satisfied!"—faintly, cried Sir Arthur—"satisfied on every point—especially satisfied am I, that you are faithless!"

"I am not faithless, Sir Arthur Cleveland, although your conduct would cause any woman of spirit to be so, if she possessed not in her soul sufficient honour to keep her honest."

"Oh, Caroline, I am unhappily too well convinced of your wickedness. But leave me—leave me. I cannot bear to see you!"

"If I am so hateful in your sight I'll not remain. I will leave you, Sir Arthur, but in the perfect conviction that you will be at no loss for good and sufficient reasons that you have treated with cruel injustice one who has never been faithless to you."

She then quitted the room, and rang the bell immediately for one of the servants, being resolved to discover, if possible, who it was that had informed Sir Arthur of her visit to Darsley.

"Did Dr. Hawtree call while I was absent?" she inquired.

"No, my lady," replied the servant.

"Has Mr. or Fulgrand been here?"

"Not this morning."

"Who has been here this morning?"

"No one, my lady."

"Who attended to Sir Arthur during my absence?"

"I and William, my lady, till Falkland came up, and then we were ordered to leave the room."

"Had Falkland been out?"

"Yes; he had then just returned."

"Oh! Very well; that will do. Stay," she added, "I want Falkland—desire him to come up."

She now felt certain that he had been sent to watch her, but in order to place the matters beyond all doubt, she determined at once to put a question by which the fact might be ascertained.

"Falkland, is your watch correct?" she inquired with an air of carelessness.

Falkland mechanically drew it forth, and expressed his opinion that it was right by the Horse Guards.

"Ah! then what time was it when you saw me this morning?"

"What time, my lady," returned Falkland, much confused. "I took no particular notice; it might have been half past one."

"Oh! about half-past one. Very well."

"But I hope your ladyship"

"Silence," exclaimed Caroline, proudly. "Leave the room!"

Falkland did leave the room, but with his mind in a state of disturbance; and Caroline, feeling now perfectly sure that she had been watched, and as a spy upon her actions, immediately returned to Sir Arthur.

"You have again!" he cried feebly, as she entered. "Why will you persist in thus annoying me?"

Sir Arthur Cleveland," said Caroline, approaching his side, "I find that you have had the unutterable meanness to set a common servant to watch me. Falkland is the creature whom you have employed, he is the wretch who informed you that I this morning called upon Dursley. Do not deny it, sir," she added, as Sir Arthur was about to speak. "I have proved it out of his own mouth."

"I have no wish to deny it," and Sir Arthur. "He did tell me. Did he not tell me the truth?"

"Do you, Sir Arthur Cleveland, for a moment imagine that I shall condescend to put my word in competition with his for you to decide upon which to believe?"

"He is told me a falsehood or the truth?"

"Why, what can a man expect when he meanly bribes his servant to watch the actions of his wife?"

"I did not bribe him to watch you in this instance."

"In the instance! Did you not bribe him before?"

"I certainly"—replied Sir Arthur, perceiving that the man had told her all—"I certainly did make him a present."

"For shame, Sir Arthur Cleveland!—for shame! Look at the natural effect of this disgraceful practice. Suppose that I had been jealous of you, and had so far degraded myself as to bribe him to watch your conduct, do you imagine that I should have bribed him in vain? Do you think that he, solely for the sake of the bribe, would not have fed my imagination, or that of the fire of jealousy would not be fed sufficiently with truth, he would hesitate to feed it with falsehood? No, Sir Arthur Cleveland, you cannot imagine anything so absurd, and yet you will rail or believe him even when they say. You have proved it."

"Have you proved that I ought to believe him to be wrong before where he told me I should find you? But even now, if you will solemnly declare"

"I disdain to make any declaration on the subject. I'll not, Sir Arthur Cleveland, thus degrade myself."

At this moment Dr. Hawtree was announced, and when he had taken Sir Arthur—who was then extremely tremulous—by the hand, he exclaimed, "Why, how is this? What have you been about? What has caused all this excitement?"

"That wicked woman," said Caroline, intensely, "and this from one ..."

"Lady Cleveland," said Dr. Hawtree, with all the coldness he could assume, "will you do me the favour to leave us? You perceive that Sir Arthur is far too weak to converse into any explanation."

"He is not too weak, Dr. Hawtree, to denounce me; no, he has sufficient strength for that."

"His life, Lady Cleveland, is now in my hands, and therefore I must beg of you to leave us."

Caroline, having looked at the Doctor intently for a moment, burst into tears, and retired

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXV.

ST. MARGARET'S, WESTMINSTER.

The church of St. Margaret's, situated in New Palace-yard, on the north side of Westminster Abbey, was originally erected by Edward the Confessor, in 1061; rebuilt in the reign of Edward I., by the parishioners, but has since been frequently repaired, particularly in 1735, 1758, and 1803, at the expense of Parliament, it being considered a national foundation for the use of the House of Commons. In 1758, every part of the structure was ornamented, and the east end wrought into a circular sweep, surmounted with a sort of half cupola, in squares of beautiful Gothic design. Under the eastern window, and round the sides of the altar, are various ornaments in a similar style. On the altar-table is a fine basso relievo of our Saviour and the Disciples at Emmaus. One of the disciples is dressed like a Roman Catholic friar, and across his shoulders hangs a cardinal's hat; and behind the other disciple stands a page in Italian costume, with hat and feathers! The church is 130 feet in length, 65 in breadth, and 45 in height. It has an excellent peal of ten bells. At the extremity of one of the side aisles is a tablet with this inscription:—

Within the walls of this church was deposited the body of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, Knt., on the day he was beheaded in Old Palace-yard, Westminster, Oct. 18, ann. dom. 1618.—

Reader, should you reflect on his errors,
Remember his manifold virtues,
And that he was a mortal.

This church also contains an inscription in honour of Caxton, the printer, placed here by the Roxburgh Club; and a monument to Sir Peter Parker, with an epitaph by Lord Byron. But the "curiosity" of the church is the beautiful east window of stained glass, of which the following is the singular history:—The magistrates of Dort, in Holland, desiring to present Henry VII. with something worthy to adorn his magnificent palace then building at Westminster, directed this window to be made, and Henry and his Queen sent their pictures to Dort, whence their portraits in this window are delineated. King Henry dying before the window was completed, it became the property of an abbot of Waltham, who placed it in his abbey, where it remained until the dissolution of it, in 1540. Robert Fuller, the last abbot, removed it to a chapel in New Hall, Lord Ormond's seat, in Wiltshire, which was afterwards possessed by Thomas Bullen, father of Ann Bullen. In Elizabeth's reign, New Hall belonged to the Earl of Sussex; of his family the Duke of Buckingham bought it. His son sold it to General Monk, who buried the window under ground, but after the Restoration erected it in the chapel. His son dying without issue, and the Duchess neglecting the seat, the chapel became ruinous. John Olvius, having probably purchased the estate from the heirs of the Monk family, demolished both house and chapel, but preserved the glass, in the hope of selling it for some church. It lay cased up in boxes till Mr. Conyers purchased it, for his chapel, at Copt Hall, near Epping, when he employed Price, an artist, to repair it. Mr. Conyers, building a new house, sold the window for 400 guineas to the Parliamentary Committee for repairing St. Margaret's church, in 1758.

The position of St. Margaret's church has been generally censured, as "intercepting the view of the Abbey, and that exquisite adjunct, the Chapel of Henry VII., without enrobbing the eye with full expression by any architectural beauty;" in short, the structure has been condemned as an unsightly excrescence. Now, Edward the Confessor endowed it with original Sanctuary privileges, immunities, and adding thereto the privilege of sanctuary, its environs became an asylum for bankrupts, traitors, murderers, and thieves; who lived here in security, in open defiance of justice; and who became so numerous, even in his lifetime, that Edward built St. Margaret's church, expressly for their use, in order that this dangerous community might not incommode the monks in the Abbey church; in the south aisle of which they had been accustomed to assemble.

The idea of removing St. Margaret's Church has often been agitated, but Mr. Bardwell, the architect, has endeavoured to show that this design, so far from improving the appearance of the Abbey Church, would very much injure it; a position which is completely proved by Lichfield, Durham, Salisbury, and Chichester, where the iron hand of innovation has done its utmost to destroy the multitudinous grandeur, and mysterious charm of these glorious piles. Westminster Abbey church, likewise, has not much been too much deprived of its subordinate features: it formerly arose a magnificent apex to a royal palace, surrounded by its own greater and lesser sanctuaries, its greater and lesser almonries; its bell-towers, chapels, prisons, guesthouses, boundary-walls, and a train of other buildings, of which we, at the present day, scarcely form an idea. We, indeed, can but faintly imagine the glories of Westminster Abbey." If St. Margaret's were removed, Mr. Bardwell says, what would the parishioners gain but a mere brick and plaster apology for their venerable temple, founded by St. Edward, and rebuilt by Edward I., in which statements all historians agree, although its pillars and arches are decidedly of the time of Edward IV. "We are in its towers, and indeed its exterior generally, its removal would involve the destruction of another of history's landmarks, at a time, too, when all vestiges of the confessor's residence are about to be swept away." Mr. Bardwell's statement by Mr. Bardwell, who has found by admeasurement of the excavation for the common sewer in St. Margaret-street, that the present ground is nine feet above the original surface, having been raised by successive accumulations of rubbish, &c., since the foundation of the Abbey. Unfortunately, the tombs of both St. Margaret's Church and the Minster were formerly ascended by very considerable flights of steps, such as we observe attached to many of the Continental cathedrals.

Mr. Barry, we perceive, from his Report to the Commissioners on the Fine Arts, favours the removal of St Margaret's Church, in his grand design for the completion of the exterior of the new Houses of Parliament; adding, "St. Margaret's Church, if sufficiently remain in its present position, should be improved in its external decoration, in order that it may not disgrace, as it now does, the noble pile of the abbey, which rises before it."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last statement, the receipts of English wheat up to our market have been on a very moderate scale, and of middling quality. Fine dry samples have met rather a brisk demand to-day, but last week's quotations, while other kinds have gone off steadily, at about late rates. In fine foreign wheat rather an easier one business has been transacted, and previous currencies have been nearly sustained. Barley has met a very dull inquiry at drooping figures, the value of the last quarter. The malt trade has ruled dull, but nevertheless we can notice no alteration in prices. Oats, beans, peas, and flour have sold at late rates.

Arrivals [illegible]. Wheat, 5960; Barley, 2480; Malt, 4990; and Oats, 1600 quarters. Flour, 2[illegible] sacks. Foreign:—Barley, —; and Oats, 15,980 quarters. Foreign Wheat, 34[illegible] quarters.

GOVERNMENT AND THE RECESS.

When Parliament is sitting the attention of society naturally turns upon the great business of legislation, but there seems no reason why during the recess the welfare of the nation should be a whit the less cared for by the Government or the people. The recess, in times like these, is not to be regarded as a mere time of relaxation, but rather as a period for contemplative industry on the part of those who rule, as affording undisturbed occasion for settlement of purpose, formation of project, and determination of action and enterprize, when the energies of the country shall be again placed at the disposal of the Government in the legislative assemblies of the land. We readily accord a little hastily snatched recreation to the jaded minister; we give him a few holidays from thought, pressure, and anxiety, with fair, unGrudging grace—but in such crises of difficulty as thicken around us, we can honestly do no more. We feel that the minister must now be the slave of the honourable destiny which has called him to the helm of state; that although Parliament is for a season dumb, the voice of the people summons him from pleasure and repose, and appealingly reminds him of the vast plans that must be framed for their relief, tranquillity, or happiness, in almost every corner of the empire, every artery of public life. It is thus that at this eventful moment we look with deep anxiety at the movements of public men, and that the Premier and the Home Secretary are especially marked out for observation—marked out by all the conflicting interests of party—by hopes, ambitions, disappointments, and regrets—by the changeful destinies of the people—the discontents of classes—and the enduring hopefulness of the poor. Loyalty and disaffection alike fix upon these two ministers their gaze of scrutiny—trade and agriculture watch them with equal curiosity and impatience—Rebecca and O'Connell ponder over their activity or their listlessness—and the power of the present and the future seems for the moment almost dangerously balanced in their hands. The feeling which we fear pervades the country is, that now, when the Government has all the responsibility of public affairs upon its own shoulders, too much inertness, too little decision, is displayed. There is a kind of consciousness imposed upon the country by the history of public events, that where all other classes are most busy, Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham are—like the lazy negro, who loved his work so well that he would lay down and sleep by its side—slumbering over the arduous labour imposed on them. Ireland is in a perfect eruption of energy—the volcano of agitation is discharging its lava over all the land the tongue of the liberator is the emblem of perpetual motion—and Repeal points towards rebellion with the eye of discord, and the finger of flame. Sir Robert Peel, however, does not seem to look to this—he is not countervailing the mischief with which the recess is rife. He thinks the Irish Etna will burn itself out. Not it; although it is our inmost prayer that it may. But what are we to think of the dangerous displays of which we find a daily record in the national press? What are we to think of organized armies—the mounted cavalry of Repeal? men mounted and trained —marked out by a badge, or uniform—distinguished by wand and cockade "formed into troops, led by officers, and followed by six ranks, four abreast"—then addressed by their peaceful agitator to the effect that "Ireland had made her demonstration, and hundreds of thousands of fighting men had met;" and this followed by "tremendous cheers and hurraing, which lasted some time, all the company standing up unanimously;" then this further-cheered inference from the enthusiasm that "one would think they had a taste for fighting." Will any one declare the elements of peaceful feeling or obedience to the laws to dwell in these dreadful demonstrations? Do not such appeals as that we are about to quote convulse tranquillity out of the very heart of the land. These words were spoken by O'Connell at the meeting at Mullaghmart: -

> Where my voice is now sounding in your ears where ye now stand on the sea sod, there once was heard the wild shriek of horror and despair—the agony of the inflicted wound, the hasty fo[illegible] groan of fast approaching death. On this spot where we stand were the persons unarmed, and confiding Irish chieftains. On this spot did the[y] fall [illegible]ng] the Saxon bayonet and sword, used in security and therefore [illegible]difficulty in dealing death to their plighted guests, whilst the triumphant shout was raised over an unarmed prey. (Great sensation.) 300 Irish chiefs perished here! They came, confiding in Saxon honour, relying on the protection of the Queen, to a friendly conference in the midst of revelry, in the cheerful mirth of the banquet house, they were surrounded and butchered None returned, save one. Their wives were widows, their children fatherless In their homesteads was heard the shrill shriek of despair—the cry of bitter agony (Sensation, sobs, and cries of "Oh!") Oh, Saxon cruelty! how it cheers my heart in all its misery, to think that you dare not attempt such a deed again! Enthusiastic cheering, and cries of "Never, dare they.") Let every mother who hears me, think of the moment when each chief left his home with a parting to wife and babes Let her—oh, let her imagine for a moment, that husband, the father of those children, brought home to her a bruised and bloody corpse. (Hear.) In the pride of manhood, in the confidence of strength, with sinewy arm, capable, if but prepared, to defend her from any foe, did he leave her; next day he was brought home in all the misery of death powerless to defend, incapable to afford anything but bitter grief, interminable sorrow! (Cheers.) Oh, indeed, England, thy crimes have filled the cup of bitterness The blood of [illegible] cries against [illegible] but me cannot be far from you, but thou, oh, Ireland! hast days of misery still before thee Thou hast suffered much, and committed no injury in return. (Cheers.) I defy Saxon ingenuity to show when you violated a treaty, broke a compact, left your plighted faith unredeemed. My glorious countrymen, the contrast between you and your tyrants is to me a subject of the highest delight. In every thing you show your generosity and nobleness—in every thing have they proved their cruelty and treachery. (Cheers.)

Is not this exciting a horrible enmity—an enmity founded in falsehood between the two people? Is it not telling them that it is out of nature that they should form part of the same empire? Is it not defying and scorning the determination expressed at the close of Parliament to the nation in the royal speech? Heaven send, the Prime Minister may not be really overlooking these fearful omens of turbulence—that the leniency of endurance be not misplaced! Ireland is a fearful theme to contemplate just now, and her true tranquillity must be effected by the highest wisdom of the highest minds.

Wales begins, also, to increase the anxieties of peaceful men. Rebecca is as busy as O'Connell, and yet, up to the present period of the recess, has Sir James Graham been more active than Sir Robert Peel? Wednesday produced a proclamation of rewards for the discovery of offenders against the law; but we fear that mere rewards will hardly tempt away that determined spirit of mutiny, in the struggle against grievance, which has marked the whole conduct of the insubordinate Welch with a daring and hardihood decisive and reckless alike. Are the difficulties of the Welch revolt hopelessly baffling? Or is there no strength in the Home Office - no foresight, discretion, energy, and justice in the ministerial camp? Does the Lord of Netherby succumb to Miss Cromwell after all?

In other political matters the recess wears its accustomed aspect of repose—save, indeed, upon the question of Corn-laws, where Mr. Cobden and the Leaguers again set Ministers an unexhausted example of restless activity. They are not wasting the recess.

Two boding signs of good among the many of evil have been disclosed to us during the parliamentary hiatus, by the providential improvement of trade, and the heaven-gifted boon of a beautiful and abundant harvest. These are blessings for which a nation should turn the heart of worship towards its God. They fill the land with reviving influence, and relieve a thousand pressures of poverty and want.

Apart from these advantages, however, which we have been unwilling to pass without an expression of earnest thankfulness, we think we have clearly pointed to as many busy elements of mischief, antagonistic to constitutional government and good order, as will prove to the common sense of the empire, that ministers cannot afford to be idle during the recess—that their anxieties must be watchful—their cares absorbing—their relaxation moderate—their pleasures few. They will have to work effectually without Parliament until Parliament meets, and then to bring with them to that deliberative assembly enlarged plans of wisdom—for relieving England restoring Ireland—tranquillising Wales—for reforming the laws which afflict the poor—and blessing the oppressed classes with some specific more substantial than hope, which may grow sick, in a word, for stemming the torrent of discontent, and planting the banner of happiness; so that it may be seen as the true standard of the people from every corner of the British Realms.

CHAPEL TO THE MEMORY OF THE DUKE OF ORLEANS, AT PARIS.

CHAPEL ERECTED TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE DUKE OF ORLEANS, AT PARIS.

The ever-to-be-lamented death of the Duke of Orleans, which took place on the 13th of July, 1842, was occasioned by an accident never to be forgotten by every true lover of his country. The Prince left Paris in the morning at 11 o'clock, in a carriage harnessed "à la Daumont," intending to remain a short time at Neuilly, and then proceed for the Camp of Saint Omer. On reaching the heights of Porte Maillot, the horse of the Postillion took fright, and ran in the direction of "Le Chemen de la Revolte." The Prince alarmed, cried out to the postillion "you are no longer master of your horses." "I still guide them," was the reply. A few minutes afterwards the Prince observed, "I am afraid you cannot hold them in." The postillion, greatly frightened, now announced in a low voice "No, sir." Instantly the Prince attempted to get out of the carriage, but his feet getting entangled in his cloak, he on the ground, and was carried to the house of M. Lecordier, a grocer, situated opposite to the stables of Lord Seymour. At 10 minutes past 4 o'clock, of the same afternoon, the Prince died.

Their Majesties having purchased the house of M. Lecordier and some adjacent property, caused the chapel of Saint Ferdinand to be built under the direction of Messrs. Lefranc and Fontaine, two eminent architects. The first stone was laid on the 21st of August, 1842 and the inauguration took place on the 11th of July, 1843.

The Chapel of St. Ferdinand is built in stone, and is about 60 fee in width, and 30 in height. Its style is Roman, or Lombard, surmounted by a cross, and resembles an ancient mausoleum. The principal entrance is to the south; on the north is erected an alter, dedicated to the Virgin. On the right side of the cross is a chapel dedicated to St. Ferdinand, and on the left a marble group representing the Prince in the uniform of a field officer, lying on his death bed. Over the head of the Prince is an angel kneeling and in prayer, the work of the late Princess Marie, the sister of the Prince. The body of the Duke was exhumed by M. de Triquetty, from a drawing of M. Ary Scheffer. On the front of the tomb is the Genius of France, deploring the sad loss, and looking up at the urn, which bears the fleurs-de-lis at her feet. Behind the principal altar is placed a statue of the Virgin, bearing the infant Jesus in her arms. The chapel has two windows, ornamented with beautiful stained glass, representing fourteen saints, viz.—St Philip, St Louis, Charlemagne, Marie de Brabant, the Prince, Rosalie, Consort of Alexandre, Amelie, Ferdinand, Helene, Francois, Adelaide, and Raphael. There are three other windows with stained glass, one of which represents the Saint Esprit, that in the centre of St Ferdinand, Charity; and that near to the monument of the Prince, Hope.

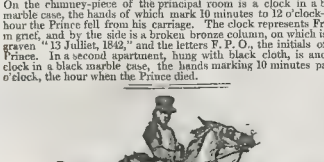
In front of the chapel apartments have been constructed to receive the royal family for the celebration of mass on the anniversary of the death of their beloved relative. All the draperies are in mourning. On the chimney-piece of the principal room is a clock in a black marble case, the hands of which mark 10 minutes to 12 o'clock—the hour the Prince fell from his carriage. The clock represents France in grief, and by the side is a broken bronze column, on which is engraven "13 Juillet, 1842," and the letters F. P. O., the initials of the Prince. In a second apartment, hung with black cloth, is another clock in a black marble case, the hands marking 10 minutes past 4 o'clock, the hour when the Prince died.



FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

SPAIN.—(From our own Correspondent.)—PARIS, Oct. 5.—The most difficult task imposed on a foreign correspondent in Spanish affairs is, he may be well conversant in the politics of the country—he may have studied the character and habits of the people—he may receive the earliest and best information, and yet it is almost impossible for him to keep the public so informed as to enable it to come to a sound and correct judgment on the affairs of the Peninsula. This arises in a great measure, and I state it with regret, from the partial reports published by the French telegraph, and the highly coloured statements forwarded to hand by the friends of the different parties who ambition in all probability will be the destruction of their country. Thus, my private letters informed me that secret societies were formed in Madrid, and that the capital was in a state of great excitement. The telegraphic despatch, on the contrary, night after night, published "that Madrid was tranquil." With whom lies the truth? In my statements? For it is a fact, that at the very time we were told "that Madrid was tranquil," Narvaez presented himself at a cabinet council, and demanded that the capital should be declared in a state of siege!! It is true the ministers objected to a measure in direct opposition to their political opinions, but Narvaez with great warmth and his pretensions, and stated "The people cry out publicly—" Long live Espartero; Death to Narvaez. I heard the hated words myself, observed Christina's lieutenant, and making such discovery as aforesaid shall be liable to be prosecuted for the same. Given at our Court at Windsor, this 8nd day of October, in the year of our Lord 1843, and in the seventh year of our reign. God save the Queen

On Saturday night the Rebeccaites assembled and attacked the Tromaen-gate, leading from Llanelly to Velenvoe, which they destroyed. This was a most daring affair, as the work of destruction was commenced as early as ten o'clock at night, and the gate is situate within 400 yards of the Thomas's Arms, at the town of Llanelly, which is the head-quarters of the military stationed there. The Rebeccaites fastened the toll-keeper in the house, and having torn the gate from the hinges, threw it into a coal pit, where it was found on Monday morning.

On Friday night the Crow Down-gate, situate on the line of road which has been made between Llandeilo and Pumpsant was attacked, and completely destroyed; they then proceeded to pull down the toll-house, and having levelled it with the ground, they piled up the timber used in building it and the broken gate, and burnt them.

IRELAND.

THE IRISH SQUADRON.—The Cork Reporter of Saturday last contains the following statement, from which it appears that the town of Cove is now the barrack of hundreds of boisterous, and very singular circumstances:—"For some time past we have been in possession of facts relative to the conduct of one of her Majesty's vessels lately lying at Cove, which were of so startling and extraordinary a nature, that, though well authenticated at the time, we withheld the publication of them, lest our informant might have been misled in his opinion. However, all doubts have now been cleared up upon the subject, one of our reporters having had the facts recounted to him viva voce by an authority that cannot be disputed. They are these:—While her Majesty's brig the Lynx, a vessel mounting three guns of formidable calibre, but pierced for ten, was lying off Cove, her commander, Captain Burslem, one day gave the order to clear the decks for action. The order was quickly obeyed, the drums beat to quarters, the three guns were primed and loaded, in fact, doubled shotted, and the crew waited in breathless silence and astonishment for what was to follow; but they were not long kept in suspense, for in a few minutes after Captain Burslem ordered the guns to be fired upon the town! The officers next in command were horror-struck at hearing such an order, and thought feeling the tremendous risk that such a step would, under almost any other circumstances, run by interfering with the order of their captain, yet in this case they clearly saw that they would be fully justified in preventing the execution of an order by which perhaps thousands of her Majesty's peaceable and loyal subjects would be hurled to destruction in the midst of the most profound tranquillity and peace. Accordingly, the first lieutenant and one or two of the other officers consulted for a moment, ere the fatal command should be carried into effect, and having arrived at the conclusion that no such order could by any possibility have been given by any man in his senses, and without the least provocation, they contrived to induce the captain to go below for a moment and suspend the order, this he complied with, and having been got into his own cabin, every precaution was taken to secure him, and the whole affair reported to the admiral. Captain Burslem was immediately removed, and the Lynx is now in the Shannon under the command of her first lieutenant. And thus has the beautiful town of Cove been rescued from inevitable demolition at the hands of a madman, owing, in all probability, to the sensible lal presence on board of the officers and loyal crew. Awful result, for it is well known that the superior to well as the petty officers of all naval-way line at Cove are continually ashore on leave; and if those of the Lynx had been allowed the cruel manner when Captain Burslem commenced to fire the town of Cove and its inhabitants to become a scene of ruin and slaughter, who can contemplate the result? It has been stated that on two or three occasions of late Captain Burslem had evinced symptoms of impaired intellect, but never before to such an extent!

At the usual meeting of the Repeal Association, on Monday last, the amount of rent announced was £814 7s.

DISTRESSING ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday last Mr. Griffith, superintendent of the fisheries of Lough Neagh and its tributary rivers, was in the act of stepping into a boat at Toome, to be rowed to Portglenone, and having a brace of loaded barrelled pistols, which had lately been sent him from London, he was asked to shoot a duck in a flock which was floating about. He did so, and missing his aim, he was again asked to shoot one, and complying with this request, while raising his arm the pistol went off, and, melancholy to relate, the ball entered the body of Mr. W. Peden, son of the innkeeper of Toome, who, with Dr. Godfrey, was standing on the shore at the time. Mr. Peden exclaimed that he was shot, and at the same instant Mr. Griffith ran to his assistance. Every thing that surgical skill and attention could devise was done; and we are happy to say that at six p.m. on Wednesday the sufferer was considered by Mr. Godfrey to be in as good a state as could be expected.

SCOTLAND.

RIOTS IN ROSS-SHIRE.—Notwithstanding the precautions taken by the civil authorities to preserve the public peace, the presbytery of Cannory was deforced last week, at the settlement of the Rev. Mr. Mackenzie, in Resolis. In addition to numerous parties in the magistrates' room to prevent rioting at the settlement, the sheriff interdicted the ferry-boats at Invergordon, Alness, and Fowlis, from crossing, from six, a.m., to three o'clock, p.m.; as it was anticipated some of the disorderly might cross from the Ross side of the Firth, and create a disturbance. Early in the day, and before the arrival of the lord lieutenant and sheriff, a crowd of men and women, well supplied with stones and sticks, surrounded the church. On the arrival of the authorities, the crowd often an approach to the church, and stones were thrown at them. The church bell was kept constantly tolling, accompanied by a continual hurrahing. Seeing it was impossible to obtain access to the church, the men on the preceding day, accompanied by Mr. Bayne, who, after some delay, arrived, under the command of Lieutenant Thomson. This, however, did not make things better. The pelting with stones continued; and we regret to say that Lieutenant Thomson and Mr. Munro, of Novar, who was acting as a special constable, were severely injured. The lord-lieutenant, finding it altogether impossible to seize one of the stoutest and most active of the ringleaders, ordered the riot-act to be read. The sheriff also read it with a stone on the thigh, and Mr. Cameron was struck several times, and the windows and one of the panels of the carriage were broken. Matters proceeded to such an extremity that the sheriff at length came forward and read the proclamation to the riotous crowd. Finding that the party was so small, it seemed to their commanding officer, who believed most calmly on the occasion, as well as the lord-lieutenant and the sheriff, that it would be inexpedient to continue the further use of fire arms, as it would in all probability lead to the loss of life, without any reasonable prospect, considering the great number and determined resistance of the mob, that the object in view would be attained. The civil authorities, together with the presbytery, and the gentlemen present who afforded them assistance, and who had been now on the spot for several hours (Mr. Lawson, of Balnagown, a magistrate, &c.), having previously approached him in a act of cheering on the rioters, and immediately sent off to Cromarty, an attempt at last rescue being successfully defeated. We understand there were none of the surveying masters present but one, who remained only a short time, and that among the mob, and went back without joining the civil authorities. The presbytery went to Fortrose, where Mr. M'Kenzie was, after certain forms, installed in the inn; but the new gentleman was, on entering and leaving Fortrose, hooted and pelted with stones.

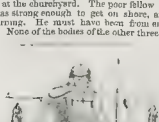
RIOTING IN EAST ROSS.—The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie having been inducted by the presbytery of Dingwall, proceeded to the parish church of Resolis on Sunday, but found a vast collection of people congregated at the church, in the utmost state of excitement. Lady Ross, Balnagown, drove up to the church, and was assailed with the most virulent Billingsgate. Mr. Ross of Pitcalnie was roughly struck at her carriage with a stick, and she received a blow in the arm. Lady Ross, undismayed, amidst a shower of stones and blackguard abuse. Shortly after this, Mr. Ross, of Cromarty, accompanied by Mr. Ross, younger of Ross, arrived at the church. Access was denied them, and the most scandalous and impious language uttered. The church bell was tolling, and the noise and clamour was at that period so tremendous that the assembled multitude could not hear, and the order for Mr. Sheriff Cameron, who accompanied him to Logie. The Rev. Mr. Mackenzie had by this time gone away, but as there was still a large crowd at the church, the sheriff used the utmost exertions to restore quiet. On Tuesday morning four officers arrived at Invergordon from Tain, with warrants for apprehending two individuals connected with the riots. On this being known, the bell was put through the town, and an immense crowd immediately collected, who rescued the prisoners, and ordered the officers to go home, under the penalty of being stoned to death. The men took the hint, and their prisoners are still at large.

FATAL ENTERPRISE.—Last week one of the sailors of the 68th, named [illegible] Cave, attempted to escape from Stirling Castle by leaping over the wall at that most precipitous part of the rock, nearly 100 feet in perpendicular height, named the "Lady's Look-out." The unfortunate man is supposed to have been committed while in a state of intoxication, was not observed, but in the morning, on some of the men looking over the parapet, his lifeless body, shockingly mutilated, was discovered lying on the ground near the walk. It was evident he had died a considerable time previous to his being observed.

GREAT FAILURE.—An extensive failure in the wholesale grocery trade took place in Glasgow last week. The debts amount to nearly £200,000, and are principally due to parties resident in that city.

WITCHCRAFT.—At the Sheriff's Criminal Court, held at Dingwall, Ross-shire, last week, a woman named Catherine Campbell was convicted of obtaining money from a man named Donald Matheson, under the pretence that she could avert ill "charms, away" some trouble which was coming to his house. The prosecutor stated that he had called upon the prisoner to consult her about his sheep which were dying and straying away, as he understood she "had skill in such matters." She professed to him that great trouble was coming to the house through a woman who lived in the neighbourhood, but that she would prevent that by her art, and she pound note to put under his wife's pillow. The sheriff, in sentencing the prisoner to three months' imprisonment, said it was an extraordinary circumstance that in a country where information was so general, and where the people were also remarkable for their sagacity and intelligence, a superstition so absurd as a belief in divination or witchcraft should still linger among the people

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT AT STRONNESS.—On the evening of the 31st ult., a small boat from the Bull of Hoy, in which were John Sutherland, a tenant of the Bull, Samuel Willieca, his son-in-law, Ann Young, servant to the schoolmaster, and Hugh Knarston, a harvest man at the Bull, left Wick harbour, and had proceeded round the east end of Graemsay, when, finding the wind to be squally and the night dark, the boat was attempted to be put round, in order to land at Graemsay for the night, but, from a sudden squall striking her, she went down stern foremost. The crew got on her bottom, and were again washed off. The girl first sank, and then old John Sutherland (a native of Caithness-shire). Knarston clung to the boat, and the wind and tide drove him across Hoy Sound, within a short distance of Cantick Heads. His cries were heard by the people on board of the vessels lying in the roads, but from the darkness it could not be discovered that an accident had happened. The boat was driven out of Hoy Sound again, and at last came ashore at the churchyard. The poor fellow had still been able to stick to the boat, and was strong enough to get on shore, and reach Stromness about daylight next morning. He must have been from eight to nine hours on the bottom of the boat. None of the bodies of the other three have been found.



LAW INTELLIGENCE.

BANKRUPTCY COURT

Margaret Edmonds, whose name has been so often before the public in connexion with bill transactions with Lord Huntingtower, Colonel Copeland, and other fashionable and sporting characters, was examined again at the Bankruptcy Court. The meeting was held for the winding up of the estate. The opposing creditors intend to indict the bankrupt at the Central Criminal Court, and the examination was adjourned for three months, to give them an opportunity of doing so.

INSOLVENT DEBTORS' COURT.

IN RE JAMES HOLKROYD.

Mr Woodroffe applied on behalf of Mr Osborn, a creditor, to make absolute for an attachment against the insolvent for disobedience to a rule of court entered into by consent, by which he had agreed to set aside an annual sum of £60 out of his salary of £300, as clerk to the master of the Court of Exchequer. Mr. Cooke showed cause against the rule, and argued, on general grounds, that it was illegal to enter into an undertaking for the alteration of the emoluments of any office established for the administration of justice. The Lesser Chief Commissioner was of opinion that the insolvent held a situation necessary to carry into effect the provisions of the law in the Court of Exchequer. The case was, therefore, provided for by the legislature, and without entering upon the general questions as to how far, and to what classes this exemption might extend, he believed that the insolvent was included under this description of persons. The rule was then discharged.

POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.—Captain Tune, the commander of the City of Boulogne steam-vessel, appeared again before the Lord Mayor, in pursuance of the adjournment of the case, respecting the loss of the bags of money entrusted to his care. Mr. Clarkson attended for the New Commercial Steam Packet Company, and Mr. Bush, the solicitor to the Committee of Bankers for Investment of Foreign and Family Funds, appeared upon the part of Captain Tune.—Mr Clarkson said he had been directed by the New Commercial Steam Packet Company to state that no further evidence could be procured than had already been given in support of the charge of the loss of the money which had been deposited in Captain Tune's custody, and it was then with that he should be discharged forthwith. He [Mr. Clarkson] had stated at the commencement that it was with great pain the directors had brought forward a charge of such a nature against a valuable servant, who had acted well for so many years, and he now declared that it would give them the greatest pleasure to be able to exonerate the captain from all blame. The learned counsel was happy to say that the directors had taken immediate steps to institute an inquiry, by which they would, in all probability, be enabled to bring those who were concerned in the plunder to justice.—Mr Bush said he was entirely not only as the solicitor of Captain Tune, but as his friend, most positively in assertion of his innocence, and no doubt whatever existed that the assertion was in complete accordance with the belief of that gentleman. It was the opinion of the directors, therefore, that Captain Tune should be released from the obligation of bail, upon the understanding that Mr. Bush would promise that he should be forthcoming upon any future occasion.—Mr Bush said it was entirely owing to him, both personally and professionally, to hear the statement of the learned counsel. He was so fully convinced of Captain Tune's perfect innocence as he was of his own existence. If that were not the case, he would not have appeared in the case at all. It was most proper that the directors should have every assistance in the inquiry, and he hoped the investigation would lead to a satisfactory conclusion as to who the guilty parties were. He should not himself be satisfied nor would Captain Tune be satisfied, until the directors admitted the sufferer's innocence that the captain was wholly guiltless.—Mr Clarkson repeated it as the directors would feel great pleasure in being instrumental in exonerating Captain Tune, but he was not at liberty to go beyond the statement he had just made.—The Lord Mayor said the captain was at liberty, certainly, and would, no doubt, render all the assistance he could in the inquiry into so nefarious a transaction. The captain would also, should he be enabled to resume his situation, take care how he deposited sums of money entrusted to his care, as there were people always on the watch to plunder careless and unsuspecting individuals.

A young man, who gave his name Burgess, applied for assistance under extraordinary circumstances. He said he had been brought up as a gentleman by his mother, a West Indian, but had been kept ignorant of his own parentage. Lately her conduct towards him had altered; she had put from him a sum of £20, which he possessed, and forbade him to come to London from Bristol by the railroad, promising to follow him by the next train. He arrived at the station with only 2s. in his pocket, and waited anxiously the whole of the day, but his mother never arrived. Being without friends or acquaintances in London, he was quite destitute, and now applied to the Lord Mayor for assistance. He was allowed to remain in the house of the Governor of the Compter till inquiries could be made about him.

POLICE-OFFICE.—A young man named George Butler, employed as an occasional clerk in the Registrar-General's office in Somerset-house, was brought before Mr. Lewis, charged with embezzlement, charged with uttering a forged check for the sum of £5, with intent to defraud Mr Isaac Mason, a music-seller, of Grey's Inn-passage, Bedford-row. He was also charged with defrauding Mr. Martin Swinburne of the sum of £6, by a forged check on Messrs. Jones, Loyd, and Co. From the evidence produced it appears that the prisoner had obtained several persons with promises of procuring them situations in the Registrar-General's office, a circumstance which elicited from the worthy magistrate an expression of surprise that people could allow themselves to be humbugged in such a manner. The prisoner was fully committed for trial.

It was communicated to the magistrates at this court, that Mr. Evans, the linen-draper, who was brought up on Friday, charged with drunk, and riotous conduct in the streets, and on the occasion they were taken into custody, was found in the possession of property belonging to Isaac named Davidson, in the Belvedere-road, Lambeth, besides a quantity of flour. The prisoner was committed for trial.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—On Mr. Hardwick taking his seat on the bench on Tuesday morning, Inspector Hood stated that Mr. Peter Keim, of No. 42, Dean street, Soho, boot and shoe manufacturer, who was waylaid and stabbed in the left groin, on Saturday night, in Broad-street, Golden-square, by a Prussian, named Waldhans Stiben (who was the previous night married till Friday morning), and had issued his warrant for bailing the inquest forthwith. The coroner's jury had returned a verdict of wilful murder against him.

UNION HALL.—William Stewart and Alexander Reid, two men dressed like journeymen bakers, were charged with plundering several bakers by the following stratagem. The prisoners, although in the garb of bakers, do not follow the trade, and when any customer began to suspect, but assumed it in order the more effectually to carry on their system of plunder on the trade. Their mode of doing business was to sally from their lodgings, one carrying a basket on his shoulder, and when any customer came out a journeyman baker had left his brother unattended, while he went up to the door of a house, they immediately took advantage of the circumstance, one of the prisoners would present himself at the door, and when the servant came out the basket followed, and at a convenient spot they stopped, and filling their own out of the barrow, then started off with the plunder. [illegible] prisoners succeeded in robbing upwards of twenty [illegible] in this manner, and on the occasion they were taken into custody, they had in their possession property belonging to baker named Davidson, in the Belvedere-road, Lambeth, besides a quantity of flour. The prisoners were committed for trial.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

DISGRACEFUL RIOT IN ST. LEONARD'S CHURCHYARD.—One of the most tumultuous meetings ever witnessed in the metropolis, was held on Tuesday, in the church of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch. Upon that occasion a vestry meeting of the parishioners was convened to make a poor and church rate, Mr. Collier, churchwarden, in the chair. The proceedings commenced at three o'clock, and did not terminate till ten o'clock at night. During that period the sacred edifice presented one continued scene of clamour, which at times resulted in a general pugnacious fight. The churchwardens, wearied to put down, by loud and repeated knocks of his hammer upon the table. Upon the question of liabilities it was moved by Mr. Thomas, and, with the exception of a few hands, the whole of which is better manufactured by hand than by the power loom, many are mostly fully employed, and are receiving better wages than the have received at any time previously for the last ten or fifteen years.

THE MISSING INDIA MAIL.—TOTAL LOSS OF THE MEMNON STEAMER, WITH THE BOMBAY MAIL OF THE 20TH JULY.

CAPE GUADAFUI, ON THE COAST OF AFRICA

The French steamer, which arrived at Malta, from the Levant, on the 24th of September, conveyed Alexandria dates of the 16th ult., announcing that intelligence had reached there of the total loss, on the 1st of August, of the Memnon steamer, on a rock near the entrance of the Red Sea. The whole of the crew and passengers, amounting, it is said, to nearly two hundred persons, with the treasure, were saved, but the mails were lost.

The Hindostan had arrived at Suez on the 12th of September, from Calcutta (which place she left on the 10th of August), with one hundred and eight passengers, but no letters or papers by her had reached Malta.

It will be recollected that the Memnon left Bombay on the 20th of July; that is, ten days earlier than she would have done on ordinary occasions, on account of the monsoon, which prevails in those seas during the month of August. The Memnon was a splendid new ship, which had recently been sent out from England, having been built expressly for the service of the Overland Mail. She was much larger, and more powerful, than any of the other steamers upon the station; and so great was the confidence of her commander in her powers, that he determined to steer direct from Bombay to Aden, instead of taking the longer route generally adopted during the prevalence of the monsoon. The experiment was thought a dangerous one, and it was the opinion of many naval men that it must fail, as it had done before; but the result has shown that the confidence of the captain was not misplaced, as she completed the voyage to Aden within ten days. No sooner, however, had she completed this great feat, than she was fated to meet with a misfortune little looked for. On the evening of the 1st of August, when off Cape Guardafui, on the coast of Africa, and not far from Aden, she struck upon a reef of rocks, and in a very short time became a total wreck. The crew and passengers, with five cases of treasure, which were on board, and which happened to be on the deck at the time of the accident, fortunately were saved; but the mails, cargo, and passengers' baggage were entirely lost, having gone down with the wreck. The loss of the mails upon this occasion is the more to be deplored, as, owing to their late arrival at Bombay on the previous month, there had been an accumulation of mails from Madras and Ceylon. The number of persons on board, including crew and passengers, was about 170. It appears that the Memnon has gone to pieces.

Captain Haines, the political agent at Aden, had sent to the assistance of the shipwrecked people three small steamers. Two passengers who were on board of the Memnon, Messrs. Southey and Crawford, arrived at Suez from Aden by the Hindostan.

In one account given of this truly melancholy event, it is stated that much blame is attached on this occasion to Captain Powell, the commander, who, it is said, was warned by the officer of the watch of the vicinity of the land, and the consequent danger, before the ship struck. In the present lack of information upon the subject, it would be unjust to Captain Powell to adopt this statement as a fact. Doubtless a searching inquiry into the case will be instituted, and if blame should be proved as attaching to any party, punishment will necessarily follow. In the meantime, it is but justice to Captain Powell to state, that the same account which says that he is to blame in this case, also states that he lost the Semiramis in his first trip. With regard to the latter assertion, we have authority to give it a direct denial. We are informed that Captain Powell never was commander of the Semiramis, and never had been on board of her in any capacity.

We annex a view of Cape Guardafui, from a sketch recently made by a gentleman on his return from India to this country. The great gulf formed by the part of the African continent terminating in this cape, and the opposite coast of Arabia, is sometimes called the Gulf of Aden. The subjoined chart shows the route of the ill-fated steam ship.

The Memnon was a splendid vessel, of 1,100 tons burthen, mounting two 64-pounders, and four 32-pounders; she was built by Fletcher, and fitted with engines of 400-horse power, by Maudslays and Field. The boilers, which were of copper, were furnished with change-water apparatus, by which the salt-water was kept from exceeding a certain point of saturation. There were four steam cylinders, working in pairs, the piston-rods being attached to a T-piece, from the lower end of which a long connecting-rod proceeded up to the main crank-shaft. The engines were fitted with expansion gearing, so as to admit of the consumption of fuel regulated to suit every circumstance of slow or quick steaming. The paddle-wheels, 28 feet in diameter, were fitted with the disconnecting gear, to work one wheel without the other, if found necessary. The engines worked with a beautiful motion, the vibration being scarcely perceptible. In an experimental trip made last spring, the vessel, with a heavy cargo, and 300 tons of coals, was propelled by steam alone at the rate of 11½ miles per hour; and the manner and simplicity with which the disconnecting gear (Field's patent) removed the stupendous paddle-wheel, and again attached it in an incredible short space of time, surprised the naval officers present at the trial, and who had never witnessed anything of the kind before.

JOHN BRIGHT, M.P.

John Bright, a manufacturer, an Anti-Corn-law Leaguer, and a Quaker, has taken his seat for the aristocratic, Conservative, and High Church city of Durham. It is useless to speculate about the causes that brought this political phenomenon about; it is done. It is what the French call a fait accompli, which no amount of controversy or dispute will undo. Nevertheless, there is something curious about it; there is evidently no knowing where an active enemy will find a weak point, either in a man or a system. The heel of Achilles was about the last place an arrow would have been aimed at in the usual course of things; and just as little did many dream of Durham being the first place to be carried by an avowed member of the League on League principles. The shot has sped just where the armour was thickest. We are inclined to think the shield of the party attacked was not very skilfully managed, or that, as in many other cases, security produced carelessness. Yet the first blow (for he once before stood for the borough) was a tolerably hard one, and enough to assure any party that the foe was not to be despised.

"John Bright, of One-Ash, in the parish of Rochdale, in the county of Lancaster, manufacturer," as he was described in the Gazette recently, has long been an influential member of the Manchester Anti Corn Law League, but it was not till the League visited London, and began its system of "to-ra" into the agricultural districts, that his name became so widely known as it undoubtedly is at present. The Drury lane meetings of this body added greatly to his reputation, as the proceedings were as regularly reported as those of Parliament, by the London press, and circulated all over the kingdom, an advantage that no provincial address, however able, can procure. This, again, was followed up by the "excursions," if we may so call them, of the League, for the purpose of addressing meetings of farmers. On these occasions, Mr. Bright and Mr. Moore were the chief speakers, the latter generally winding up the proceedings; Mr. Cobden only went to the more important gatherings, such as the controversial meetings that have been recently held in the eastern and midland counties. Mr. Bright speaks well, and with great fluency, amounting when he warms with his subject to extreme rapidity. There is no appearance at such times of that quiet and deliberate manner which we are generally accustomed to associate with the name of a Quaker; he becomes earnest and impassioned, as one entirely filled and occupied with his subject. He brings to bear upon it a vast number of facts and figures, clearly and distinctly brought out, though not always having a very close connection with each other; one part of his speech might sometimes be put before another without injuring the continued train of argument, a peculiarity arising, we are disposed to think, from the necessity of compressing as many arguments as possible against a given question, into a single speech. Of his general politics, apart from his principles as a Corn-Law Repealer, less is known, but we presume he is a thorough Reformer; the only speech he has made on general politics is the one on the hustings at Durham, and in that he seems disposed to throw aside party considerations altogether, supporting measures of improvement from whatever party they may come. Some speculation has been indulged in as to his probable success in the House of Commons. As a speaker, he is far superior to many who are listened to in that assembly; but those who know the constitution of that house know also the great influence of station, name, and wealth, and how much dullness will be tolerated from one of a "good family." To a mere political adventurer, the trader in politics, the House of Commons is the last place to succeed in; but the new men who are rising into distinction now, are not adventurers. They are connected with great and stirring interests, and are, if not as wealthy as many of the aristocracy though even this may be disputed—yet they are far removed from the suspicion of engaging in politics from the mercenary motives that gain men the title of adventurers. Such men must be listened to, though they do not gain their proper position without a struggle. Cobden, if we recollect rightly, was rather sneered at than welcomed on his appearance in the House. Whether Bright possesses that dogged perseverance and iron determination, the strong as well as acute mind of the member for Stockport, remains to be proved. Mr. Bright is about the middle size, rather firmly and squarely built, with a fair, clear complexion, and an intelligent and pleasing expression of countenance. His voice is good, his enunciation distinct, and his delivery free from any unpleasant peculiarity or mannerism. He is young and has apparently a long career before him; his dress is rather more recherché than that of the "Friends" of a generation back, differing but slightly from the ordinary costume of the day. Of his personal character and manners we have no experience, and therefore nothing to say, but we may add, as it tells something of the cast of his mind, that in his speeches he not unfrequently quotes from Shelley or Wordsworth.

He delivered his "maiden speech" in Parliament, on the motion of Mr. Ewart, for extending the principles of free trade. On rising he appeared a little nervous, for however frequently a man may be in the habit of addressing mixed assemblies, to speak to an audience so critical as the House of Commons is rather a trying ordeal. He soon recovered his self-possession, however, and thrusting one hand into the breast of his waistcoat, he continued for somewhat more than half an hour to impress on the house in general, and the Prime Minister in particular, the urgent necessity of free trade, particularly in the article of corn. The general impression was that the speech was a good one, with enough of promise in it to show that the hon. gentleman will make a better one at some future time, when he shall have acquired the art of dropping sometimes of the style that tells well at the Crown and Anchor, but which falls comparatively flat on the ear in Parliament, for the want of an echo in the breasts of the auditors. The circumstances, too, accompanying his first appearance were not inspiriting, for the house was miserably thin at the time, and there was a listlessness and heaviness pervading it that could not but react on the speaker. Very different is the appearance of the same assembly on the night of any great party struggle; then it is hardly possible to conceive a more exciting scene. Mr. Bright had neither enough of opponents to stimulate him to an attack, nor of friends to back him in a good hit, or a telling argument. He spoke from the bench where Mr. Cobden and Mr. Brotherton usually sit, behind and to the right of Mr. Hume and Dr. Bowring.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR—GUILDHALL YARD.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR.

The annexed pair of engravings illustrate this great scene of civic bustle, rendered unusually interesting this year by a contest for the mayoralty chair. The first engraving shows a portion of the Guildhall-yard, with the busy crowd, with a plentiful sprinkling of placards, whilst in the background is seen a portion of the gilded prize for which the candidates are contending. Although the scene has little of the extravagance of "Madman's Holiday," as George Steevens called election day, it presents a faithful and animated transcript of a city crowd, as closely as the members of it could wish to be Daguerreotyped. We will not waste time by staying to count the idlers in the artist's reflex, but conduct the reader to the business of the day within the Great Hall, as shown in the second illustration. Of course, only a portion is seen of this vast apartment, which is 153 feet long, 48 feet broad, about 53 feet high, and will contain between 6,000 and 7,000 persons. Beneath the great eastern window, in front of the screen lately restored, is the hustings whereon the election forms are observed; and our engraving represents portrait sketches of the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, and other civic officers, proceeding to the business of the day.

The results of the election were given in our paper of last week.

Our readers are aware that Alderman Wood resigned the contest immediately after the polling had commenced, and that the present Lord Mayor, who had been put in nomination, also withdrew. By an absurd construction of the charter, however, the authorities were obliged to keep open the poll for a certain number of days, during which time the clerks had little or nothing to do, the following being the number of votes polled up until Thursday night last: Alderman Magnay 782; the Lord Mayor 139; Alderman Wood 72

RESIGNATION OF THE CHIEF CLERK AT GUILDHALL. Mr. [illegible], the city coroner, and who has for several years ably filled the office of chief clerk at Guildhall, has sent in his resignation, as he intends to practise in the superior courts at Westminster. It is said that the lucrative office will be conferred on a gentleman at present in the office of the city solicitor. Mr. Payne is fulfilling the duties of the office until a successor to Mr. Hall is appointed.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR—THE HUSTINGS IN GUILDHALL.

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XXXVI.

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.

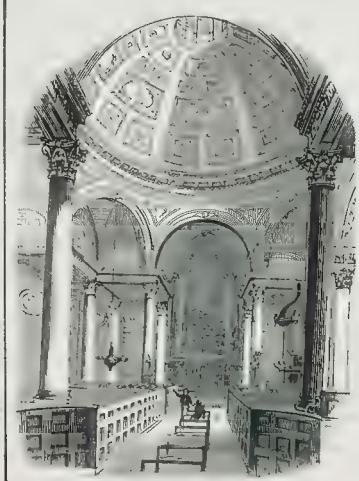
Considerable interest has of late been excited on the condition of this beautiful church, by many persons considered to be the masterpiece of Sir Christopher Wren. We trust that so exquisite a monument of the genius of our great architect will not be suffered to fall into irreparable decay, but be at once restored to its original beauty; and, feeling that to render the public better acquainted with the perfection of its design may extend the anxiety for its preservation, we have, at this special moment, selected St. Stephen's as one of our "Churches of the Metropolis."

The church of St. Stephen's is situated at the north-east corner of Walbrook, in the city of London. There is mention in ancient records of a church dedicated to St. Stephen, near this spot, but on the opposite side of the brook, prior to 1135. In 1429, Robert Chicheley, Mayor of London, purchased the ground now occupied by the present church and cemetery of the Grocers' Company, and the new church was finished in 1439. In 1432, Robert Whittington, citizen and draper, Knight of the Bath, purchased the advowson from the Duke of Bedford. From him it passed into a family named Lee, one of whom presented to it in 1474, and afterwards gave it to the Grocers' Company, in whom the patronage has ever since remained.

The old church was destroyed by the great fire of 1666, and the present celebrated edifice erected in its place by Sir Christopher Wren. The first stone was laid on October 19, 1672, in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Sir George Waterman, several members of the Grocers' Company, the Surveyor General Sir Christopher Wren), and other persons of distinction. It was built at the public expense, except the wainscoting and pewing, which were given by the Grocers' Company, the patrons of the living.

The exterior of the church is plain even to ugliness, with the exception of the upper part of the steeple, which slightly resembles that of St. James's, Garlick Hythe. The approach to the body of the church is by a flight of sixteen steps, in an enclosed porch, in Walbrook, quite distinct from the tower and the main building. It has one of the most celebrated interiors in the metropolis, which we have accordingly chosen for our illustration. But we agree with Mr. Godwin, in his clever work, "The Churches of London," that the interior is certainly more worthy of admiration in respect of its general arrangement which displays great skill, than of the details,—for they are in many respects faulty. The body of the church, which is nearly a parallel square, is divided into five equal aisles, separated by the line of arches resting on the walls (rather wide the smallest,) by four rows of Corinthian columns. Within one intercolumnation from the east end, two columns from each of the two centre rows are omitted, and the area thus formed, is covered by an enriched cupola supported on eight arches which rise from the entablature of the columns. By the distribution of the columns and their entablature,—as may be observed in the engraving—a cruciform arrangement is given to that part of the church, and an effect of great elegance is produced, although marred in some degree by the want of connection which exists between the square area formed by the columns and their entablature, and the cupola which covers it. The columns are raised on plinths of the same height as the pewing. The spandrels of the arches bearing the cupola present panels containing shields and foliage of uncertain and unmeaning form, perfectly French in style, and of the same character are the breaks against the side walls, in the shape of enriched capitals introduced to receive the ends of the entablature in the place of pilasters. At the chancel end pilasters are introduced, and serve to show more plainly the impropriety of omitting them elsewhere. The enrichments of the entablature—itself meagre and imperfect—are clumsily executed. Above it is introduced a clere-story, containing windows of mean form and construction. The cupola, around which runs a circular dentil cornice just above the arches, is divided into panels ornamented with palm branches and roses, and is terminated at the apex by a circular lantern light: the whole is elegant in outline, and is much more pure in design than are other portions of the church just now alluded to. The walls of the church are entirely plain, and accord but ill with the rest of the composition; they are disfigured too by the introduction of those small oval openings for light which were so often used by Wren in his churches. The entire east window is blocked up to receive a large and finely painted picture by West of the death of St. Stephen; but the two side windows at this end remain to light the church. There is a large organ in a recess over the western entrance. Against the south wall is a tablet, displaying more than ordinary taste, inscribed to S. Brandram, who died Nov 11th, 1808, and near it among others is one by Bacon, jun., to George Griffin Stonestreet, Esq., which was erected in 1803. The Rev. Thomas Wilson, D.D., who was rector of the parish 46 years, and died April 15th, 1784, and the Rev. G. S. Townley, who was rector 50 years, and died February 14th, 1835, are both commemorated by tablets.

The length of the church within the walls is 82 feet 6 inches, and the width, 59 feet 6 inches. The height to the flat ceiling of the side aisles is 36 feet, and to the top dome 63 feet. The internal diameter of the dome is 37 feet. The walls of the church and the columns are of stone, but the dome is formed of timber and lead. The ceiling of the side aisles is flat, and is formed into panels by mouldings: the centre aisle is groined. Mr Gwilt has written a detailed description of the church for Britton's "Public Buildings of London," in which he awards much higher praise to Wren than other authorities have done. He says "Had its materials and volume been as durable and extensive as those of St Paul's Cathedral, Sir Christopher Wren had consummated a much more efficient monument to his well-earned fame than that fabric affords." This is high praise; but even John Carter, who was seldom disposed to regard Wren's works favourably, admits that in St Stephen's "much novelty is on view; the embellishments many, but not profusely distributed, judicious contrivance of the plan, and, lastly, the attempt of setting up a dome, a comparative imitation though on a diminutive scale of the Pantheon at Rome ever admired, ever admirable, and such, no doubt, was a kind of probationary trial previous to his gigantic operation of fixing one on his octangular superstructure in the centre of his new St. Paul's." And again—"The general effect of the interior, although deprived of its principal light—the east window—is undoubtedly grand and imposing; and notwithstanding pious feelings are not so immediate the result as when yielding to the solemn impressions imparted by our ancient piles, still much deserved praise must be allowed to in merits of the laborious knight in the present instance."



INTERIOR OF ST. STEPHEN'S CHURCH, WALBROOK.

Mr. Elmes, the biographer of Wren, admits the ingenuity of the plan, and the excellence of the construction of St. Stephen's, but censures the paneling and foilage of the cupolas and the complicated vaulting, and considers the whole much inferior in design and execution to some of the exquisite examples in St. Paul's. He admits the lightness and elegance of the interior, and its singular originality. "On entering from the street, up a flight of a dozen or more of steps, through a vestibule of dubious obscurity, on opening the handsome folding wainscot doors, a halo of dazzling light flashes at once upon the eye, through the central aperture of the cupola; and a beautiful arrangement of exquisitely proportioned Corinthian columns appears before you. The spacious cupola and supporting arches expand their airy shapes, springing from almost a point over each of the surrounding columns, upon an architrave cornice of great beauty. The order of the composition of this elegant church, the arrangement of its parts, and the effect of the whole, show the originality of Wren's mind in a striking point of view; and its excellences, as a whole, swallow up the trifling fault of the detail. If any one doubt the excellences of Wren as an architect of the first class, let him study and analyze this jewel of our art, and find fault if he will, but let him first endeavour to surpass it."

The church has been repaired twice in Mr. Elmes's remembrance; once under the direction of the late James Peacock, Esq., of the City Surveyor's Office, who, with a laudable care for the fame of its architect, wisely restored and preserved, but did not attempt to improve. We trust this plan will be followed in the repairs now requisite; and, as restoration is the fashion of the day, we are not likely to be disappointed. The funds for this purpose, according to certain statements, remain to be raised; but let us hope that when Mr Alderman Gibbs, the perpetual churchwarden, shall have rendered his accounts, there may be found a sufficient sum to meet the expenses, and the parish may not be under the necessity of appealing to the public for the preservation of their church, which, it will be remembered, was built by the public.

The church is appropriated to the use of the parishioners of St. Stephen's, Walbrook, and of Bene't's, Sherehog; these parishes having been united after the fire of 1666, by which latter event the churches of both had been destroyed. The united parishes form a rectory: but, as the living of St. Bene't's came to the Crown at the dissolution of the monasteries, the Lord Chancellor and the Grocers' Company present alternately. The present rector of the united living is the Rev. and well-known Dr. Croly, who succeeded the Rev. Mr. Townley in 1835, being instituted by the Lord Chancellor. There cannot be a more eloquent advocate than the present rector of St. Stephen's, whose accurate knowledge of high art will, doubtless, induce him to plead the maintenance and restoration of this true work of taste and geni

This work has been compiled at great expense and will form a most useful authority for reference to the CLERGY, GENTRY, MAGISTRATES, JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, CLERKS OF THE PEACE, POOR-LAW GUARDIANS, PARISH CLERKS, REGISTRARS, and all other PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The whole has been drawn up with great care and accuracy, forming a complete Digest of a Parliamentary Report exceeding 500 pages; and is decidedly the most comprehensive abstract of which has ever appeared at a price to bring it within the reach of all classes.

To afford facilities for the circulation of this useful work in all parts, copies will be Stamped as a Supplement to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, of Saturday, the 14th October.—Price Sixpence.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1843.

Not the least among the things with which all States and Kingdoms seem at times to be troubled, are the interferences of their government with the coined money of the land. Debasing the mintage and lowering the standard of value by mingling alloy with the metal to be coined, was by no means an infrequent practice with rapacious princes in barbarous ages, and has sometimes been done by needy ones in times nearer our own. We must acquit our Governments for some generations past of cheating the public in this manner. Yet we are not without annoyances in respect of the "root of all evil," without which, however, it is difficult to accomplish much good. In a country, and among a community so far removed from the primitive state of things, money is not a mere adjunct to life, it is life itself. That is a stern, hard fact, not to be got rid of by quoting any number of lines from the poets; they are not authorities on such a question, having no practical experience of the matter they treat; they philosophise from the negative side of the question: we will take their word for any amount of smiles and rainbows, and we would accept a draft on Apollo from one of the tribe for an unlimited number of sunbeams, and in the belief that this radiant patron would—were not November so close at hand—find a day even in London, to pay it with the best gold in his Treasury. But we will not take the ghost's word for a thousand pounds; we would rather have that of the "Governor and Company of the Bank of England," of whom we have, nevertheless, here to complain, believing that they are accessories to the following proclamation, issued on Tuesday evening. The document is drawn in the veriest prose, in what may be called Act of Parliament English; yet at the present moment it is exciting more attention than the same number of lines taken from any part of Homer.

BY THE QUEEN.—A PROCLAMATION.

VICTORIA R.—Whereas it has been represented unto us that, although under our proclamation of the 3d day of June, 1842, a large amount of the gold coin of this realm deficient in weight has been withdrawn from circulation, yet there is much of the gold coin of this realm deficient in weight still in circulation, contrary to the tenor of our proclamation aforesaid, and of two proclamations issued, one by his late Royal Highness George Prince Regent, in the name and on the behalf of his late Majesty King George the Third, bearing date the 1st of July, 1817, and the other issued by his late Majesty King George the Fourth, bearing date the 9th of February, 1821; and there being reason to believe that sufficient attention is not paid to the weighing of the said gold coin, and the directions given in the Acts of Parliament now in force with respect to the cutting, breaking, or defacing such pieces thereof as are found to be of less weight than those declared by the last of the aforesaid proclamations to be current, and to pass and be received in payment; we do by this our royal proclamation declare and command, that from and after the date hereof every gold sovereign of less weight than five pennyweights two grains and a half, and every gold half-sovereign of less weight than two pennyweights thirteen grains and one-eighth, be not allowed to be current or pass in any payment whatsoever. And we do hereby strictly require and command all our loving subjects, and particularly all the officers, collectors, and receivers of our revenue, strictly to conform to the orders hereby given, and to the directions and regulations enacted and established in the several acts of Parliament now in force, and from and after the first day of January next to cut, break, and deface such pieces of the said gold coin as shall be found deficient in weight. And we do hereby further ordain, declare, and command, that the said gold sovereigns and half-sovereigns of the weights last above described shall pass and be received as current and lawful money of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, every such sovereign as of the value of twenty shillings, and every such half-sovereign as of the value of ten shillings, in all payments whatsoever.

Given at our Court at Windsor, &c. &c.

Fewer words might have sufficed, but the length of the proclamation is nothing in proportion to the perplexity and confusion it will occasion. Those who know what followed the proclamation of last year on the same subject need not be told this; we must now prepare for a repetition of vexatious interruptions to the every-day dealings of life. The blunder of 1842 renders necessary a second one in 1843. The principle of the whole matter should have been this—that as the Government make and issue the coinage, have the controul of the whole circulation en masse, which they can restrict at pleasure, so on the Government should have fallen the loss of the deterioration of the coin by the wear and general use. The old sovereigns should have been called in, by a notice that they would be received at the Bank at their legal value, or exchanged for new ones of the proper weight. The loss would then have been thrown equally over the whole community, instead of dividing it between the buyer and seller, the debtor and creditor in every ready money transaction throughout the kingdom. The business at the Bank was managed, last year, in a very clumsy and unsatisfactory manner; we heard numberless complaints of the issue of light sovereigns from the counter of the Bank itself, at the very time when the strictest precautions were observed by that establishment, as to the receipt of the suspicious coin. The consequence was, that after the first alarm wore off, and people found that half the rumours about "plugging and sweating" were unfounded, and that the loss upon the most worn and wasted coin was really small, they returned to the usual state of things, and passed sovereigns, old and new, with almost as little precaution as ever. And that a large number of old ones are still in circulation, there can be no question, simply because the Bank has not called them in in an effectual manner. Nor will this proclamation effect it. It will drive people to handling weights and scales again for a short time, till the tediousness and delay of the process, particularly if often repeated for single coins, make them take the money again upon trust—that is, in the belief that it will be passed by the holder for the same value as that at which it is received. The proclamation will have to be renewed every year, every time with a repetition of the same nuisance, and the same absence of improvement in the condition of the coinage. Such a roundabout way of attaining an object that might be so simply effected is really discreditable to us. The blundering of the Government upon such a matter of detail is actually driving the people in one respect into adopting a custom of the most barbarous states of society, paying and receiving the precious metals by weight instead of at the coined value. The country pays the expense of coinage, and the Government makes the royal stamp of value and the expense of stamping it useless by a proclamation which drives men, ex necessitate, to treat money as merely so much rude metal; we trade, in fact, by the ingot and the shekel. To look into the shop of a dealer in this city of London in the year 1843 and see a payment made, we might almost suppose that a process was going on similar to that by which the patriarch Abraham concluded the purchase of the sepulchre of Sarah—weighing out the money price to the seller. This ought not and need not to be; and we therefore condemn the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having advised a proclamation at once impolitic and unnecessary.

There is one of the public questions of the moment to which we beg to call the attention of our readers, because it involves a wholesome social and political moral, which we would not willingly have the community lose sight of—we mean the moral which proves true civilization to have so far progressed amongst us, that character is at last accounted as one of the indispensable qualifications for attaining honourable power and distinction in public life. The example of this noble moral has been set by the city of London; and the subject to which we allude is the recent election—now only formally terminated—of the new Lord Mayor.

In the few remarks which we shall have to make upon this topic, nothing can be further from our intention than to trench for a moment upon the scurrilous or the personal, or to tinge our observations with the remotest colour of prejudice. We disclaim all knowledge of the parties to whom we may have immediately to allude, and our only object is to elucidate a principle—and, as it strikes us, a very beautiful principle—in the regulation of public affairs—namely, that which demands that the integrity of an unspotted reputation shall have been thrown around the lives of men whom the respectable public are admitting to positions of high official responsibility. Formerly it was not always thus; and the bold and manly assertion of the principle now would seem to argue that moral and political virtue has improved among men, and that considerations of honesty are gaining ground over those of mere ability and influence—in whatever remarkable degree the latter may be displayed.

The recent contest for the Mayoralty is the third instance that has worked out and illustrated our argument.

We are highly gratified with the recent evidences which the City has given of its determination to have the office of its chief public magistrate full of character and respectability—not obnoxious to doubt or calumny, but unsullied and pure.

Against Alderman Thomas Wood persevering charges were brought respecting his conduct with regard to the Talacre Mining Company, which neither courts of alderman nor courts of justice have been able to clear. The impugned party has never escaped from them yet—they continue to be urged with boldness, and have had a great influence on the public opinion. Well, such a man the aldermen of London would not have for their Mayor, although returned by the Common Hall; they struck him out of his rotation, and elected Alderman Humphery in his stead. That excellent magistrate having fulfilled the duties of his mayoralty in a liberal and irreproachable spirit, the time approaches for his cessation from office, and the contest for civic dignity is revived. Alderman Thomas Wood, with a sort of bouncing defiance of all impressions against him, comes forward again. But now mark the growth of public opinion mark the progress of public predilection in favour of character. The year, with its inquiries and disclosures, has washed Alderman Wood no whiter in the optics of his fellow-citizens; and this time even the Livery reject him. The Aldermen repudiated him last year—the Liverymen repudiate him this. But this determination to set up untainted respectability as a jewel in the civic crown, has been on this occasion still more remarkably evinced. Mr. Alderman Gibbs has been also struck out of his rotation. It would appear that, for a long series of years, he has been trustee of a large vestry fund, subsequently churchwarden, and auditor of the accounts of his own trust; that during this period he has rendered no account of his stewardship; and that, when called upon for an explanation by his parishioners, he objected to an open vestry, and refused it upon the miserable and insufficient plea of parochial etiquette. Now, nobody impugns the honesty or questions the respectability of Alderman Gibbs, but everybody has been disgusted with his formal evasion; and the result has been that his name has been unanimously overlooked by the citizens, because they have come to the virtuous resolution not to risk even the chance of a stigma being cast upon the occupant of that high station which represents their greatness, their integrity, their moral honesty, candour, and truth. The result is, that Alderman Magnay, a comparatively young alderman, but against whom "calumny has no whisper," has been chosen to the civic seat, which we have good reason to hope he will fill with justice, and adorn with grace, not forgetting to emulate the spirit and liberality of his predecessor.

Now all this is as it should be, and depend upon it this public regard for character cannot be too much studied by the people in all their elections of the administrators of public affairs—in corporation matters, in members of Parliament, magistrates, coroners, boards of guardians, even down to overseers and clerks. Once get a pure stream of public integrity to swell through the life of the empire, and you will elevate the tone of public action, cleanse opinion, increase confidence, and purify the social system to its inmost depth. And we repeat, that it is most creditable to the City of London that it should be found taking the lead in setting the example and illustration of this fine moral truth most prominent before the world. Let them carry their election no matter what party is returned without bribery or corruption, and they will crown their work.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY. The Queen and Prince Albert, and the Prince and Princess Hohenlohe Langenburg, attended Divine Service in St. George's Chapel. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent was present at Divine Service at the parish church, attended by Lady Charlotte Duncan and Sir George Cooper. The service was performed by the Rev Wentworth Bowyer

It was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, Lord Warmcliffe, Lord President, the Lord Chancellor, Sir Robert Peel, First Lord of the Treasury; the Duke of Wellington, Commander-in-Chief; Lord Stanley, Secretary of State for the Colonies; Sir James Graham, Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Edward Knatchbull, Paymaster of the Forces; the Earl of Liverpool, Lord Steward, the Earl of Delaware, Lord Chamberlain, and the Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse. At the Council a proclamation was ordered to be issued respecting the disturbances in Wales. Parliament was ordered to be further prorogued from the 26th of October until November. The Duke of Wellington arrived from Walmer Castle to attend the Council; the Lord Chancellor arrived at the Castle from his residence, Thrville Park; Sir James Graham, Lord Warmcliffe, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer travelled from town by the Great Western Railway. The latter came in the train leaving the metropolis at two o'clock. The Earl Delaware arrived at the Castle from town to attend the Council. After the Council, the Duke of Wellington, accompanied by the Earl Delaware and Mr. C. Greville left the Castle, and proceeded immediately to the Slough station, and left for town by a special train. The Earl of Jersey, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Graham, and Sir E. Knatchbull, also left the Castle for town. The Attorney-General arrived in town from his residence at Hatton. Sir Frederick paid a visit to Sir Robert Peel. The Earl de Grey, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, had an interview with Sir Robert Peel. Sir Robert Peel received a visit to her Majesty. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales arrived from the Pavilion at Brighton, at a quarter past three o'clock, attended by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, the Hon. C. A. Murray, and the Hon Dopatd Dartmouth. His Royal Highness is in excellent health. The Queen and Prince Albert, and their illustrious visitors the Prince and Princess Hohenlohe Langenburg, promenaded for some time in the Home Park and Slopes

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert left the Castle, attended by the Hon Colonel Grey, equerry in waiting on her Majesty, and Colonel Bouverie, equerry in waiting on his Royal Highness, and proceeded to the residence of the King of Hanover, at Esher, to pay a visit to her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester Her Majesty and the Prince, after spending some time with the royal duchess, returned to the Castle to lunch. Sir R. Peel left in the forenoon for the metropolis, but returned to dinner. His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia arrived on a visit to her Majesty at the Castle. His Grace the Duke of Wellington and a distinguished circle were invited to meet his Imperial Highness. The royal party have been taking their accustomed airings. Her Majesty had a grand dinner party in the evening, at which the private band attended.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by their Serene Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg, took their accustomed morning walk. His Royal Highness Prince Albert conducted his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, over the various apartments in the Castle. They then proceeded round the exterior of the building, and afterwards walked to St. George's Chapel. The royal and illustrious party entered the chapel at the north-eastern door, through Cardinal Wolsey's Gate. Upon the arrival of the illustrious visitors, Dr. Elvey, the private organist to her Majesty, performed upon the fine organ the national anthem, and, during their stay, the following compositions —The Russian national anthem; the national anthem of Austria, "God preserve the Emperor;" and "Waft her Angels," from Handel's oratorio of "Zephtha." The Royal party next proceeded to the spacious Riding house, and after inspecting this admirably-constructed building, examined the stone staircase. Her Majesty a gallery, situated at that portion of the Riding-house next to the Home Park, and commanding a full view of the interior. The royal party, after proceeding over some portion of the most picturesque and interesting localities of the Home Park, in the immediate vicinity of the Palace, returned to the Castle at two o'clock to luncheon with her Majesty His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke visited his Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore Lodge In the afternoon her Majesty, accompanied by the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg rode out in the Park in a pony phaeton. His Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Grand Duke Michael of Russia attended by Prince Dolgorouki, General Landskoy, Colonel Bouverie, Colonel Grey and Captain Meynell, accompanied her Majesty on horseback. The royal party returned to the Castle at half past five o'clock. In the evening a grand banquet was given in the Waterloo Chamber. Covers were laid for thirty nine. The band of the Grenadier Guards, under the direction of Mr. Sibold, were in attendance during dinner. After dinner her Majesty and her illustrious visitors adjourned to the Grand Reception Room for the remainder of the evening.

On Tuesday next his Royal Highness Prince Albert will visit Newmarket for the first time, to witness the running for the Cesarewitch Stakes. The Queen's yacht Duke Michael (Paulowitch) will accompany the Prince. His Royal Highness will proceed thither as Stortford by special train, and return the same night to town.

LAUNCESTON.—We are happy to state that very favourable accounts have been received in town by the Honourable Lady (Henry) Grey, and other relatives, of the health of the above venerable and distinguished nobleman, who has rallied, and is now able to take carriage airings on his domain, at Howick.

The Earl of Leicester, who is passing the autumn, with his youthful cousins, at Holkham, will come of age on the 26th December, when the event will be celebrated by great rejoicings on the noble earl's estates in Norfolk.

DEATH OF GEORGE WILLIAM WOOD, ESQ., M.P.—We are sorry to announce the death of G. W. Wood, Esq., M.P. for the borough of Kendal, which took place on Tuesday night, at Manchester. The honourable gentleman was married with a fortnight, whilst attending a meeting of the Philosophical Society, and expired almost immediately. He has sat in two Parliaments for Kendal, and previously represented South Lancashire. Mr. J. B. Smith, a leading member of the council of the Anti-Corn-law League, starts for Kendal on this vacancy.

DEATH OF COUNTESS STANHOPE.—Her ladyship expired at half past twelve A.M., on Sunday morning, at the family residence, in Charles-street, Berkeley square. The relief of her ladyship's death was a cancer, from which she had suffered during the last three years. The deceased Countess, who was third daughter of the late Lord Carrington, and sister of the present peer, by the Dowager Lady Carrington, was married on the 10th of November, 1803, to the Earl. She's hope, by whom her ladyship leaves a son and daughter, namely Viscount Mahon, M.P. and Lady Delmeny. Earl Stanhope was alone with her ladyship at her dissolution. The funeral is expected to take place on Monday, when the mortal remains of the deceased countess will be removed as early as six o clock to Chevening, near Sevenoaks, Kent, for interment

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE SIR MATTHEW WOOD.—On Saturday evening the remains of the deceased baronet were removed from Mansion, near Gloucester, the seat of Mr. Maddy, to the family residence at Hatherley, a distance of about five mi s. Everything was conducted with the greatest privacy, directions to that effect having been left in writing by the deceased. The inscription on the coffin was simply :—

"MATTHEW WOOD, Baronet,
" Born June 2, 1768,
" Died September 25, 1843."

CITY ELECTION.—Mr. Baring and Mr. Pattison (the former on the Conservative interest, and the latter on the Whig Radical), now stand fairly before the constituency of the city of London, as candidates for their favour. Meetings in favour of the latter gentleman have been held in the wards of Bishopsgate and Farringdon Without, and also at Hampstead, at which resolutions expressive of approbation and support have been unanimously adopted. Mr. Baring's friends have received a similar course in a more quiet way. The result is still considered very doubtful.

THE GOVERNORSHIP OF THE IRISH SOCIETY.—The office of Governor of the Irish Society, vacated by the death of Alderman Sir Matthew Wood, Bart., will, it is said, be filled up on the next court day. The Lord Mayor, it is generally reported, will step into the situation as matter of course, by virtue of his station as chief magistrate.

THE GOLD COINAGE.—On Wednesday Mr. Henry Sewell, of the household of the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, read on the Royal Exchange her Majesty's proclamation relative to the gold coin of the realm deficient in weight. Mr. Sewell also read the proclamation offering the reward of £500 to any person or persons who shall discover, apprehend, and bring to justice any person concerned in the riotous and wicked proceedings in the counties of Pembroke, Cardigan, and Carmarthen.

THE JEWISH WHITE FAST.—The solemn festival of the White Fast was held on Wednesday in the strictest manner among the Jews throughout the metropolis; every shop was closed from sunrise to sunset, and not opened until Thursday morning. The synagogues in Great St. Helen's, Bevis Marks, Duke's place, and Charles-street, Haymarket, were filled from six o clock in the morning till sunset by the highest and the lowest of the Hebrew persuasion.

DREADFUL FIRE AT JAMAICA.—FOUR HUNDRED HOUSES BURNED, WITH IMMENSE LOSS OF PROPERTY.

The Tay brings information of a dreadful conflagration, which broke out at Kingston, at mid-day of the 30th of August, destroying a vast deal of houses and other property, to the amount of £350,000, computed at a rough calculation. The wind was very high, and the fire spread with the greatest rapidity, the negroes looking on with unconcern, and not lending a helping hand to extinguish the flames; there was, besides, a general scarcity of water. Had not the sailors in an hour, soldiers of the 60th Regiment, and the respectable inhabitants of the town rendered assistance, the whole must have fallen a prey to the devouring element.

The following account of this calamity is from the Royal Gazette of Aug. 31:

The melancholy task devolves upon us to record one of the most terrible visitations of Providence that has ever befallen the city of Kingstown within the memory of this generation.

On Saturday last, the 29th instant, at about a quarter of an hour after noon, the unbalanced cry of fire was heard around the city, and soon learned that the premises known as James's Foundry were on fire. But little danger was felt at first, from the situation of the premises, for it was generally believed they would have extended to any great distance. We, however, hastened to the spot, at which time the fire was confined in the Foundry premises, which were in a few minutes totally enveloped in flames, and the extensive adjoining premises, and a considerable number of Messrs. Da Costa and Maxwell. The sea breeze, which previously had been moderate, now began to blow with an increased violence, which threatened to place the greater part of the city in the utmost danger. There were several engines early on the spot, but, owing to a great scarcity of fire buckets, much difficulty was experienced in procuring water, and the water was observed by the fact that the greater part of the people engaged in bringing it were impressed with the absurd idea that salt water would not extinguish fire. The flames, at one time, had communicated with the houses on the north side of Harbour-street, and spread, in spite of all that could be done to stop them, in a north westerly direction. A range of houses extending from Harbour-street to Thames-street were speedily consumed, and the houses on both sides of Duke-street, as nearly as far as Lombard street, were burnt to the ground. The Methodist chapel on Thames-street escaped by the influence of its walls, and the great exertions that were bestowed on its safety. The fire then ran with fearful velocity up the houses on both sides of Roxburgh, of which nothing remained but the bare walls. In the meantime the sheds and burnt shingles, drawn by the violence of the sea breeze, had ignited the upper part of the town in various places, and a house in Law's street, formerly used as the Attorneys' Hall, which was also unoccupied at the time, became the kindlers of a distinct conflagration, more disastrous in its results than even the original one. The fire engines being at the time all engaged in the attempt to check the fire in the lower part of the town, the flames in this quarter were at hand for a considerable length of time to assist in extinguishing that which threatened speedily to reduce to ashes the whole of the upper and more valuable dwelling houses. The flames spread with rapidity which no human power could arrest,—along George lane, up Hunt-street, John's lane, and Duke-street, consuming in their resistless path every house on both sides in the direction to which they were carried by the breeze, driving their wild and fearful career in this direction at the Catholic (Trinity) church, near the Parade.

Meanwhile the fire continued to burn with unabated vigour in its first direction, and the loud wind commencing about five o'clock, threatened to waft the flames towards the Royal-street. The fire, which had by this time extended to within a few houses of Lombard-street, now began to make its way southward; and a large number of houses on the east side of Lombard-street, including Mr. Wilcock's coach building establishment, were burnt successively as flames. A party of artillery, under the command of Major Rowand, had been from the earliest period engaged in pulling down the large buildings in Harbour-street, which appeared likely, while standing, to communicate the flames, but it was found that the slight and open nature of the houses rendered a supply sufficient for the purpose, and that, were, therefore, considered advisable, about eight o'clock, p.m., at which time the flames were burning as fiercely as ever, to bring out a twelve-pound howitzer, in order the more effectually to batter the buildings immediately in advance of the fire. By the use of this, and by the aid of a large body of troops and seamen, the fire was eventually put down at about four o'clock in the morning of Sunday.

It is very difficult, if not impossible at present, to form anything like a correct estimate of the loss occasioned by this awful calamity; it is, however, however, we do not exaggerate when we express our belief that it cannot be under half a million of money. Many poor persons who lived in the neighbourhood of the fire, slavated less their dwellings should become overlapped in the general conflagration, and anxious to save what little property they could from destruction were to be seen throwing their movables from their windows and doors into the street, only to become the prey of a horde of thieves, who were hovering in readiness, ever ready to seize upon it. It was a melancholy spectacle, more fearful than the awful element which was destroying all around, to behold the wretched inmates of the inflamed buildings many of them without a shoe on their feet, or a bonnet on their heads—hurrying from their no longer tenantable dwellings, to seek a shelter they knew not where, and without a change of raiment to replace the soiled and torn garments since attached them of the awful night. The Parade became the grand receptacle for such property as could be saved from the various houses; and at a late hour in the evening many of the unhappy creatures who had rendered houseless by the fire, and themselves down here under "heaven's broad canopy," and passed a night such as never perhaps had been passed in Jamaica. In spite of all, these unfortunate sufferers, and, notwithstanding the unprecedented pressure on the money market, the gentlemen contributed to carry off an immense quantity of property.

The inhabitants are much indebted to the seamen of her Majesty's ships Imaum, Alligator, and Ringdove, as well as to Capt. Houston and Mr. Huddlestone of the former, and to the officers of the latter vessel. Too much praise also cannot be given to the officers and men of the Royal Artillery, 80th Rifles, and 2d West India Regiment, to whose joint exertions the safety of the rest of the town may be said to be due.

We regret to have to record the following accident, which have already come to our knowledge:—As de place was brought out for the purpose of battering down some of the houses, to prevent the spreading of the fire, and several persons were unfortunately injured by the spent and broken shells. We regret to have to record the death of Mr. Ebenezer Depass, from this cause. He was at the Grand Parade-street, when a piece of shell struck him on the throat, dividing the windpipe. He died about one o'clock on Sunday night, retaining his senses to the last, and requested to be buried on the Pah sedition, which he accordingly done. Two other persons are in the hospital, suffering from similar wounds—one on the jaw, and the other in the leg. There are others there who were injured during the fire—one on the knee joint, by the falling of a beam, one run over by a cart, and two with nails in the feet. Major Holland, in superintending the blowing up of a house, was struck by a brick, and severely injured. Mr. Inspector Leake is lame from a cart having run into his foot; we also Captain Elliott and Mr. Bayne, of H.M.S.; Mr. Dallas has, is extremely ill, from a coup de soleil. D. Porter is also ill from his excessive exertions: Alexander R. Scott, Esq., is injured by a contusion; Mr. Geschecon, of the Pass office, is severely hurt in the thigh; Mr. Churchill, chemist, fell from a house, and broke his leg, another fell, and was carried away senseless, promptly attended by Dr. Jamieson; Mr. Carr, in staving some puncheons of rum, got the legs of his pantaloons soaked in it, and they unfortunately caught fire—he is not much injured

WINDSOR, Thursday.—Her Majesty and the Princess of Hohenlohe Langenburg walked out in the royal pleasure grounds. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, and the Prince of Hohenlohe Langenburg went out shooting in the royal preserves at Flemish and Norfolk Farms, where they had some excellent sport. During the day one hundred and five brace of rabbits, nearly one hundred pheasants, with an excellent sprinkling of partridges and hares, were bagged by the Prince and his illustrious visitors. The royal party returned to the Castle to luncheon. In the after noon her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by the Grand Duke of Russia and the Prince of Hohenlohe Langenburg, rode out on horseback. The Hon. Miss Hamilton, Col. Grey, and Col. Bouverie were in attendance. Baron and Baroness Brunow, and the principal part of the Royal suite, followed in pony carriages. The Prince of Wales, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice were taken out in the Royal pleasure grounds, and in the afternoon rode out in the park in a pony carriage. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent lunched with her Majesty at the Castle, and afterwards returned to Frogmore. Monsieur Kondratiskky arrived at the Castle to announce to Baron Brunow the birth of a son and heir of the Cesarewitch. This important intelligence was afterwards duly announced to her Majesty. His Grace the Duke of Wellington took walking exercise. Monsieur Kondratiskky dined and slept at the Castle. The Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel took his departure. The Royal dinner party numbered the following personages.—Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady C Dundas, Mr. and the Hon. Mrs. G. F. Anson, Sir E. Codrington, Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton, and Monsieur Kondratiskky. The band of the 1st Life Guards was in attendance.

ADMIRAL GENERAL EPARRERO TO THE LONDON DOCKS.—On Thursday afternoon Admiral Don Antonio Oriola, General Esparero, accompanied by the Duke of Victoria, Donna Ellidia, and some members of his suite, arrived at the principal entrance to the London Docks, for the purpose of visiting that, the first mercantile establishment in Europe. They were received by John Cully, Esq., and a number of the directors, by whom they were shown over the principal part of the docks. The distinguished visitors were, in the first instance, taken through the crescent in a machine we are assured upwards of 30,000 hogsheads of Spanish wine. They were subsequently lead through the Spanish wool, the indigo, the spice, the drug and the tobacco warehouses; and in the various departments the General, as well as the Duchess, expressed their admiration and astonishment at the extent as well as the regularity with which the business in the different departments was conducted. After traversing the different departments, the distinguished visitors entered the board-room of the company, where a splendid dejeuner a la fourchette of every delicacy of the season, was prepared, and Mr. Calley took the chair, supported on his right by the General, the Duchess of Victoria, and Donna Ellidia. General Esparero, in taking leave, expressed his acknowledgements for the attention paid to him, the Duchess, and the members of his suite who accompanied him, by the authorities connected with the docks, and the gratification they had in seeing the productions of Spain imported and about to be consumed in this country.

MUNIFICENCE OF SIR ROBERT PEEL.—The English Churchman, of Thursday, says that Sir Robert Peel has, within these few days, forwarded a cheque of £4,000 to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, with a view of raising a fund to meet the demand for the building of churches, which will ensue from the act that was passed in the last session.

The Officers of the Grenadier Guards, staying at the York Hotel, Bath, suddenly resolved the route for Windsor on Wednesday night, and were in time for a review, which took place yesterday before the Grand Duke Michael of Russia.

ELECTION OF ALDERMAN FOR THE WARD OF CRIPPLEGATE.—A Warmote of the inhabitants of Cripplegate Without was held yesterday in the Church of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, the Lord Mayor in the chair, for the purpose of electing an Alderman to fill the vacancy occasioned in the representation of the Ward by the lamented death of Sir M. Wood, Bart. Mr. Mardman proposed, and Mr. Morley seconded the nomination of Mr. Challis, in speeches highly complimentary to that gentleman a character, and Mr. Ambrose Moor bore honourable testimony to his fitness for the office. The Lord Mayor having put the question to the vote, Mr. Challis was elected without a dissentient voice, and amid the hearty cheers of the parishioners. The newly elected Alderman then returned thanks, and a vote of regret and confidence with the family of the deceased right hon. baronet, on his death, was subsequently carried.

POLICE.—GUILDHALL.—John Cornstock Clinton, the American who has been in custody for three months, charged with uttering the counterfeit notes on certain Treasury promissory notes of the United States, was again brought up for examination. Sir Peter Laurie resumed the chair to Alderman T. Wood, who heard the case on previous examinations. Mr. Chambers, the solicitor for Mr. Bank, had an application had been made by the American Government for the surrender of the prisoner as an offender of the class specified in the treaty, and the Secretary of State had in consequence issued a warrant for the purpose of apprehension.—Mr. Chambers, for the prisoner, said the Secretary of State's warrant to apprehend he considered illegal. It could not be grounded on sufficient authority, for the other side had not produced evidence here to produce the letter of the pause was to issue the warrant, as well as commit the prisoner.—Alderman Wood noticed that copies of depositions made in America were to be admitted as evidence.—Mr. Chambers said there was a doubt whether a subsequent deposition to offences committed before the signing of the treaty could be given to it, and it so it could not be applied to his client. One apparently qualified to give an opinion thought it only proper.—To justify the surrender to a foreign Government of a man who sought the protection of our country, it must be shown that the plain letter of the law demanded it, and they must stood against a Secretary of State being misled or acting arbitrarily and upon political motives. He imputed to Mr. Bush that he had imposed on the Secretary of Stat — Mr Bush deemed that he had done so, and justified the policy of the treaty.—His application was that the prisoner be discharged from his custody.—Mr. Chambers replied against the arrest, and denied the right of the officer to call any one to aid him in executing it.—The prisoner tried to force his way, and a general scuffle took place—Lord Cresswell, Colonel Greenwell, and many we heard the clock, and proceeded to see the warrant. While he was reading it Mr. Chambers applied to Mr. Alderman Wood to commit Inspector Hames and all who had assisted him, for contempt of court, in taking a man into custody in his presence, when he had just discharged him.—Alderman Wood thought he could not take notice of the matter, though it would have been more decorous to make the application in the regular course. There were various points in his mind, where the guilty of the Secretary of State's warrant, that the City police were afraid at first to assist the inspector, who had only two officers with him. The prisoner was then signed forcibly out of the police room, and carried to a cab at the door. The crowd, as usual, took part against the police, and but for the timely h p of four or five of the City policemen, the prisoner would have been rescued. The prisoner resisted by force, and shaking, but he was overpowered and then to Bow-street for further examination

WINDSOR-HALL.—DUEL PREVENTED.—On Thursday Mr. Wilkinson and Mr. Edwards were brought up at the instance of Mr. Sullingham, charged with intending to commit a breach of the peace by fighting a duel. Mr. Wilkinson was first arrested, and brought before the magistrate.—In answer to a question from the bench, he said he was a barrister of the Inner Temple.—Mr. Sullingham laid information to some remarks on the enormity of the offence which the defendant was about to commit, particularly after the acknowledgement of his intention, and his position as a magistrate of the county.—He had received a letter from the prisoner into his own red, enzance in £1,000, and find two sureties of £500 each, to keep the peace for five ve months.—Mr. Wilkinson then left the public court, and retired to the magistrate's room, where the parties to the duel soon arrived. Mr. Benjamin Barnes, of Loraine-place, Holloway, and Mr. George Alexander Kilgour, of Hamilton-terrace, St. John's Wood, having consented to become bail for Mr. Wilkinson, the recognizances were entered into, and they withdrew from the court. Soon after Mr. Edwards, Mr. Entwisle, the other defendant, came into the court, and Mr. Sullingham having apprised him also of the information that had been laid against him, and of the intended duel between him and Mr. Wilkinson.—Mr. Entwisle said that he did not send any challenge to Mr. Wilkinson, neither had he received any intimation that such was likely to occur. He was answered in the affirmative, i.e (Rose) was then shown into the counting-house where Mr. Waller was sitting; the porter then left, and Rowe asked for some compensation for the long period he had been out of employ. Waller replied (he discharged last Saturday three weeks). Mr. Waller said he was then very busy, but if he (Rowe) would call some other time, he would consider of the matter. These words, however, were not sooner uttered than Rowe drew from his pocket a pistol, and fired it at Mr. Waller. The noise of fire-arms alarmed the porter, and he rushed into the counting-house, when Mr Waller exclaimed, "Rowe has shot me." The porter instantly seized him by the collar, but perceiving that he had another pistol in his hand, he became alarmed, and let him go. No time was lost in sending for a surgeon, who promptly attended, when it was discovered that a ball had entered Mr. Waller's left side, just after striking against one of the ribs fell out. Another ball was also found on the ground. Information of the atrocious attempt was instantly sent to the police-station in Tower-street. Inspector Pearce and other officers proceeded to Rowe's residence, in consequence of information he received, he went in pursuit of the accused, whom he apprehended in the Bow-road, and brought him in a cab back to Tower-street. On searching him one pistol and a dagger were found in his pockets, together with a phial containing some gunpowder, a powder flask, and 10s. 4d. in silver and copper. In a later part of the day the prisoner was taken before the Lord Mayor, when the above facts were stated. He did not deny having committed the act, but said "his late master was a very rich man, and ought to be transported." The Lord Mayor said it was a most serious case, and remanded the prisoner for a week.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT AT MARGATE.—A frightful accident happened at No 34, Lower Marine-terrace, on Sunday last; a beautiful boy, about six years of age, the son of a gentleman from London, by the name of Eldridge, fell from the window into the area below, a distance of nearly 20 feet! The alarm and distress of the parents, who were present, may readily be conceived. Mr. Waddington, surgeon, promptly attended, when in addition to severe injuries to the head and face, the right thigh was found to be badly fractured. It is said that very slight hopes are entertained of the poor little sufferer's recovery.

Letters have been received at Lloyd's, announcing the total wreck of the coal ship Captain Cook, with nearly 700 tons of coals for the Government, on the coast of Africa, about nine miles from Burnt Island. The crew were rescued, and most of their spars and rigging saved.

ATTEMPTED SUICIDE FROM WATERLOO-BRIDGE.—A middle-aged female, named Elizabeth Buchanan, attempted to destroy herself by jumping off Waterloo-bridge yesterday morning. She had got on the top of the parapet, and was in the act of jumping off, when a man named Isaacs secured hold of her clothes, and with difficulty pulled her over. He carried her off the bridge and gave her into custody. She was evidently labouring under insanity.

FRANCE.—We have received the Paris journals of Wednesday's date, but their contents are very destitute of interest. The following is the only extract worth making from them :—"We gave, a few days back, news of the encouragement at the ringte in which M. Brunt was proceeding to the Marquesas. The note which was communicated to us said nothing of the point of the passage at which the frigate had arrived; but we have just received an account of the fact of the greatest gravity which has occurred on board the same vessel. The commencement of a mutiny had manifested itself. On what pretext, in that latitude, we know not. We are merely told that the mutiny had been diminished. No positive cause is assigned for the outbreak. However the matter may be, we are informed that three of the ringleaders were pointed out to Captain Brunt a moment before the intended explosion. He had them summoned before him, and, as the spokesman made some observation and threats, the captain blew his brains out with a pistol-shot. We hear that the Ministry has received from M. Brunt a very circumstantial report of the event, so rare, and unheard of, in our naval annals

"All the gold and silver plate of the Civil List was removed yesterday," says the Courrier Francais," to the Tuileries, for a grand fete, which the King, it is said is about to give to the Princess de Joinville."

PARIS, WEDNESDAY, HALF-PAST FIVE.—Up to this hour no tidings have been received of the arrival at Marseilles of the India mail, whence the weather has been almost all day, favourable to telegraphic communications

WEST INDIES.—The Tay, royal West Indian steamer, arrived at three o'clock on Thursday at Southampton, and landed her mails at four o'clock, which proceeded to London by the night mail train. The Tay performed the voyage from Bermuda to Southampton in fifteen days and two hours, having left that island on the 16th instant. She brings the mails from Jamaica, and St. Thomas's mails, also those of Bermuda. She brings home twenty-seven passengers, 107,000 dollars, and 357 scrons of cochineal. The steam-packet Severn was at Havannah, and about to proceed down the Gulph. The Tay was at Bermuda. The ravages by the yellow fever still continued at Bermuda, and Sir H. C. Chamberlain had fallen a victim. The Tay spoke the St. Vincent and Camperdown men-of-war in lat. 49 28, and long. 9 40, all well.

The Bishop of Chichester took the chair on Tuesday at the Town-hall, at a meeting of the friends of the Brighton and Hove Parochial Association in aid of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

A portion of the Grenadier Guards still remain to do duty at the Palace, but are daily expected to be replaced by other troops. On Tuesday the band of the 7th Hussars entertained a large assemblage of fashionables on the pier.

WOOD PAVING OF THE NEW-ROAD.—On Wednesday a special meeting of the directors and guardians of the poor of St. Pancras took place at the workhouse in the King's-road, for the purpose of carrying out the resolutions of the vestry, to have that part of the new road extending from King's-cross up to the eastern side of Somers-square with wood. A discussion ensued on the merits of the various specimens of paving before the board, and it was ultimately resolved unanimously, to accept the tender of the Metropolitan Company to lay down 11,000 square yards, at the rate of 11s. 6d. per square yard, the works to commence forthwith, and the whole space of the New-road above described to be finally completed within the period of two months.

A NEW FREAK OF REBECCA.—Information has this week been received at Bow-street, of the commission, on the night of the 23d ult., some evil-disposed person or persons entered the stable of Mr. Superintendent Davies, situated in the Broad Walk, Regent's-park, at Mrythy Tydvil, Glamorganshire, and maliciously shot a horse, the property of Mr. Davies, having an animal off by the parties who committed the wanton offence, although a quantity of moveable property was within their reach. Mr. Davies is a very active officer of the rural police force established in Glamorganshire, and it is supposed that his horse was shot by persons who have been annoyed by his activity, and who are connected with the lawless Rebecca. A reward of £15 has been offered for any information likely to lead to the apprehension and conviction of the offenders. The reward has been offered by the commissioners of police.

SUICIDE.—On Sunday night a poor woman named Maria Wood, living with her husband and family in Cross-street, Shadwell-dock, committed suicide by swallowing a large quantity of oxalic acid, which she had procured in the course of the same day at a chymist's shop in Ratcliffe-highway. It appears that the deceased, who was the mother of five children, and lately been subject to fits of despondency on account of the poverty of herself and family, had frequently expressed to make away with part of her property.

ARRIVAL OF HIS IMPERIAL HIGHNESS THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL OF RUSSIA.

On Sunday morning, shortly after eleven o'clock, his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael (Paulowitch) arrived at Black wall. His Excellency Baron Brunow, the Russian minister, with M. de Kondriaffsky, secretary of legation, and M. Benkhausen, Russian consul-general, Colonel Greenwell, and many Russians of distinction, met as early as six o'clock to receive his Imperial Highness, and the equipage of the Russian Minister was in waiting to convey the Grand Duke to the metropolis.

His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke, with the noblemen and gentlemen in his suite, on leaving Berlin repaired direct to the Hague to visit the King of Holland, and the Prince and Princess Royal of Orange. After a few days' stay at the Hague, his Royal relatives, his Imperial Highness and attendants embarked at Rotterdam at seven o'clock on Saturday morning, on board the Ocean, Capt. J. Stranack.

Just before his Imperial Highness's embarkation, a courier arrived from his Excellency Count Medem, stationed at the Hague, bearing the gratifying intelligence of the safe delivery of the Grand Duchess Marie, the consort of his Imperial Highness the Hereditary Grand Duke Alexander of Russia (Cesarevitch), of a son and heir. The Grand Duke appeared much pleased with the information, and more so to hear that the Grand Duchess and her infant son were both going on as favourably as could be wished for. Immediately on the steamer rounded Dover wall, about half-past-eleven, and had come to her moorings, his Excellency Baron Brunow, M. Kondriaffsky, and M. Benkhausen, went on board to congratulate his Imperial Highness on his arrival in this country. His Imperial Highness received his excellency with great warmth of feeling, and shortly afterwards was followed by Prince Dolgorouky, the General Dolgoky, General Lanskoy, and his aides-de-camp, Col. Ogareff, and Baron Tettenborn. After a brief delay, during which his Imperial Highness was welcomed by every individual on the spot, the Grand Duke entered the carriage of Baron Brunow, and came direct to Mivart's Hotel.

We understand that Government sent one of the Admiralty messengers to Dover, on Friday, with orders to the authorities there to despatch her Majesty's steamer Lightning to Rotterdam to convey his Imperial Highness to this country; but it appears that arrangements had been previously made for the Grand Duke to come by the Ocean, which circumstance our Government were unaware of.

His Imperial Highness, accompanied by his Excellency Baron Brunow, arrived at Mivart's about half-past twelve, when Mr. Mivart conducted the Grand Duke to the state apartments of that hotel, which had been prepared for his imperial Highness's reception. Prince Dolgorouky, General Tolstoy, General Lanskoy, Colonel Ogareff, and Baron Tettenborn, arrived shortly afterwards. His Excellency Baron Brunow attended the Grand Duke over the extensive suite of apartments appropriated for the accommodation of the illustrious visitor, when his Imperial Highness expressed his approval of the various arrangements made by his Excellency for his reception.

In the afternoon his Imperial Highness, attended by his Excellency Baron Brunow, visited the Zoological Gardens, in the Regent's Park, where the Grand Duke remained about an hour, and then drove to Kensington-gardens, and after promenading for some time again entered the carriage, and proceeded through Hyde Park and along Constitution-hill to St. James's Park. His Imperial Highness, in company with Baron Brunow, walked through the enclosure amidst the pedestrians who generally congregate in that agreeable resort. His Imperial Highness afterwards accompanied Baron Brunow to Ashburnham House, when Baroness Brunow was introduced to the Grand Duke. His Imperial Highness remained at the Russian embassy until after six o'clock. In the evening his Imperial Highness received his Excellency Baron Brunow and Prince Dolgorouky in addition to the distinguished nobles in his suite, at dinner, at Mivart's Hotel.

On Monday morning his Imperial Highness went out early, and in company with his Excellency Baron Brunow, M. de Kondriaffsky, Prince Dolgorouky, and several of the suite, afterwards walked to the Horse Guards to see the household regiment, on duty there, mount guard. The Grand Duke preserved the strictest incognito. Subsequently he was conducted over the Horse Guards by Captain Mc Martyn, 2d Life Guards, and remained some time in the inspection of the various departments of the building.

In the afternoon his Imperial Highness went to Stafford House, BANQUET GIVEN BY THE QUEEN TO THE GRAND DUKE MICHEL, OF RUSSIA, IN THE WATERLOO GALLERY, WINDSOR CASTLE.

St. James's, to view the private collection of paintings of the Duke of Sutherland. The Grand Duke greatly admired that princely assemblage of the chef-d'œuvres of the ancient masters, particularly the Murillos, for which the Stafford collection is so famed. The magnificent interior of the noble building at once gained the admiration of his Imperial Highness, who was evidently struck with the taste and splendour that characterised the embellishments.

From Stafford House his Imperial Highness and party repaired to the new Houses of Parliament, where Mr. Barry, the architect, was in waiting to receive the illustrious visitors. The Grand Duke was occupied a considerable time in minutely inspecting the entire works, the different situations of the principal portions of the intended houses being clearly explained to his Imperial Highness, who had previously seen the sections and elevation of the building. The Grand Duke ascended and walked round the scaffolding, and seemed much pleased with the heraldic ornaments, already completed, which surrounded all but the west front. The viewing of the works, as far as they have reached, and the necessary explanation of the architectural effect contemplated by the architect, occupied nearly two hours, after which his Imperial Highness and the attachés to his person made hasty visits to Westminster Hall and the Houses of Lords and Commons.

His Imperial Highness, with Baron Brunow and the noblemen of his suite, then repaired to Westminster Abbey, which the party entered by Poet's-corner, and proceeded to visit the nine chapels, the royal tombs, Henry VIIth's Chapel, and the transepts. The several monuments and historical incidents attached to them were explained by the ordinary attendants, who were at first unacquainted with the rank of the august stranger, as no intimation whatever had been received of the purposed visit.

On leaving the Abbey the Grand Duke and most of the party entered their carriages and went direct to the Surrey Zoological Gardens. It was the intention of the party to have been there by the "feeding hour," but the stay at the new Houses of Parliament and at the Abbey being rather protracted it was after five o'clock when they arrived at the Zoological Gardens. On leaving the gardens the carriages were ordered to Mivart's. It had been previously arranged that his Imperial Highness should go to St. Paul's Cathedral, and it was solely owing to the advanced hour of the day that the visit was put off until after the Grand Duke's return from Windsor Castle.

In the evening his Imperial Highness honoured his Excellency the Russian Minister and Baroness Brunow with his company at dinner at Ashburnham House. At the conclusion of the banquet his Imperial Highness, with the Baron and Baroness and the whole of the party, went to Drury-lane Theatre.

Captain Meynell, R.N., M.P., one of the Grooms in Waiting on her Majesty, has been selected by the Queen for the honour of attending on the Grand Duke during his Imperial Highness's sojourn in this country. Colonel Rowan, immediately on the Grand Duke's arrival, instructed a suitable number of the police to daily perform duty at his Imperial Highness's residence at Mivart's

On Tuesday, his Imperial Highness, attended by several of the noblemen in his suite, took a carriage drive in the Regent's-park and the northern suburbs of the metropolis. After luncheon at Mivart's, the Grand Duke and party prepared for the departure for Windsor Castle. The Earl of Jersey, Master of the Horse, at the command of her Majesty, sent the royal carriages to convey his Imperial Highness and the noblemen of his suite to Windsor.

It was after three before his Imperial Highness and party left for Windsor; and, as the carriages were at the hotel some considerable time before the Grand Duke departed, a crowd of persons collected to obtain a glimpse of the illustrious visitor. His Imperial Highness was warmly cheered on entering the royal carriage, attended by Captain Meynell, M.P., there being at least 300 persons present; and on his departure his Imperial Highness was saluted by rapturous cheers.

His Excellency the Russian Minister and Baroness Brunow were, at the express command of her Majesty, requested to join the party at Windsor.

M. de Kondriaffsky remains in town to transact the ordinary business of the embassy.

Prince Dolgorouky, General Tolstoy, General Lanskoy, Colonel Ogareff, and Baron Tettenborn accompanied the Grand Duke to Windsor.

His Imperial Highness arrived at Windsor Castle at five o'clock, in a travelling carriage and four.

His Imperial Highness was received at the grand entrance by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Lord Steward. The Earl Delawarr and the Earl of Liverpool conducted their Royal and Imperial Highnesses to the presence of the Queen in the grand reception room, where the introductions to her Majesty and the Prince of the distinguished foreigners in the Duke's suite took place.

A grand banquet was given by her Majesty at eight o'clock, in the Waterloo gallery, to the following royal and distinguished personages, in addition to the members of the royal household, in attendance upon the Queen and the Prince Consort: His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Charlotte Dundas (in attendance upon the Royal Duchess), his Excellency the Baron and the Baroness Brunow, the Duke of Wellington, the Marquis of Exeter (Groom of the Stole to Prince Albert), the Earl of Liverpool (Lord Steward), the Earl Delawarr (Lord Chamberlain), the Earl of Jersey (Master of the Horse), the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, Major-General Sir Henry Wheatley (Keeper of her Majesty's Privy Purse), le General-Major Prince Dolgorouky, le General-Major Tolstoy, le General Lanskoy, le Colonel Ogareff, le Capitaine de Tettenborn, the Viscount and Viscountess Canning, Captain Meynell (Groom in Waiting to the Queen, who is in attendance upon the Grand Duke during his Imperial Highness's visit to England), Colonel Hall (of the 1st Life Guards), Colonel Home (of the Grenadier Guards), and Mr. G. E. and the Hon Mr. Anson.

The band of the 1st Life Guards were stationed in the gallery of the Waterloo chamber, and performed during the banquet; at the conclusion of which her Majesty, with the royal and illustrious guests, proceeded to the grand drawing-room, the private band of the Sovereign being in attendance the remainder of the evening.

On Wednesday, the calls of the different Foreign Ministers and the principal nobility in town, at Mivart's, were exceedingly numerous. The visitors inscribed their names in his Imperial Highness's book.

The sojourn of the August Duke, it was at first said, would not exceed three weeks, but we learn that his Imperial Highness is desirous of making a tour in the Highlands of Scotland, and in that event he may be expected to remain here longer than originally anticipated.

Invitations have been issued from the Russian Embassy for the entertainments to be given by his Excellency and Baroness Brunow, in honour of the Grand Duke's visit to this country, on Saturday and Sunday.

The Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel have been unable to forward any invitation to his Imperial Highness, as their domestic establishments have removed to Walmer and Drayton Manor.

We annex a portrait of the Grand Duke Michael (Paulowitsch). His Imperial Highness is only brother of the Emperor of all the Russias, was born 28th of January (8th Feb., new style), 1798, and married 19th Feb. 1824, her Royal Highness the Princess Hélène, daughter of Prince Paul of Wirtemberg, brother of the King. By the Grand Duchess Hélène he has three daughters—namely, the Grand Duchess Marie, born 9th March, 1825; the Grand Duchess Elizabeth, born 20th May, 1826; and the Grand Duchess Catherine, born 28th August, 1827. His Imperial Highness's sisters are, the Grand Duchess of Saxe Weimar and the Queen of Holland. Her Imperial Highness the Grand Duchess Hélène and daughters had, according to the last letters from Germany, arrived at Altenburg from Berlin, and intended from thence to go to Bingen, near Wiesbaden, and intended to remain there for three weeks.

THE GRAND DUKE MICHEL, OF RU
(From a Portrait by Ball of Gotha.)

The Globe relates the following anecdote with regard to his Royal Highness, which places his character in rather an unfavourable light:—"It is not long since his Royal Highness was resident at Odessa. In that town resides a family of considerable rank, of great wealth, and of unbounded hospitality. It was the practice of the head of this family to give evening entertainments, to which the officers of the regiments on duty in the town and neighbourhood were invited. The Grand Duke Michael was deemed of too elevated rank to be invited; but he graciously signified his intention of being present at the next entertainment. The honour was duly acknowledged. The day was left to the Grand Duke; and having been fixed, the proprietor of the house made every preparation to receive his illustrious guests with every mark of honour and every expression of hospitality. Those who were invited to meet the brother of the Emperor were delighted with the distinction. The military officers were presented to him in due form, and were received with dignity softened by the gracious condescension for which the Grand Duke is celebrated. Among the officers was one who was the frequent guest of the hospitable owner of the mansion, where he was received on the footing of a friend, and esteemed for the personal excellences which were prominent in his character. This young officer was presented with the rest. Some slight departure from the military costume enjoined by the regulations of the service attracted the notice of the Grand Duke, and called forth, at the moment, a strong and mortifying reproof. This, under the circumstances was punishment sufficiently severe. The worst remains to be told. The circumstance was reported to the Emperor; and this officer, for this trifling breach of military law, was shortly afterwards on his road to Siberia, whither he was sent to ponder over the heinous offence of having appeared before the Grand Duke Michael, at a private party, with the slightest departure from the strictest military costume. The entertainments ceased, not only at the house the hospitalities of which the Grand Duke Michael had so effectually damped, but throughout Odessa, so long as his Royal Highness continued therein."

THE BRITISH AND AMERICAN ROYAL MAIL STEAM-SHIP HIBERNIA.

This splendid vessel is "winning golden opinions" by her rapid voyages. She is one of the four steam-ships under contract with the Lords of the Admiralty for Boston, carrying her Majesty's mails and passengers to Halifax. The Hibernia, Captain C. H. E. Judkins, was built on the Clyde, and was launched at Greenock on the 8th of September, 1842; her engines, of 500 horse power, are by Napier, of Glasgow. She is about 200 tons larger (viz., 1200 tons) and of greater power than the other mail steam ships of the above company, and she differs from them in being round-sterned and wider, but not much longer. Her accommodations are of the first class; her saloon is very superb, and is ornamented with paintings on panels of the principal cities at which she touches, and she has 120 berths.

In general efficiency and speed, the Hibernia has not only eclipsed the other three vessels composing the line, but has outstripped all other competitors. In July last she made her homeward voyage in eight days, 23 hours, being the shortest passage on record and her last voyage home was accomplished in twenty-six hours less than the same passage by the Great Western.

The Hibernia is now on her voyage for Halifax, having sailed from Liverpool on Wednesday, taking out a full complement of passengers. Lieutenant Parsons, the commander, had charge of the mails.

The excellent qualities of the Hibernia have induced the managers of the company to have built a vessel on the same model, to supply the place of the Colombia.

HARVEST HOME!*

"The feast of Harvest, the first fruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in thy field."—Exod. xxii. 16.

"Here, once a year, distinction lowers its crest,
The master, servant, and the merry guest,
Are equal all; and round the happy ring
The rosiers eyes exulting glances fling;
And warm'd with gratitude, he quits his place,
With sun-burnt hands, and ale-enliven'd face,
Refills the jug his honoured host to lend,
To serve at once the master and the friend;
Proud thus to meet his smiles, to share his tale,
His nuts, his conversation, and his ale."—BLOOMFIELD.

Crowning season of the year!
How beautiful thou dost appear,
When, as now, thy ruddy face,
After summer's warm embrace,
Like a sylvan deity's
Flush'd with wanton revelries,
Smiles so joyously around
On every valley—every mound—
Every garden, field and grove,
Rich with fruits of Ceres' love!

All the heav'nward hopes of SPRING
Sent on expectation's wing
That their gentle claims be won,
Thou dost bear back from the sun,
Who hath chang'd to ripen'd fruit,
The timid blossoms of her suit!
Oh! the grateful happy smiles,
When the yellow sheaves in piles
Of rustic architecture rise,
Like the domes of eastern skies,
Fointing up their gilded tops,
O'er the farm-yard or the copse
Round the rural dwelling, where Gladsome hearts are met to share
The HARVEST-FEAST on that dear night,
Yet "HORKEY" by some peasant's hight,†
In nooks of merry old England,
Where ancient customs, blithe and bland,
Have dwindled not into decay,
'Fore prouder manners of the Day!

"Mirth and music, dance and song,"
There the happy night prolong—
There the tankard's foamy crest
By many a thirsty lip is prest,
While the old wits of a feather,
Crack their nuts and jokes together
Silly on some youthful pair,
Wh sp'ring stolen converse there;
Guessing how happy some will be Ere next Harvest-Feast they see!

Such the peaceful calm delights
That still are known on "Horkey" nights.
Such the joys of Harvest Home—
None like them else though far we roam! W.

GRAPE GATHERING.

THE VINTAGERS' HYMN.

What delights can equal ours?
Roaming through the fragrant bow'rs
Of the curling vines, and drinking
Sweet oblivion of dull thinking
From the red grapes' juicy lip,— Nectar, e'en the gods might sip!

'Tis vintage time—gay vintage time!
With lusty Bacchus, in his prime,
Ruling o'er our revelry,
In all the old festivity
That erst he did, when, first, he crown'd
His head with Ivy, tendril-bound ‡
Sing to Bacchus, wild and free,
Immortal son of SEMELE!

Press the clusters in the bowl
Many a drooping, sorrow'd soul
Yet will feel th' enlivening pow'r
Of the vines we strip this hour,
And in sweet cheery
Laughter, truthful ecstacy,
Drink a Lethe of their woes,
And sink into a dream's repose!
Happy if that dream could last
Till Life's dreary cares were past!
But away! with gloom and sorrow!
Laugh to-day, whate'er to-morrow!

See! while the tendrils of the vine
Cling and curl in graceful twine,
Other ringlets charm our sight,
Beauty's tresses flowing bright!
And though the grape be rich and warm,
With a fonder pow'r to charm,
Have we not both lips and eyes,
In which intoxication lies
Of deeper danger, wilder bliss,
Than follows from the richest vine's kiss?

Sing to Bacchus! wild and free,
Immortal son of Semele!
In his cup of magic wiles
We will plunge Dione's smiles,
And then its nectar'd stream will flow
As brightly for our joy below,
As e'er to quaff ambrosia down
It circled on Olympus' crown! W.

HOP-PICKING.

A PASTORAL SONG.

Sing to the Hop! the English vine,
That gives our Cerevisian wine,§
The "brown October," strength to bear
All changes of the varied year,—
And e'en to those who quaff it too,
A hardihood no race e'er knew!
Tankard flowing,
Joy bestowing,
Here's to him that first did brew
Thy sparkling measure,
Source of pleasure!
And HERE'S THE FIRST FAIR HOP THAT GREW!

In the early morn how sweet
Its blossoms' fragrant breath to greet,
And see it fondly clasp'd around
The staff that rears it from the ground!
Its tendrils need no friendly hand
To stay them up with osier-band,
As did the Umbrian vines of old!—

Whose weak embrace could not keep hold
Of the kind elms 'round which they twin'd,
Without such tie their stems to bind!
No! like the Briton's to his Throne,
Its loyalty is all its own!

Then sing the Hop! the English vine,
That gives our Cerevisian wine,
The "brown October," strength to bear
All changes of the changing year,
And e'en to those who quaff it too,
A hardihood no race e'er knew!
Tankard flowing,
Joy bestowing,
Here's to him that first did brew
Thy sparkling measure,
Source of pleasure!
And—HERE'S THE FIRST FAIR HOP T AT GREW!
W.

* These rural entertainments and usages," says the unfortunate Eugene Aram, "were formerly more general all over England than they are at present, being become by time, necessity, or avarice, complex, confined, and altered. The pleasures of this needy-expected time consisted in the Harvest supper, mirth, and music, dance and song."

† In parts of Herefordshire Suffolk, and Essex, there are still to be found the remains of an ancient custom called "Hiloing Largess," which is performed in this manner. A leader is chosen from amongst the reapers, who is styled the "Harvest-Lord," and when the last of the grain is carried home, he and the husbandmen go in the farmer's waggon to the house, where a good supper is prepared. This is called the "Horkey," or Harvest-Home, upon the breaking up of which the husbandmen of the farm assemble upon some rising ground near at hand, and loudly cry out, "Hoilo—hoilo—hoilo—Largess!" This is often liberally bestowed, both in money and kind, and the whole collection at the close is equally divided. But the custom is fast declining.

‡ According to Pliny, Bacchus was the first who ever wore a crown. It was composed of ivy and vine leaves.

§ The ancients, particularly of Sicily, had a beverage which they brewed from barley. It is supposed to have resembled our ale, and was called Cerevisium.

The osiers of America, in Umbria (anevine salices) were famous for the binding of vines to the elm trees.

LITERATURE.

THE MAGAZINES FOR OCTOBER.

The DUBLIN UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE progresses prosperously; and we think the present number equal, if not superior, to either of its predecessors. In the opening paper, "The Loiterings of Arthur O'Leary," is a most spirited sketch of life at a Dutch chateau: the writer, while taking his ease upon an antique sofa, meets with the following interruption:—

Words are weak to convey the most distant conception of the noise: it seemed as though ten thousand peacocks had congregated beneath my window, and with brazen throats were bent on giving me a hideous concert. The fiend thrums in "Robert le Diable" was a psalm-tune compared to it. I started up, and rushed to the casement; and there, in the lawn beneath, beheld some twenty persons costumed in hunting fashion their horses foaming and splashed, their coats stained with marks of the forest; but the uproar was soon comprehensible, owing to some half dozen of the party, who performed on that most diabolical of all human inventions, the cor de chasse. Imagine, if you can, and thank your stars that it is only a work of imagination, some twenty feet of brass pipe, worn belt fashion over one shoulder, and under the opposite arm—one end of the aforesaid tube hung a monstrous bell-mouth, and the other expanding itself into a huge trumpet-mouth; then conceive a Fleming—one of Rubens's cherubs, immensely magnified and decorated with a beard and moustaches—blowing into this with all the force of his lungs, perfectly unmindful of the five other performers, who, at five several and distinct parts of the melody, are blasting away also; treble and bass, contre alto and soprano, shake and sostenuto—all blending into one crash of hideous discord, to watch the Scotch bagpipe, in a drone, as a soothing, mellow melody. A deaf and dumb institution would capitulate in half an hour. Truly, the results of a hunting expedition ought to be of the most satisfactory kind to make the "retour de chasse"—it was this pandemonium of musical suffering to those who were not engaged in the concert: as for the performers, I can readily believe they never heard a note of the whole. Even Dutch lungs grow tired at last; having blown the establishment into contortions, and myself into a furious headache, they gave in; and now an awful bell announced the time to dress for dinner.

At table, he meets with a sleek old curé, who relates a story to O'Leary, in which he owns himself the discomfited hero in a love match. The following passage, and certain old people who have nothing to do are early risers, is very droll:—

What a blessing should sleep be to that class of beings who do nothing when awake, how they should covet those drowsy hours that give, as it were, a sanction to indolence, with what unctuous fervour they ought to exclaim, in the early morning the period when they become the equals of their fellow men; and with what terror they should look forward to the time when the busy world is up and stirring, and their incapacity and aimlessness must become more glaring from contrast. Would not any one say that such people would naturally cultivate sleep as their comforter? Should they not hug their pillow as the friend of their bosom? On the contrary, these are invariably the people who are ever astir; where I have ever been on a visit has had at least one of these troubled and troublesome spirits; the torment of boots—the horror of housemaids. Their chronic cough forms a duet with the sonorous crowing of the young cock, who, for lack of better knowledge, proclaims day a full hour before his time. Their creaking shoes are the accompaniment to the scrubbing of brass fenders and the tedgems of carpets; the inviting means of opening shutters, and the cranking discord of a half-door chain; their heavy step sounds like a nightmare's tread, through the whole sleeping house; and what is the object of all this? Want now feel sure they suspired? want difficult question have they solved? whom have they made happier, or wiser, or better? Not Betty, the cook, certainly, whose morning levee of beggars they have most unceremoniously scattered and scared: not Mary, the housemaid, who, unaccustomed to be caught en déshabillé, is cross the whole day after, though he was "only an elderly gentleman, and wore spectacles" not Richard, who cleaned their shoes by candle-light: nor the venerable butler, who, from sheer, pure, absolute love of order, will have, at all events, his with his corkscrew in his hand, under the vague impression that it is a necessary party

These people, too, have always a consequential, self-satisfied look about them; they seem to say, as though they knew a thing or two others had not wot of: as though the day, more confidential than few were by, told them some capital secrets the sleepers never heard of; and they make this pretential habit a reason for eating the breakfast of a Cossack, as if the consumption of victuals was a cardinal virtue.

Civilized differs from savage life as much by the regulation of time as by any other feature. I see no objection to your red man, who probably can't go to breakfast till he has caught a bear, being up betimes; but to the gentleman who goes to bed with the conviction that his rolls and coffee, tea and marmalade ladies and honey, buns, muffins, and eggs await him at ten o'clock; for him, I say, Lie, absurd vagabondisms are an insufferable affectation, and a most unwarrantable liberty with the peace and privacy of a household.

The other serial tale is Mr. James's "Arrah Neil; or, Times of Old." Next is a pretty sketch, "The Benedictine of Etna," by Miss Pardoe. There are, likewise, some "Episodes" of travel, papers on the Factory System of England, and "The Oxford and Berlin Theology," with two or three articles of considerable literary research, and some very pleasing poetical contributions; altogether making the number a most attractive one.

FRASER has some capital papers; the first of which is the continuation of the "Sketch of Louis Philippe," noticed in our last; though we fear the present portion has been written too much for the nonce, especially in the passage, on "the probable results of the Queen's visit to France." The biographical anecdotes of Louis Philippe are in far better taste. This paper is succeeded by a literary "curiosity"—"A Treatise on the Nature, Origin, and Destination of the Soul," by the celebrated Warren Hastings, written at Margate in 1793. The editor, it appears, has several posthumous papers, by the same learned and we agree with him that the subjoined is "as beautiful as it is touching." The following passage is a fine picture of contentment under wrong:—

The writer of these reflections is himself one who is content with the state in which it has pleased God to place him; he would not exchange it, with his identity, were it possible, for that of any created being. Yes! many and evil have been the days of his pilgrimage. He has encountered troubles, cares, wearinesses and disappointments, sickness and affliction. He has known what it is to extend his sensibility to external attachments, to suffer for the sufferings of those who were dear to him, and to look on the cold cheek of death, but out of "the barest bog of sublunary bliss." He has toiled for the means of temporal enjoyments, which, when attained, have failed into indifference, and has been visited by griefs which use has accommodated to his nature. And in this review of his destiny he feels that he sees the general allotment of all the human race.

The next paper, "Bluebeard's Closet," is a droll affair in Titmarsh's happiest vein, Mrs. Blue's sorrows are a pleasant piece of banter.

Bluebeard Hall is situated, as we all very well know, in a remote country district, and, although a fine residence, is remarkably gloomy and lonely. To the widow's susceptible mind, after the death of her darling husband, the place became intolerable. The walls, the lawn, the fountains, the green glades of park over which frisked the dappled deer, all—all recalled the memory of her beloved. It was but yesterday, as they roamed through the park in the calm summer evening, her Bluebeard pointed out to the keeper the fat buck he was to kill. "Ah!" said the widow, with tears in her fine eyes, "the ardent stag was shot down, the haunch was cut and roasted, the jelly had been prepared from the current bushes in the garden that he loved, but my Bluebeard never ate of the venison! Look, Anne sweet, pass we the old oak hall; its hang with trophies won by him in the chase, with pictures of the noble race of Bluebeard! Look! by the fire-place there is the pig whip, his riding-whip, the spud with which you know he used to dig the weeds out of the terrace-walk; in that drawer are his spurs, his whistle, his visiting-cards, with his dear, dear name engraven upon them! There are the bits of string that he used to cut off the parcels and keep them neat as he always useful; his tea-tin-book, and there is the peg on which he used to hang his h—h—hat!"

Uncontrollable emotions, bursts of passionate tears, would follow these tender reminiscences of the widow: and the longer and nearer she came to the matter was, that she was determined to give up Bluebeard Hall and live elsewhere; her love for the memory of the deceased, she said, rendered the place too wretched.

Under "The Pilgrimage in Paris," a very romantic tale is told of "Tan Pont Neuf." Of the remaining papers, we can only notice "Dennis Haggarty's Wife," a broad Irish portrait, full of characteristic humour and spirit.

BENTLEY'S MISCELLANY is a number of average merit. "Mr. Ledbury's Adventures" are continued in their usual vein of fun, incidental to the season, a current recommendation, by the way, of the entire series: an itinerant show, the caravan of wonders, a fête champetre on the banks of the Thames, and a journey up the Rhine (with a patter legend), are the phases of this month's modicum; they are well seasoned with practical jokes, and here and there a graphic vignette of rural life. Here is a summer's day:—

It was very hot. The most argumentative individual would not have contradicted the fact. So thought the waggoner, who was asleep beneath the tilt of his waggon, whilst his horses dreamily munched some warm hay from a rack, or contented with some tepid water in the trough; so thought the host, who was smoking a pipe in his shirt sleeves, exactly in the centre of the entrance to his inn as much as to say it was of no use disturbing him by going in, for he was too hot to attend to any body; so thought the cows as they stood knee-deep in water, vainly endeavouring to chastise impertinent flies with their tails; and so, doubtless, thought Mr. Rodgers and his fellow student, who were sitting at the shelving turf, at the side of the river, poking small pebbles at a water-lily that trembled in the sunlight on the surface of the stream, whose ripples harmonized with the crackling of the seed-pods of the wild plants upon the bank, and produced the only sounds that broke the afternoon stillness, except the occasional wrenching of the two horses, besieged by impertinent flies, who were cropping the grass at the side of the shallow, and now and then rattled their patent-work harness in so restless a manner as to call forth a passing reproof from their owner.

We pass over several papers, which, to say the truth, are of very slight attraction, to get to "Terry O'Daldy's Visit to Chateau d'Eu," by "the Irish Whiskey Drinker," a new contributor: the visit is in the true Irish vein, and is a lively, rattling affair. It is followed by a very grave account of the great Mammoth Cave, in Kentucky, a subject "as old as the hills," and a dead weight in Bentley's usually frolicsome pages. We infer the Memoirs of Munden to be concluded in this number, at which most readers will rejoice; for such papers are little better than repetitions of play bills, and echoes of play goers' recollections.

BLACKWOOD is a clever number, but deficient in light and shade. It would, we know, be far from an easy matter to write a light article upon Mill's new work on Logic, the subject of the first paper, and "what ninety-nine out of every hundred will pronounce a dry book." This is followed by a domestic tale, "My Country Neighbours," narrating the feuds of "the two great families in the neighbourhood," both amusingly and profitably for the reader. Next, are the "Travels of Kerim Khan," from Delhi to Calcutta, and thence to England in 1839, translated from the original Ourdu; this paper is but feebly attractive, though many of the Mussulman gentleman's experiences in our metropolis stand over. "The Thirteenth, a Tale of Doom," is laid in Germany; but its point will readily be guessed by the English reader. "Modern Painters" is a paper of many pages, devoted somewhat unworthily to the volume recently written by a graduate of Oxford, to prove the superiority of modern painters in landscape painting to all the ancient masters: the reviewer's parting paragraph is very characteristic:—

We do not think that landscape painters will either gain or lose much by the rubbishon of this volume, unless it be some most fixation to be so stilly lauded as some of our very respectable painters are. We do not think that the pictorial world, either in taste or practice, will be Turnerized by this palpably fulsome nonsensical praise. In this, our graduate is semper idem, as in keep up his idolatry to the striking point, terminates the volume with a prayer, and begs all the people of England to join in it—a prayer to Mr. Turner.

A well-timed article, "Physical Science in England," opens with an ably-drawn contrast of the chains to distinction of the ruler of France and the great improver of the steam-engine, starting with the appalling statement that Napoleon has been the cause, mediate and immediate, of sacrificing the lives of two millions of men! This article teems with what may be termed "wise saws and modern instances" on the common cry against the neglect of science in the present day, the writer shrewdly observes:—

As all history does not show us that our predecessors were more just to their scientific contemporaries. The evil is, to a great extent, remediless, the complaint, to some extent, irrational and unworthy the dignity of the cause. The labourer in the field of science works not for the present, but for succeeding generations, to be plants sake for posterity, and must not look for the gratitude of contemporaries, which would renumerate less, and be more grateful to prove rather than for present good—for benefits secured to their posterity than to themselves; the realization of the advantages is so distant, that the amount of discount is coextensive with the debt. It is only as the applications of science become more immediate and daily, a most extensive and most lucrative use of their results. Men talk of "a mill on!" how few have ever counted one! Men walk along the Strand, Fleet street, London hall; how few think of the multiplied passions and powers which lift by them on their way—of the separate world which surrounds each passer-by—of the separate history, external and internal, of each—each possessing feelings, motives of action, characters, differing from the others as the stamp of nature on his brow differs from his fellows!

We have only space to glance at the next paper, "The Chronicles of Paris," a sort of romantic itinerary of the Rue St. Denis, as thickly-storied as its lofty houses with historical associations. The article is penned throughout with graphic vigour, with some of the Rembrandt-ish effects of romance writing

The NEW MONTHLY is unchanged, i. e., Mr. Hood's name no longer appears on the wrapper, or his contributions in the magazine. We know not who may have stepped into the editorial slippers; we hope not the author ?) of the string of common places, entitled "Anti-Mathew; or, a Cure of Hydrophobia," which opens the number; it being the weakest attempt at wit throughout the pages. Next is "The Master Passion," a tale of Chamounée, by Mr. Grattan, in which Gabriel Balmat, "a man of dark and doubtful character," and Paul Corrveyon, two real outliers, play the chief parts. Miss Eliza Balmanno's "Recollections of the Empress Josephine," at St. Helena, is nearly the thousand-and-first magazine paper of the kind. We quote an anecdote: calling on Napoleon, one evening

We found him in the blithest-room, employed looking over some very large maps, and moving about a number of pins, some white and some red. I asked him what he was doing. He replied that he was fighting over again some of his battles, and that the red-headed pins were meant to represent the English, and the black the French. One of his chief amusements was going through the evolutions of a past battle, to see if it were possible by better manœuvring to have won it.

The story of "The Organist and his Daughter" is prettily Trollopized. "Ellistoniana" contains too many echoes of the green-room, with unabated vulgarity. "The Widow's Almshouse," by the author of "Peter Priggins," chap. iv., winds up the story of the "Runaway Match," and explains how the Widow gained admittance into the almshouse. "St. Petersburg in 1843," is a lively picture of the Russian capital, but the following piece of information we suspect, will not attract tourists:—

As woman is everywhere, the Russian dames are more generous, and less selfish in their disposition than the men, and consequently less servile. They contemn all that is Russian, and idolize what is foreign, especially what is French. If you could read the secret wishes of those pale ghosts, what do you think they are? You may feel disposed to believe, that at least their thoughts turn on matrimony, but not at all. It is ten to one if they are not longing, or plotting, or sobbing, some plan to get abroad, and take wing away from that vast prison-house, the Russian empire. In this feeling their noble mother fully sympath ses with them, and while wishing, absent in vain, in the hope of realising their dreams, they will be sure and repose their full confidence in the French tutor and the Swiss governess.

"A few Words about the Cartoons" is a very tame and trite piece of criticism, and the number altogether has few of those redeeming points which Love hitherto characterised the "trifles light as air" of this miscellany.

The METROPOLITAN though containing scarcely a paper of seasonable interest, is a very readable number of nouvelettes, somewhat too spun out for certain tastes, but amusing withal; the most information being conveyed in those papers which narrate continental tours, such appear to be pet subjects with the "Metropolitan." The usual attention is paid to the review of New Books, by analysis and quotation, a feature fast disappearing from our highly-priced magazines, and left to those journalists who have less time for the task.

The United Service Journal has several well-timed papers, which we can only recommend to the attention of our readers. These are, "The Army in Ireland, and the Repealers;" an able view of the military strength of the Russian Empire; a copious narrative of the ill-fated Niger Expedition; and a very striking anecdote of the present Revolutionary War between Texas and Mexico. The correspondence and registers are attractive.

Tait's Edinburgh Magazine contains a brief but sensible view of the Queen's visit to France, and a paper of sharp practice "The Close of Many Sessions" of sturdy politics, as usual. An article on Catullus, by Bon Gaultier, will amuse other than classical readers, by the life and brilliancy of its translations. "Punch and Poetry," by the same hand, is racy. "De Custine's Empire of the Czar" is one of Tait's usually masterly analyses; and there is a capital paper on a batch of new novels—"The President's Daughters," "The State Coach," &c., besides the customary "Literary Register." A short paper, entitled "Excursions in the West of Ireland," well merits attention. We quote one of the poetical contributions, founded on fact.—

LOVE STRONG IN DEATH BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

The brother of two sisters
Drew painfully his breath
A strange fear had come o'er him,
For love was strong in death
The fire of fatal fever
Burn'd darkly on his cheek:
And often to his mother
He spoke, or tried to speak.

He said—"The quiet moonlight,
Beneath the sha low'd hill,
Seem'd dreaming of good angels,
While all the woods a ere st ll.
I felt as if from slumber
I never could awake—
Oh! mother, give me something
To cherish for your sake!

A cold dead weight is on me,
A heavy weight like lead,
My Lands and feet seem sinking,
Quite through my little bed,
I am so tired, so weary—
With weariness I ache
Oh! mother, give me something
To cherish for your sake!

Why can't I see the poplars?
Why can I! see the hill,
Where dreaming of good angels
The moon-beams lay so still?
Why can't I see you, mother?
I surely am awake;
Oh! haste to give me something
To cherish for your sake!"

The little bosom heaves not:
The fire and left its cheek:
The fine chord—is it broken?
The strong chord—would it break?
Ah yes! the loving spirit
Hath winged its flight away;
A mother and two sisters
Look down on lifeless clay

Martin Chuzzlewit reports progress in the "Love, Hatred, Jealousy and Revenge" of the "House;" but we pass by them to an admirable scene of the City Undertaker, and his professional delicacy:—

Mr. Mould was surrounded by his household gods. He was enjoying the sweets of domestic repose, and gazing on them with a calm delight. The day being sultry, and the window open, the legs of Mr. Mould were on the window seat, and his head reclined against the shutter. Over his shining head a handkerchief was drawn, to guard his baldness from the flies. The room was fragrant with the smell of punch, a tumbler of which grateful compound stood upon a small round table, convenient to the hand of Mr. Mould; so deftly mixed, that as his eye looked down into the cool transparent drink, another eye, piercing brightly from behind the crisp lemon-peel, looked up at him, and twinkled like a star.

Deep in the city, and within the ward of Cheap, stood Mr. Mould's establishment. His Haven, or, in other words, the common sitting room of Mrs. Mould and family, was at the back, over the little counting-house behind the shop abutting on a churchyard, small and shady. In this domestic chamber Mr. Mould now sat; gazing a placid man, upon his parlour and home. If, for a moment at a time, he sought a wider prospect, whereon he might return with fresh zest to these enjoyments, his most glance wandered like a sunbeam through a rural screen of scarlet runners, trained on strings before the window; and he looked down, with an artist's eye, upon the graves.

The partner of his life, and daughters twain, were Mr Mould's companions. Plump as any partridge was Mrs Mould; and Mrs. M. was in proper time the two together. So round and shabby were their fair proportions, that they might have been the bodies once belonging to the angels' faces in the shop below, grown fat, with their heads attached to them mortal. Even their peachy cheeks were puffed out and distended, as though they ought of right to be performing on celestial trumpets. The bodiless cherubs in the shop, who were dusted as constantly blowing those instruments for ever and ever without any bones, played, it is to be presumed, entirely by ear

Mr. Mould looked lovingly at Mrs. Mould, who sat hard by, and was a helpmate to him in his punch as in all other things. Each seraph daughter, too, enjoyed her share of his regards, and smiled upon him in return. So bountiful were Mr Mould's possessions, and so large his stock in trade, that even there, within his household sanctuary, stood a cumbrous screen, whose mahogany back was filled with shrouds, and winding sheets, and other furniture of funerals. But though the Misses Mould had been brought up, as one may say, beneath its eye, it had cast no shadow on their timid infancy or blooming youth. Sporting behind the scenes of death and burial from childhood, the Misses Mould knew better. Hatbands, to them, were but so many yards of silk or crape; a final robe but such a quantity of linen. The Misses Mould could dedilze a player's head, or a court lady's petticoat, or even an act of parliament. But they were not to be taken in by palls. They made them sometimes.

The premises of Mr Mould were but ill of learing to the boisterous noises in the great main streets, and nestled in a quiet corner, where the city strife became a drowsy hum, that sometimes rose and sometimes fell, and sometimes altogether ceased: suggesting to a thoughtful mind a stoppage in Cheapside. The light came sparkling in among the scarlet runners, as if the churchyard winked at Mr. Mould, and said, "We understand each other;" and from the distant soup a pleasant sound arose of coffin-making, with a low, melodious hammer, rat, tat, tat, tat, alike promoting slumber and digestion.

"Quite the buzz of insects," said Mr. Mould, closing his eyes in a perfect luxury. "It puts one in mind of the sound of animated nature in the agricultural districts It's exactly like the woodpecker tapping"

"The woodpecker tapping the hollow elm tree," observed Mrs Mould, adapting the words of the popular melody to the description of wood commonly used in the trade

"Ha, ha!" laughed Mr Mould. "Not at all bad, my dear. We shall be glad to hear from you again, Mrs. M. Hollow elm tree, eh? Ha, ha! Very good indeed. I've seen worse than that in the Sunday papers, my love."

Mrs. Mould, thus encouraged, took a little more of the punch, and handed it to her Daughters, who dutifully followed the example of their mother

"Hollow elm tree, eh?" said Mr. Mould, making a slight motion with his legs, in his enjoyment of the joke. "It's beech in the song. Elm, eh? Yes, to be sure. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my soul, that's one of the best things I know! He was so excessively tickled by the jest that he couldn't forget it, but repeated twenty times, "Elm eh? Yes, to be sure. That somebody who could make a joke at his own trade!

AGED BEGGARMAN.

We resume, from page 101, our characteristic illustrations of Irish life and manners; and shall merely premise that there has scarcely been a period at which it was more important to obtain a precise view of the people of Ireland than at the present moment. Our present sketches, as heretofore, have the guarantee of being the results of recent tours of the artists and authors.

OLD BEGGARMAN.

That poor old beggarman, crippled and bedridden, is one of the most powerfully-drawn pictures in our collection. He is carried about on a half "settle," half stretcher, by neighbour to neighbour, and from door to door. If people have nothing to give him, for 'tis hard to give to all that plant themselves or are dropped down at your door in Ireland, you can at least send him on. Good feeling as well as convenience prompts the suggestion. The old man has his hands closed, and the fingers elevated as if in supplication; and he can say prayers by the yard or the column for the souls of all that ever died of your "kith and kin," if they chance to belong to the faithful departed. Woe betide you if you talk to him about poor-laws and political economy, and drive him away in anger. You will have his curses, in such case, both loud and deep. The beggar's curse in Ireland is deemed as bad as Kehama's, or the excommunication of the church; and before the gate where he drops it the grass is expected to grow before a twelvemonth shall have passed away.

IRISH CAR DRIVERS AND CARS.

Those gentlemen with the dudheens in their mouths are out and out Repealers, you may rest assured. They do not drink whiskey as of yore; so far they have been de-nationalised for the better by Father Mathew. The great Apostle of Temperance would find it very difficult, however, to get the lower orders of the Irish to give up the use of tobacco. At home or abroad, in the field or on the road, Paddy cannot get on without "the blast of the pipe." In wet weather it warms, in hot it cools him, and in both it sends comfort home to a heart which has not got much to cheer it otherwise. The Irish carman or carrier goes through a deal of hardship, and has many a severe night on the road. When he puts up for the night, however, at the Carman's Stage, a name given to "his inn" in Ireland, he forgets the labours of the day in the merry songs and stories that circle round the cheering fire of the common room. His frieze coat is a well-tried and constant friend. In winter, like all great coats, it is of the greatest advantage; but it also lends use for it in summer, when he goes to mass, to fair, market, wedding, and wake, with it tucked up behind on his back, not occupying as high a position as a soldier's knapsack, but considerably lower down, like a Frenchwoman's bustle, and looking just as natural. In the warmest day in July he presents this picturesque appearance. In fact, take Paddy in his freize great coat, and you have him in full dress, as "nate and complayte" in his own opinion, as if he walked out of the last book of the fashions. The Irish jaunting-car, which appears in the background, merits particular attention. The following is Inglis's description of the national vehicle, on which, no doubt, our traveller's bones got many a hearty shaking during his tour through Ireland in 1834:—

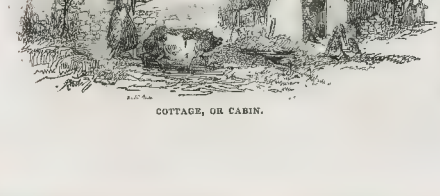
CAR-DRIVERS.

Although there are carriages of all descriptions in Ireland, and coaches too on all the public roads, the jaunting car is the national vehicle, and Ireland would scarcely be Ireland without it. It may be said completely to supersede, as a favourite vehicle, the whole of the gig tribe—tandem, tilbury, cabriolet, &c.—and to be a formidable rival to the coach, as a public conveyance. Throughout the whole of the south, and a great part of the west of Ireland, the public as well as the mails are chiefly conveyed by cars; and it is no small convenience to the traveller that he may travel post, by a car, at eightpence, and in some parts at sixpence per mile throughout Ireland, as expeditiously, and in fine weather far more agreeably, than in a post-chaise. But to return to its peculiarities and precedents, everybody has no doubt seen an Irish car; for a stray specimen now and then makes its appearance across the channel; and I need not therefore tell that an Irish car is a vehicle generally drawn by one horse, and that two, four, or six persons sit back to back. How anything so unseatable should at first be thought of, it is difficult to understand; but it is fair to admit that, when but few persons are seated on a car, there is an easy lounging way of sitting not absolutely prohibitory of social intercourse. The great advantage of an Irish car is the facility of getting up and down, which in travelling on a hilly road is very desirable.

TURF-MARKET, DUBLIN.

There can be no doubt that in a hilly country the car is a great advantage, and in hilly or flat, equally so during the summer months. In Dublin, however, where you can get a "jaunt" and a "set down" in any part of it for a shilling, the advantage does not seem quite so clear, on account of the crowded thoroughfares through which you have to pass. An Englishman seated on one side and the driver on the other, which the latter takes when driving a single fare, instead of the front dickey, to preserve the balance, feels instinctively alarmed for his personal salvation when he observes another car coming up to him from an opposite direction, at a similarly furious rate at which he is going a-head. He transfers his legs rapidly from the foot-board to the cushion, and whilst he is in the act his opponent has passed like a flash of lightning at a close shave. Should the foot-boards meet, the shock is irresistible as a first-rate charge in the lists of chivalry. Both chargers we mean the Dublin hacks—are on their haunches; perhaps the girths are broken. The two unfortunate wayfarers are in the air, or tossed, perhaps, into the wells a neutral space between the seats of their respective vehicles; and the drivers are slashing and swearing at each other with all the fecundity of the national genius, and all the fervour of the national character.

The Dublin carman is unique in his way, and may be looked upon as the most witty of the lower orders in Ireland. Everybody who has seen the late lamented Mr. Matthews "at home," remembers his description of this most particular Irishman. A large three volume budget of fun might be published of the sayings and doings of this extraordinary race of beings; but in the absence of such a desideratum to the mirth-loving traveller in Ireland, we should advise, whilst in Dublin, to step some morning into the police-office which is exclusively dedicated to the litigations of the carmen and their customers. The Dublin carman is exceedingly rejoiced when employed by an Englishman, and for an additional sixpence or shilling to his fare he will afford five times the value in downright drollery, and wit of the sharpest description. The best part of the fun is, that when you think you have caught him in an absurdity, and are about to pin him in a corner, ten to one if he don't "sell you." A traveller was once passing the post-office in Dublin on one of those cars, during a shower of rain, and turning round to the driver, inquired of him what characters the three figures in front, over the portico, were intended to represent? "The twelve apostles, your honour."—"Why, how can that be, they are only three?"—"May be the other three are gone in out of the rain."—"That's only six."—"And may be the rest are helping St. Patrick to sort the letters!"



COTTAGE, OR CABIN.

The origin of the Irish car is unknown, and must remain so until some future Henry O'Brien shall rise up and delight the antiquarian world with an essay on it, as learned as that upon the Round Towers of Ireland. Some say that it came originally from Britain, but it seems just as probable that it was of [illegible] de coche.* Caractacus or Boadicea plagued the Romans, as that it was patronised by any of Ireland's heroes. An [illegible] could do [illegible] fellow-[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] and especially those of the [illegible] [illegible] of the body is [illegible] [illegible] number of them [illegible] out in grand procession to do honour to the wedding; and a carman die, or his wife, or any of his relatives, the cavalcade at the funeral, in which the women and children form the chief feature, is still more numerous.

* The old French term limple de coche, a cart without [illegible] [illegible] observed either on the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] when driven covertly [illegible]

TURF MARKET, DUBLIN.

Turf is retailed for lighting fires, &c., in which mode considerable quantities are used. These two gentlemen who form the principal figures in front of the turf market claim particular attention. They are regulating the knotty point of how many sods a penny, with as much importance and effect as if they consulted about the price of stocks on the Bourse or the Stock Exchange. The chief purchasers are near the banks of the Grand and Royal Canals, whither the turf is transported from the Bog of Allen in kishes or kreels (large baskets) placed on low-backed cars.

COTTAGE, OR CABIN.

The other cabin, into which the young female is driving one "de grege Epicuri" is a degree removed above the miserable hovel which we described and engraved at page 101. The smoke escapes through a hole in the roof. There is a lunganell on one side of the doorway, and a green pool on the other. The children are sitting before the cabin, enjoying the air and the sun after their meagre meal of potatoes, and the pigs is under orders to clear the floor of the peelings which they have scattered about. Pigs, in Ireland, are, in many cases, fed to an enormous size—to effect which, in England, would cost pay for the outlay in provisions [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "THE PERI," AT DRURY LANE THEATRE.

Our artist has chosen the moment when Achmet, waking from a dream of ecstacy, may be supposed to have mentally uttered the following rhapsody to the "sweet enchantment" that had visited his slumbers, and which, in reality, will haunt the memory of every one who has witnessed the "fairy form" and ethereal grace of the sylph who represented the Peri Queen, Mdlle. Carlotta Grisi, in this most beautiful production of the "mutum poema:"—

Stay, beautiful vision; oh! Linger yet
Awhile on my trancèd sight.
Or, if thou must go, let me forget
The charms of the heavenly light
That dwells in those eyes. Forget? oh! never.
Alas, it would prove but vain endeavour
A glimpse of heaven is ne'er forgot.
Stay, beautiful vision! oh, leave me not.

ADELPHI THEATRE

Although the presence of poor Yates no longer sheds its Momus-influence on this Temple of Mirth, where he used to preside as hierophant, yet that of his "better half" still graces the scene, and by her inimitable portraiture of characters belonging to the domestic drama (as leading-mate as any other, in true impersonation and genuine expression of feeling) atones in some degree for what has been her bereavement and our loss. This popular place of entertainment opened last Monday night with a new piece (or rather new adaptation of "The Pearl of Savoy") entitled "Marie," in which the heroine was most admirably represented by Mrs. Yates. Au reste, the piece claims no particular notice. The well-known ballet of "Ondine" followed, introducing to our boards a danseuse of the doubly-charming name of Celeste Stephan. She was much and deservedly applauded; she possesses grace and dexterity, but her pas de fascination had not the potent spell about it with which we have been charmed elsewhere by other magicians. Of the other débûts of the evening the less that is said the better.

SCENE FROM THE NEW PLAY OF "WOMAN," AT COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

In the outline of this beautiful scene we think there is much which resembles one in "Masaniello." The main object of its action is nearly the same—the treatment of the accessories quite the same; but there is a curious felicitas displayed by the author and all connected with the "mise en scene," which has managed to transfer the best features of other plays into this present one, and yet "Woman" being the fair thief, we are obliged to forego all severity of punishment, although we admit the delinquency. The grouping of the multitude who occupy this scene is of the highest order of artistical skill. the line of Beauty Hogarth's curve was never more gracefully drawn than by him or those who had the direction of this procession—the various attitudes, kneeling, standing, walking, &c., are rendered into a most harmonious whole, and taken altogether places the pencil department of Covent Garden, in every sense of the term, in the highest possible degree of artistical respect and admiration.

LABLACHE. This great artiste has recently undergone a severe operation on the alveoli of the jaw, but is now quite recovered, and is on his road, or has already arrived at his magnificent villa near Naples, where he will entertain his daughter and son-in-law, Thalberg, with other relations and friends, previous to his departure for St. Petersburg.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.—At the Privy Council held on Monday at Windsor Castle, it was ordered by her Majesty in Council, that the present Parliament which stands prorogued until Thursday the 19th instant, be further prorogued until Tuesday the 14th day of November next.

THE FUGITIVES FROM CASTLE RUSHEN.—We mentioned last week that six criminals had effected their escape from Castle Rushen, in the Isle of Man, and, having seized the governor's pleasure boat, had put out to sea. Subsequent accounts state that they had landed near Amlweh, in the island of Anglesey, and pursued their course. This led to the recapture of two of them, John Tyrer and William Roberts, alias Trafford. Tyrer subsequently escaped from the constable, and Roberts has been committed to Beaumaris gaol for trial. They are represented as Liverpool thieves of a most accomplished reputation.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

By HENRY COCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "VALENTINE VOX," "STANLEY THORN," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVI.

CONVICTION, FORGIVENESS, AND DEATH

APPREHENSIVE that he should not be in time to take a last farewell of his uncle Charles, immediately on his arrival in England posted up to town, leaving Fred. and Laurece, who was too much exhausted to accompany him, to follow by easy stages.

He therefore about eight in the evening of the day on which the circumstances detailed in the preceding chapter occurred, reached the residence of Sir Arthur, and having ascertained that he was happily still alive, found Caroline with Greville, for whom she had sent for the first time to relate to him the "cruelty" with which she had been treated, and who was then engaged in explaining to her as usual that things must take their course.

Dr. Hawtree was also there, but in the room with Sir Arthur, and Charles, judging from what he had heard, felt that his sudden appearance might have a somewhat serious effect, he sent a servant up to inform the Doctor that a gentleman wished to see him for one moment

Conceiving in an instant who the "gentleman" was—for the message was rather mysteriously delivered—Dr Hawtree immediately followed the servant, and when he found that it was in reality Charles he greeted him with a degree of warmth and gladness which contrasted strongly with Caroline's reception, of which the chief characteristic was the most haughty coldness.

"Well, but where, where, where," cried the Doctor, looking round, "where are Fred. and Mrs. Cleveland?"

Charles explained, and then proceeded to enquire about his uncle, and when he had ascertained as he was anxious to learn, the Doctor promised to send for him anon, and having shaken hands with Greville, returned with a light heart to Sir Arthur.

"Well," and Greville, who appeared to have caught somewhat of the feigned tone of Caroline, "it certainly is a mysterious piece of business that all these things should be thus ordered. Who would have thought now—who could have thought—when we parted, that you would have to go through so much. It is such things as these that establish the wisdom of keeping matters in the dark until they are actually brought to light, because nothing can be clearer than that had you known what was about to occur you would not only not have gone if you could have helped it, but your troubles would have been ten times greater by anticipation."

"Very true," returned Charles, who had then neither spirit nor inclination to oppose him, "Very true."

"Oh," cried Greville, "then you have come into my way of thinking at last. I knew you would.—I knew you only wanted a little more experience to see this great principle clearly."

Charles was now summoned, and went to his uncle's room, but instead of finding him as he expected lying helpless on his back, pale and haggard, he found him sitting up with his arms extended, his cheeks deeply flushed, and his eyes sparkling with unwonted lustre.

"My boy"—he cried, embracing him with the fondness of a father, and as he did so tears of joy streamed from the eyes of both. "My dear boy now I am happy—quite happy. Oh how I have longed for this moment," he added fervently. "But it has come. My prayers have been heard. Thank God! it has come."

"My kind, good uncle," said Charles, having gazed upon him for some time in silence, mingling his professional acumen with his warm private feelings, "I am now one of your physicians."

"You are a physician indeed" replied Sir Arthur, "you have nearly restored me already; I feel now almost well,—quite another man—quite—quite."

His strength, however, the next moment failed; his head drooped, the flush vanished, his eyes became dim, and he sank upon the breast of Charles perfectly exhausted.

Having carefully transferred his head to the pillow, Charles held a professional consultation with Dr. Hawtree, the result of which was that they decided on sitting up together that night, it being abundantly manifest to them that unless some very favourable change occurred which was scarcely anticipated, but of which, if it did occur, immediate advantage ought to be taken that night would be Sir Arthur's last.

Being anxious, however, to communicate to Alice the intelligence of Fred.'s safe arrival in England, Dr. Hawtree left Charles—in whose judgment he had the highest confidence—promising to return about twelve.

His departure was, of course, known to Caroline, and as Charles was then with Sir Arthur alone, she, conceiving that the first opportunity would be embraced to denounce her, sent Greville up cautiously in order to ascertain how Sir Arthur was then, but in reality with the view of seeing what they were about, and what arrangements had been made for the night.

Greville accordingly proceeded to the chamber, and found Sir Arthur dozing, with Charles by his side most anxiously watching his pulse. As he entered, Charles raised his hand to enjoin silence, and he therefore approached with the utmost caution, and sitting down close by, said in an almost inaudible whisper, "How is he now?"

"Take her away" cried Sir Arthur faintly, conceiving that Caroline had entered, "take her away! Do not let her come near me!"

"It is only Mr Greville," said Charles, "no one else."

"Oh," cried Sir Arthur still more faintly, "Greville!" he added, feebly extending his hand "and Greville took his hand and pressed it in silence; and in silence they continued until Sir Arthur fell asleep, when Charles explained what arrangements had been made, and expressed his fear that in a few hours all would be over Having obtained this information Greville softly retired, and, when he related to Caroline all that had occurred, she coolly fell upon the expediency of Greville sitting up with Dr Hawtree and Charles.

"But my dear,"—cried Greville, who really did not much approve of this notion—"what can I do? things must take their course."

"Thus you tell me," said Caroline earnestly, "as expected to be his last night—his last. It will, therefore, be the only night on which he will have the power to denounce me to Charles as that which I am not. Waste not one present I shall not be thus denounced—you must, therefore, remain."

"Well, but how can I prevent it? What can I say?"

"Your presence will alone be sufficient. It will operate upon them as a check, if it should do nothing else."

"Oh! they'll say nothing about you! Besides, my dear, I don't like sitting up all night. It don't agree with me—you know it never did."

"Am I, or am I not, father, to regard you as a friend?"

"Now don't fly into a passion, my dear, because I say you know will make things unpleasant. If I am to stop, why I must sit up!—we need say no more about the matter. I know that things must take their course, and that's sufficient."

"And of that base person—that Charles—should dare to say a single word against me, I expect, father, that you will speak like a man."

"Of course I shall. But I don't see how I can help it."

"You do not know him. I do! I consider him base enough for anything, and hence it is that I hate him."

"Well, my dear, well, you know best: we cannot account for these things: we cannot tell why some are base and others generous. We didn't make the world, and therefore cannot be expected to solve these mysteries."

"Now do not talk nonsense, father! really I have no patience with you."

"Nonsense, my dear? Well, philosophy does appear to be nonsense to those who do not study philosophy."

"We were not speaking of philosophy."

"Well, well, well. But you are so passionate! There's no accounting for it, but really I never—"

"Now do not let us dwell upon anything ridiculous. Sir Arthur is awake again by this time doubtless, and, therefore, you had better go up now."

"What now?"

"Yes now."

"What before Dr. Hawtree comes?"

"Certainly. I'll send to tell them you are coming home, therefore go up at once."

"Well!" said Greville, with an air of resignation, "I didn't expect it, but as it is so it is why it must be so."

He then returned to Sir Arthur's chamber, and having signified to Charles that, under existing circumstances, it was his intention to sit up with him and Dr Hawtree, he sank into an easy chair and fell fast asleep.

Punctually at twelve, Dr. Hawtree returned; but Greville still slept soundly, and as it was held to be anything but necessary to disturb him, he continued to sleep throughout the night.

Sir Arthur was, however, extremely restless. He scarcely indeed slept at all. He hourly got worse rather, and every hour it became more manifest that his days were numbered. Nothing could sustain him was done but no favourable change could be produced. He kept Charles's hand locked constantly in his, and seemed to derive from it great consolation, but he gradually grew weaker until seven o'clock, when, as a last resource, a medicine was administered, which, aided by stimulation, induced repose.

Soon after this took place another, and appeared to be precisely a repetition of the first of what having then slept so profoundly and so long, he had, notwithstanding, some refreshment with Charles and Dr. Hawtree, and then, having ascertained that Caroline was at breakfast, he went down to communicate the result of his night's watching to her.

"Well, father," said Caroline, "how is he?"

Greville shook his head.

"What" she exclaimed, starting

"No, no, no—don't be so impetuous, my dear—I mean he's very bad."

"Father! why do you not say what you mean. Is he worse?"

"Much worse—much worse indeed."

"Then I must see him: I must speak to him now"

"You cannot now, my dear, you sleeping"

"Has he been awake much during the night?"

"He scarcely closed his eyes."

"And did he speak of me?"

"I have not even heard your name mentioned"

"That's well. Then I'll go to him the moment he awakes. Let me know"

Upon this she had finely resolved. Conscious of having been guilty of indiscretion on occasions of having been ingratefol if not cruel, reflection had prompted her to solicit his forgiveness, and by solemn assurances to convince him, if possible, of the fact of her being innocent of the grand crime of which she had been accused.

In the meantime, Sir Arthur slept lightly, yet calmly, and on awaking manifested symptoms of a change. Scarcely favourable to relinquire hope. Tranquility the most perfect, however, was essential: nothing but that could save him then; his life hung by a thread. When the slightest excitement would snap, and when this had become most apparent, Caroline sent up a message by Greville to the effect that she was anxious to speak to Sir Arthur, and would of necessity not him.

When Greville had delivered this message, Charles, at the suggestion of Dr Hawtree, went to her with the view of explaining that such an interview then would be immediately fatal

"Let me beg of you," said he, with the most perfect calmness, "not to disturb him now."

"I have no desire to disturb him," she replied; "that is not my object."

"But I assure you the slightest excitement now will produce immediate death"

"And how do you know that my presence will be the cause of excitement"

"I will say that it is possible"

"What right have you to assume it to be possible?"

"Surely, I need not explain"

"But I demand an explanation"

"At a more proper time, Lady Cleveland, I will satisfy that demand"

"I perceive," rejoined Caroline, contemptuously; "oh, I perceive. Your ear has been poisoned."

"Will not enter into that now."

"But I will enter into it now. This is a trick to keep me from him until he is no more."

"No, Lady Cleveland, upon my honour."

"My father tells me that the danger is immediate"

"It will be a very painful—very painful—to me entreat you to wait but a short time longer, and I will myself lead you to him, and endeavour to effect a reconciliation."

"Sir, I need not your kind offices. I know you too well. I see your design clearly. When he is dead you will lead me by the hand, and endeavour to effect a reconciliation. I'll not have it—I'll see him now."

"Really, Lady Cleveland, I cannot consent to it."

"You cannot consent to it! Pray, sir, who asked your consent? Your consent, I apprehend, is not absolutely necessary?"

"In this case, Lady Cleveland, it is. If I were his professional attendant merely, I would oppose it: as he is my uncle he shall not be disturbed."

"Shall not. You forget, sir, that I am mistress here!"

"No, madam, no! I cannot forget that. Where are you going?" he added, as Caroline approached the door with an angry countenance.

"To my husband, sir!" she replied haughtily.

"Indeed, Lady Cleveland, you must not go."

"Must not, sir! I will"

"Madam, you shall not pass this door."

"Insolence!"

"Pray, do not attempt to complete that work which you have unhappily begun."

"Insolence! I stand aside!"

"Madam, I will not suffer you to pass"

"You will not suffer me Wretch!"

"Madam, I am firm"

"Firm!" she echoed, scornfully, as she rang the bell with violence. "Your firmness shall soon be tested. Am I to be insulted by a poor, weak, sickly-looking creature like you! I shall be turned out of my own house next, I suppose! Oh! this is a deep scheme William," she added, fiercely, as the servant entered, "remove that person from the door"

The servant looked at the "person," and then looked at her.

"Remove him, I say"

"Remove him, I say," repeated the servant, who could not understand it.

"Must not leave Mr. Charles"

"Remove him immediately, I desire you"

"Mr. Charles, my lady—"

"Fool! are you to obey me or him?"

"I must not leave Mr. Charles! I wouldn't do it for the world"

"Out of my sight!" cried Caroline, trembling with passion, and the servant was about to vanish, when Charles said, "Stay, tell Mr. Greville that I want him immediately. Why should not make the slightest noise. Even your own servant," he added, turning to Caroline, "is on the side of truth."

"Silence! How dare you talk to me!"

"Oh, be tranquil, madam, do. Suffer passion to humble your pride."

"Silence, I command you! I'll not allow myself to be thus insulted. I see how it is I see it all clearly! And you flatter yourself that I am defeated."

"I do believe that you are nearly friendless: but why, why are you so? You are the wife of my uncle! the kindest man that ever breathed—he is now on his death-bed, and yet you his wife, the wife whom he adored, wasted on nothing but last moments, are not suffered to go near him! Reflect upon that and rush with shame."

"Father!" exclaimed Caroline, rushing into the room as he entered, "Father!" she repeated, and fell upon his neck in tears.

"Mad, Greville," said Charles, "I've know the state in which my uncle now lies: I therefore, must beg of you to prevail upon Lady Cleveland to make no attempt to disturb him. I have promised that she shall see him in a short time—say within an hour—I repeat that promise, and will perform it."

"I know you will," said Greville, "I know you will: but you he has been enquiring for you anxiously, sir."

"Lady Cleveland," said Charles, "you have forced me to be severe; but my uncle's life is dearer to me than existence"

He then returned to the chamber, and soon perceived that, during his absence, an unfavourable change had taken place. Sir Arthur was still calm and conscious, but death was approaching stealthily, and so gently did it come that he knew not the moment.

"Charles," said he, in a feeble tone, "come nearer to me, nearer. Charles, I now begin to feel I soon must say farewell. But tell them I am not afraid to die: tell me, is my recovery hopeless? Do not deceive me—is it?"

"I fear, dear uncle," replied Charles, mournfully, "I fear—"

"Do not grieve, I feel that it is so. Caroline—" he added, suddenly—"I wish to see her, Charles"

"She is most anxious to see you"

"Yes—yes—yes. I then shall die in peace. Take care of her when I am gone: you promise to take care of her"

"I do"

"Then, let me see her now. But do not leave me, Charles: you must not leave me"

Charles turned and left the room. He had briefly intimated to her that for Sir Arthur's wish, the Doctor left the room, for the purpose of bringing Caroline up, and shortly returned with her, followed by Greville

As she approached him in tears, Dr. Hawtree and Greville retired to the dressing-room, and Charles was about to follow, but Sir Arthur still held his hand, and wished him to remain.

"Caroline," said he in a mournful accents, "I have vow to bid you farewell"

"My husband," cried Caroline, as Charles gave him the hand which held his, and which she bathed with her tears

"Oh!" said Sir Arthur "how happy we might have been, Caroline!"

"Had it not been for our destruction," she exclaimed, "our mutual enemies!—the destroyers of your happiness and mine. Oh, why did you suffer yourself to be thus abused? Why did you shut on your heart to the conviction of my fidelity? The crime imputed to me is one which I abhor."

"And of that crime—"

"I am innocent," she exclaimed, falling upon her knees and clasping her hands fervently, "innocent as I hope to be saved"

"Dear uncle," said Charles, as he raised her, "believe that she is—be sure of it!"

Sir Arthur wept and pressed her hand warmly and kissed it: but could not speak.

"Receive this state," continued Caroline "at once from your magnanimity. It is true, dear husband, that I have much neglected you—true that I have been guilty of ingratitude and indiscretion, for which I now crave your forgiveness, but of no crime with which I am charged I again call on you solemnly to declare that I am standing at the awful gulf in the presence of Him before whose throne you are about to appear—that I am innocent"

"Caroline!" cried Sir Arthur in tears, "I do—I do believe!" and clasping her to his heart he expired.

To be continued Weekly.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Like the working out of an artistically designed plot, as the racing season draws towards the denouement it grows in interest and importance. The two latest of the autumnal meetings at Newmarket abound in the promise of excellent sport;—in the assurance of its materiel. To the dearth of anything in operation on the turf, of sufficient account to deserve record, the September meeting forms a second October week, which commences on Monday, may be conveniently put forth. This meeting extends to five days—and by good policy the most practically interesting matches are appointed for the second and last, namely, the Clearwell for Tuesday, and the Derby for Wednesday. To the first, however, with the beginning: on Monday there are ten events on the cards, of minor attraction it is true, but still good enough to ensure betting.

Match and non—and very probably some good running. Tuesday will be the great day, with its Cesarewitch, a handicap, in which all present speculation centres; the Royal Stakes, with a dozen three year olds named for it, among them being Cotherstone. As winner of the 2,000 Guinea Stakes, and the Derby, he will have to carry 10lbs. extra; therefore, of course, we shall have a "spin" for it, as it must be worth £1,225, and may be a round £1,500. The field, however, is a very indifferent one, and barring he falls or throws it away, there is nothing to beat his chance. The Clearwell we will speak of in conjunction with its fellow two year old, the Prendergast, presently. The Bretby, a two yearold filley Stakes: two matches, the Town Plate and the Outlands, constitute Wednesday's list. For the first of them the Princess is infinitely the best public performer, especially as the course, three quarters of a mile, is just her distance. Thursday will give us five or six races—among them a couple of matches: a two year old Sweepstakes and a £100 Handicap, sure to fill. On Friday will come off the Biennial, and the Cambridgeshire: there is always a certainty of plenty of racing upon the last days of the last week.

The two great Two-year-old Stakes will overflow with interest, bringing together, as they probably will, most of the Derby favourite for next year. In this Clearwell are, of the lot already entered for Epsom, Joe Lovell, Zenobia, Voltri, the Wadastra colt, and others; in the Prendergast,—Leander, Zenobia, Joe Lovell, Slanderer, Orlando, the Wadastra colt, &c., &c. The one-and-twenty horses have been down upon the various lists for the Derby: there is always a month will settle the field for winter investments, so far as the public horses will form a portion of it. The Ugly Buck, Seaport, Foig-a-Ballagh, Voltri—the cream of the Derby lot are all in the Criterion, so that if they show or if, we shall have an extraordinary line for the next year. Two of the matches for the coming week have declared forfeit, viz., that between Faruntosh and sister to Patlander, in which the sister to Cesarewitch, and the lot already entered for Epsom, Joe Lovell, Zenobia, Voltri, the Wadastra colt, and others; in the Prendergast,—Leander, Zenobia, Joe Lovell, Slanderer, Orlando, the Wadastra colt, &c., &c. The one-and-twenty horses have been down upon the various lists for the Derby: there is always a month will settle the field for winter investments, so far as the public horses will form a portion of it. The Ugly Buck, Seaport, Foig-a-Ballagh, Voltri—the cream of the Derby lot are all in the Criterion, so that if they show or if, we shall have an extraordinary line for the next year. Two of the matches for the coming week have declared forfeit, viz., that between Faruntosh and sister to Patlander, in which the odds were 5 to 1 against the Clearwell colt, and that between Captain Cook and the Retriever colt—the Captain receiving. The 1000 Sov. Match A.F. between Captain Cook and Chortoonian will be run, as it is "for all the money." Of the Cesarewitch, with which the betters are so busy, it does not become the journalist to anticipate more than the sport it ought to afford. Yet here is a handicap for which hard upon a hundred horses were weighted, and for which any one will, no doubt, be backed at, or under, 5 to 1 on the day. Sixteen have already been negotiated, and we may look for many more novelties before the race is determined. The meeting to which these remarks apply, is one of the best Second October weeks—so far as the matter set down for decision is to be taken as a criterion—that Newmarket has put upon the scene for very many anniversaries.

BETTING.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

SALE OF THE EARL OF CARDIGAN'S HUNTING STUD.—On Monday last the valuable hunting stud of the above nobleman, reducing his establishment, was sold by auction by Messrs Tattersall at Hyde Park Corner. The Earl of Rosslyn, master of the buckhounds, and Hernandez, the celebrated Spanish rider, were present. Between 5 and 6,000 guineas is the sale. We subjoin the prices at which the horses were sold:—Jacopo was knocked down at 95 guineas; the Baron (for which the Earl gave 400 guineas), at 105 dito; Triptrace, 54 dito; Clown, 100 dito; Astonidon, 94 dito; Radical (bought by the Earl of Rosslyn), 160 dito; Windfall, 105 dito; Waterwitch, 105 dito; Benefield, 200 dito; Beggar Boy, 260 dito; Brush, 170 dito, Chaff, 160 dito; and Master Johnson, 125 dito. Some of the above lots were bought in. A draft from Lord George Bentinck's racing stud was also sold, consisting of Trustee, Alice Hawthorn, and Miss Jessica, which were the property of Lord Goodwood; Physog, &c., some of which, it was understood, were purchased by the East India Company.

GRAND RUNNING MATCH BETWEEN THE FOUR CHAMPIONS OF ENGLAND.—The match, which has excited so much interest in the sporting world, came off at Reading, on Monday last, in Sonning Meadows, under excellent arrangements. Lee, the champion of Lancashire; Maxwell, from Sheffield; and Sheppard, from Birmingham. The distance was one mile, three times round the course and back, making two miles. Maxwell, however, took the start for the first heat took place, which was accomplished in four minutes and fifty seconds; Sheppard a winning eight yards, Byrne third, and Lee fourth. In the second heat Lee then having rested about three-quarters of an hour, the second heat took place. Byrne took the lead once round, when it was taken up by Sheppard, and maintained by him throughout, winning by eight yards, Maxwell second, Wild third, Harrison fourth. The next was accomplished in four minutes and fifty three seconds.

HERE SPEAKING IS TREASON.—Lord Palmerston has purchased some of the best deer at Waterstown, Captain Bringhurst, 30th Regiment, volunteered to shoot one of them. A keeper from a neighbouring gentleman's estate, who was one of the party to be shot, left the enclosure at Waterstown, to witness this exploit. Captain Bringhurst had his short rifle with a sling; and acting on the advice of him who thinner Chertcot-park of "the noblest deer," dropped the muzzle of his rifle at his left breast when he fired and as the "noblest animal not he all killed," the head was his mark; but the swift star been down his branching head, and the ball passed over it and the back, fracture the tail, but second shot was more successful, for with it he broke his jaw-bone, which made the game more wary Having missed the third and fourth shots, the late Captain Robert Hancock, R.N., then asked for a shot, and, taking the rifle, galloped after the last to the farthest part of the park, where an extraordinary occurrence took place. Another buck singled out the wounded one and rushed at him with great fierceness, and he never stood over him. As soon as the buck sank, until Captain Hancock rode up, and as fifty yards gave him the coup de grace, the ball struck him under the ear, on which the deer never rose.

GRAND TROTTING MATCH FOR 200 GUINEAS.—Hatcham Park was the scene chosen to decide this interesting event, on account of its proximity to town, and on Wednesday a very large assemblage of the patrons of this description of racing took place to witness the affair. The match was between Mr Gill's celebrated horse Confidence, and Mr Russell's Rocaster, a distance of two miles, to be performed between Hatcham and the Rockingham Race Course, Confidence giving his opponent 200 yards at starting. At about five o'clock the horses were brought to the post, and at that time, notwithstanding the unfavourable state of the weather, the old horse was the favourite at 6 and 8 to 4; and in the first mile he did not disappoint the good opinion of his friends, gaining considerably upon his adversary, but in the second he was observed to flag, requiring the aid of voice and whip to keep him to his pace, and eventually losing the race by about 70 yards. The winner was driven by Mr. Burke, and Confidence by his owner; and the time was named in accordance with the above result in seconds.

THE Brighton harriers will meet on Monday, the 9th inst., at Thunder's Barrow (back of Portslade), at half past ten, being the first public meet of the season. The hounds have continued morning hunting for some weeks, notwithstanding the heatdness of the ground, and have had several good runs, and have killed their fox in the open, which has given them into good condition, and the master will be well repaid by a gallop with them over our unrivalled Downs. The hounds are under the management of the huntsman and the Duchess's keeper, perhaps, he met with in the neighbourhood of any other town in England The latter pack have not yet taken the field

LICENSED VICTUALLERS' SCHOOL.—On Tuesday afternoon there took place at the School-house, Kennington-lane, the interesting ceremony of industrie into the school the eighteen boys and twelve girls elected a fortnight ago, and now placed on the establishment, in addition to the large number previously maintained, clothed, and educated there. The gratifying proceedings were in the presence of the Governor (Mr. Keasley), the Trustees, and Committee of the Incorporated Society of Licensed Victuallers, many of the friends of the children attended, as well as of the relatives and friends of the recently elected children. The scene was animated and affecting.

COMMITTAL OF PRISONERS FOR TRIAL AT THE CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.— No. 1. Return of the number of Middlesex prisoners committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court, from 1835 to 1843 inclusive, by police and county magistrates, with the result of the cases:—No. 2. Similar return of the number committed by city magistrates. No. 1. Middlesex.—Committed, 18,311; convicted, 13,623; acquitted, 3,150; bills ignored, 1,539; no prosecutions, 43 No. 2. London.—Committed, 3,487; convicted, 2,819; acquitted, 414; bills ignored, 144; no prosecutions 17. Middlesex committals.—Per centage of acquittals to committals, 24; per centage of bills ignored to committals, 7. London Committals. Per centage of acquittals to committals 18; per centage of bills ignored to committals, 4. The above returns, of the correctness of which there is no doubt, form, in the opinion of those who feel such an interest in the important subject to which they refer as to examine the returns minutely, a strong argument in favour of the present paid magistracy, a strong argument in favour of the latter body, who are elected by their fellow citizens.

ACCIDENT TO ONE OF THE POSTILIONS OF THE GRAND DUKE OF RUSSIA.—As the carriage and four in which was his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael was turning the corner, on Tuesday afternoon, from the High street to Castle-hall, Windsor, in its progress to the royal residence, the near-horse, on which one of the postilions was riding, slipped down, throwing his rider with considerable force upon the paved road. The poor fellow was so completely entangled with the traces (the leaders still dragging the carriage after them), that it was fully expected the wheels of the vehicle must have passed over his head. As he lay on the ground in this perilous position, the fallen horse made a desperate plunge, and kicked the man (without very severely injuring him) completely out of further harm's way. After some little delay the horse was got up, and the carriage with his Imperial Highness proceeded to the palace of the Sovereign.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Saturday last as a man named Honen who was engaged in some works now in progress at Sir J. Reume's, was in the act of raising a heavy piece of timber to the roof by means of a jack screw, the screw by some means accidentally slipped, and, losing its hold, he fell backwards from the plank on which he was standing, and was precipitated from the second to the first floor, in his descent striking the back of his head against one of the timbers with fearful violence. A surgeon was immediately sent for, who pronounced life to be quite extinct, a concussion of the brain having been the result of the fall. The unfortunate man has left a widow and four young children.

ACCIDENT TO THE CITY OF EDINBURGH STEAMER.—On Monday afternoon, when the above steamer was waiting at Herne-bay for passengers, an escape of steam took place; and it was supposed to have arisen from the mud door of the boiler having become accidentally slipped, and, losing its hold, he fell backwards from the plank on which he was standing, and was precipitated from the second to the first floor, in his descent striking the back of his head against one of the timbers with fearful violence. A surgeon was immediately sent for, who pronounced life to be quite extinct, a concussion of the brain having been the result of the fall. The unfortunate man has left a widow and four young children.

A surgeon was immediately sent for, who pronounced life to be quite extinct, a concussion of the brain having been the result of the fall. The unfortunate man has left a widow and four young children.

DEPLORABLE ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday afternoon a poor widow woman named Martin, residing in Pear tree-street, Grey's Inn-lane, went out to a job or char-work, leaving Emma, her eldest daughter, to take care of two younger sisters, of the respective ages of four and two years old. The mother had not been gone long when the most violent screams were heard issuing from the room in which they were locked, the door of which was immediately burst open, and the eldest girl was found enveloped in flames, crouching in one corner of the room; happily neither of the younger sisters was injured. The poor little sufferer was immediately conveyed to the Royal Free Hospital, in the Gray's Inn road, where every assistance was promptly rendered, but from the injuries received very little hopes are entertained of her recovery.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—On Tuesday the body of James Miller, the apprentice of Mr. John Goalby, of Stangate, Lambeth, mast, oar, and sculling maker, who, with a young female named Emily Rowan, an orphan, were drowned on Sunday night last by the upsetting of a skiff on the river opposite to Chelsea College, was found, left up the tide, on the shore facing the gas-works at Vauxhall. The face was frightfully mutilated by being, as it is supposed, jammed between the barges. The body was discovered by Collier, a waterman, and brought by him to the last to Mr. Goalby's premises, and having been identified, was removed to the vaults of St. John's Church, Waterloo-road, to await the holding of the Coroner's Inquest. No tidings of the body of the female have as yet been obtained. The two other apprentices in the skiff with the unfortunate deceased, and providentially escaped a watery grave, are in a fair way of recovery.

SINGULAR AND FATAL ACCIDENT.—On Monday last a seaman, named John Mowsey, fell from the lower deck of the ship Alcestis into the river Mersey. Singular, but shocking to relate, it was found, when he was picked up, that he had struck against something in his fall which had cut off his leg clean at the knee. The wound was also slightly injured in several places. A surgeon was immediately called in, but the body was quite cold. The act appears to have been most determined, as she was obliged to bend her knees to effect her purpose.

HOUSEBREAKERS BY FEE-NEMBED LIVERY SERVANTS.—It is stated that an organised gang of thieves are now prowling about town, disguised in the garb of livery servants. These fellows are dressed in the garb of "liquors," grooms, and footmen, and, it is said, are headed by one of the detective force, a Marylebone office, that their system of plunder has been eminently successful. At about half-past one on Wednesday, a supposed livery servant carried off three ladies' cloaks, of a very valuable description, from the front of the bazaar in Cranbourn-street.

AN OMNIBUS BROTH.—On Tuesday night, as a dark-coloured Hackney omnibus was driving sharply out of Regent-street into New Bond-street, a poor woman who was crossing the end of the street, was knocked down by one of the horses, but the wheels fortunately escaped her. The driver, who witnessed the occurrence, and saw the poor creature lying on the ground, stopped his horses and galloped off at a furious rate. The woman was conveyed to a surgeon's by a policeman.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

HER MAJESTY'S troop ship Queen, which recently left Portsmouth with men for the 4th Regt. receiving a portion of the detachment of the 4th Regt. which took part in the Scinde campaign, and two bankers' corks, all private soldiers, and all belonging to the 9th Regiment of Lancers, now quartered in Calcutta.

MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.—On Monday last forty invalids, belonging to the 44th, 49th, 18th, 28th, 38th, and 8th Regiments, under the command of a lieutenant of the 44th, embarked from the Sir Wm. Meuey at Gravesend, after a fine voyage of six months all but seven days, and constituting a detachment from Chatham. Upwards of forty were left during the passage, and the remainder are attached to the invalid depot at Fort Pitt. The men have expressed much of the treatment they received on the passage from the captain of the ship, with regard to provisions, &c., and have demanded a court of inquiry to investigate the facts of the case. Efforts have been made to compromise the matter with them, but without success.

ADMIRALTY.—An order has been issued by the Commissioners of the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, requiring all pensioners of that establishment to march it appears that the pensioners were annually to receive pensions residing within the limits of London, and Middlesex are to receive their pensions at the Hospital on the 26th of every month, and in consequence of a statement put forth to the effect that taking part in the agitation now going on for the Repeal of the Union with Ireland will, in equality any person from receiving his pension. It is not that an order of such a nature had been issued, although not by any means in a public form, or in a way calculated to put any who might unconsciously offend on their guard, but as statements that several have been struck off the pension at Liverpool be true, it is evident that it is not intended even to give any cast on on the subject: for certainly the opinion of no human being would justify the fixing of the pension list upon any other footing than that which it was originally established upon.

THE Master-General of the Ordnance has given directions for the erection of temporary barracks at Carmarthen, the expense of which is to be defrayed by public subscription from the resident gentry of the town and county. The requisite funds have already been raised.

DEATH OF LIEUTENANT-GENERAL BENSON, R.A.—The distinguished artillery officer expired at Chatsgrove on Wednesday fortnight. The deceased served in Flanders in the campaign of 1793, 1794, and 1795, and in 1801 was actively employed in Egypt, and for his services there he was rewarded with a medal. He subsequently took part in the memorable war in the Peninsula, and particularly in 1808 and the following year, under the gallant General Sir David Baird.

The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have issued instructions for building two new 12 gun brigs, to be named Daring and Dwarf, after vessels of the same name. Cape Spartivento and Zante—The Queen, 110, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral Sir E. W. C. R. Owen, Bart., K.C.B., commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean, and Vesuvius war-steamer, at Corfu—The Magicienne, 24 ; L'Aigle, 24, and on her way from thence to Malta, the Polyphemus steam-packet. At the Firness of Clyde—The Rodney, 90, Captain Sir Stephen Lushington, at Plymouth, the Minden, 72; Leander, 50, and Alecto steam packet. At Barcelona—The Scout, 18; and Savage, 10. On her way to England The Medina, 84; and at Tunis, the Retribution, 4.

PORTSMOUTH, Oct. 5.—The Pylades, 18, Commander Louis S. Tindal, has arrived at Plymouth, from China and the East Indies. She is ordered round to Sheerness, to be paid off The Cygnet, 6, Lieutenant-Commander Edward Wilson, has arrived here yesterday from the coast of Africa. She is to be paid off, and will proceed to Sheerness for that purpose The Beagle, surveying-vessel, which anchored at Spithead on Saturday, after an absence of upwards of four years, has proceeded round to Woolwich, where she will be paid off. The Fawn-brig, 8, Captain Hy Pring, and the Acorn, 18, Commander John Adams, have both come home from the Mediterranean, and are ordered into ordinary. The Rodney, 90, Captain E. Maunsell, is hourly expected here from the Cape of Good Hope. Orders have been received to pay her off at Sheerness on her arrival. There are no defects for recommission without delay. The Victoria and Albert, her Majesty's royal steam yacht, will leave Woolwich in the course of a week, and proceed to Sheerness, where she will be laid up for the winter. She has undergone a thorough repair of the boats' decks and bulwarks, and will be turned over to her tender the Nautilus. The Monarch, 84, Captain Samuel Chambers, is on her account been brought forward for sea with all despatch, and will proceed to the coast of Africa, to which he was ordered when on that station, in command of the Viper, and which has since repeatedly attacked him on this country. The story of the first lieutenant having taken the command upon himself in all semester, there being no such officer, nor, in fact, any lieutenant on board the Leopard. [The story above alluded to will be found under the head of Irish intelligence.]

graceful punishment of being flogged at the Barracks' Riding School, Ipswich, a few days since. It appears the offence of the unfortunate man, who is an Irishman of the name of Dogherty, was threatening to shoot his corporal; thus being the second time of his uttering the threat. The fortitude with which he received his dreadful punishment was astonishing —having received 140 lashes without a groan or a cry of agony escaping his lips. He was afterwards conveyed to the hospital, where he is in a fair way of recovery.

NAVAL INTELLIGENCE AND MOVEMENTS OF MAILS, SITCE S. —Up to day of the Medea we learn that the Queen, bearing the flag of Vice-Admiral , at Owen, with the Indian in company (which left Malta on the 16th) were yesterday (the 7th) at two p.m., between Cape Spartivento and the island of Zante. The Vesuvius had previously arrived on the 21st, in the morning, and was again despatched the same evening to accompany to the Admiral the news brought by the Tagus, on the 19th, of the revolution at Athens. From the moment of leaving Malta, up to the latest accounts, the wind has been always fair and favourable, and for the Admiral's working to windward it would appear he had the view a destination in that direction, though a report prevailed on board that he would be here to Malta on the 30th. In all probability he would not touch at Athens on the Vesuvius rejoining him. The Tagus proceeded on her voyage to England on the 19th, with a full cargo of silk and figs, and several passengers. The Medea arrived the morning from Bandonn and Mahon. An extraordinary departure of a French steamer takes p to-day for Marseilles, in consequence of some important despatches which have just arrived by the French steamer for the French government, by which opportunity I noticed, I presume, to send the present letter, for no mail is made up. Since writing the above, the Hecla, English war steamer, has been despatched to the westward with sealed orders.—Exchange.

First Lieutenant H. Craigie, Royal Marines, from the Queen to the Monarch, second Lieutenant A. Butcher, from the Monarch to the Queen. Naval Instructors—John Mc-Millon, from the Monarch to the Indus; Alex. Gerard, from the Indus to the Monarch.

HER MAJESTY'S SHOOT FANTOME.—A letter has been received from Captain Haynes, commander of Her Majesty's sloop Fantome, announcing the pleasing intelligence that, after the greatest exertions, her Majesty's ship has not only been recovered, but that she has been surveyed, and reported in a fit state either to proceed to sea herself, or into the Vasiliere (her original destination), or return to England, as the commodore on the station may think fit. Captain Hayne's letter is dated July 15, from Monte Video, at which period her Majesty's ship was ready for sea.

DEPARTURE OF THE FLEET FROM COVE. At an early hour on (Saturday morning her Majesty's ships St. Vincent, Caledonia, and Canopus were under way off Cove harbour, and anchored nearly opposite the light house till evening, when they proceeded on a cruize. On Sunday morning the Majesty's steam-ship Penelope, one of the largest, if not the largest in the service, entered the harbour, and in the course of the day was visited by hundreds, who admired this stupendous specimen of naval architecture. A naval court-martial was held on Saturday, on board the St. Vincent, on Robert Taylor, a sailor of the Majesty's ship Isis, who, whilst in a state of intoxication, on Tuesday, threatened his captain, called him a tyrant, and said he did not care a ——— for him. Admiral Bailey was president of the court. Taylor has served many years, and his character stood well with his officers. It is supposed that he will be transported.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

DISASTROUS SHIPWRECKS. FIVE VESSELS LOST AND LOSS OF LIFE.

Information was received at Lloyd's Coffee house on Monday of the loss of the undermentioned vessels:—The schooner Princess Augusta of Lunenberg, during very rough weather, capsized, at about fifty miles west of Cape Sable. The crew, consisting of five persons, having excellent swimmers, succeeded in regaining the vessel, and remaining on the keel, by lashing themselves to the rigging. The vessel was soon washed overboard. One of the crew, a young man named James Spanagle, was the only person who was saved, and he was picked up by a vessel in a very exhausted state, having been on the wreck five days without any sustenance.

The Caledonian (an American ship). During a dreadful storm on the 14th of last month, at eight o'clock in the evening, the splendid vessel, which was on her voyage from New York for Cette, endeavoured to escape the fury of the storm by taking shelter in the bay; but owing to the violence of the storm was obliged to anchor by another way, namely, the usual passage, where she struck and lost her rudder, by which she became unmanageable, and after having drifted for some time, at length struck on the rocks and went to pieces. Fortunately, the whole of the crew were saved.

The Alice, of Neola Shields, struck on a rock near Bridsand, coast of Norway, whilst on her passage from Archangel to London, on the 7th of last month. It appears that the master and crew remained with the vessel two days and two nights, when she was got off the rock with three feet of water in her hold and in a rapidly sinking state, when the Hannah Moore, Captain Hinchburn, from Ganga for London, happened to be passing and took the crew and master on board. It is expected that the master of the Alice (Mr. Kennedy) and the vessel will set on fire previous to leaving, in order to remove so dangerous an impediment as she would be if left in the place she was in, it being a frequented road by vessels.

The Hannah, schooner Rebecca, Captain Sawyer, whilst on her voyage from Honduras for New Orleans, was wrecked on Sortugas. Vessel was entirely lost, the crew and cargo were taken to the Havannah.

The Ellen, Captain Carey, from Halifax for Bucknche, was dragged from her anchors, off Marie Joseph, on the 25th of August last, during very rough weather, and was lost, master and crew were fortunately saved, and were taken to Halifax in the Isabel.

NEWBURGH: Oct. 1.—The Perseverance, of Exeter, was in contact this morning near the Nore with the James Watt steamer, and had her bowsprit carried away, bows stove, stern split, &c., but was taken in tow and proceeded for London.

SUNDERLAND, Sept. 24.—The Mary, from Riga to Belfast, which got ashore at the entrance of this harbour on the 21st instant, has been assessed at £1,000, and will require that sum to repair.

ST. PETERSBURG, Sept. 22.—The Williams, from Inverkeithing, got aground on the north point of Hogland on the 20th instant, but was assisted off, after throwing part of her cargo (coals) overboard, and arrived here to day making a great deal of water. A three masted vessel was also driven ashore on the 19th instant, by the Nicolai steamer, and lost all her masts.

MEMEL, Sept. 24.—A schooner dismasted was seen yesterday about sixteen miles N.E. by E. of this port. A steamer will go in search of her.

ELSINEUR, Sept. 23.—The Norval, from Liverpool to Riga, has put in here to repair, having lost her topmasts and sails in a squall in the Cattegat. The White, from Newcastle to St. Petersburgh, got into Gothenburg on the 20th instant, with loss of topmasts, &c., and has proceeded.

COPENHAGEN, Sept. 26.—The Johannes, from Newcastle to Lisbon, has put in here leaky, and, it is supposed, will have to discharge.

GIBRALTAR, Sept. 25.—The Patriot, from Carthagena to London, put in here on the 22nd instant, leaky, and must discharge.

MILFORD, Oct. 1.—The Jupiter of Newport, calm-laden, went on shore in St. Bride's Bay yesterday, lodged, and sunk; materials saved.

BIDDEFORD, Oct. 2.—The St. George from St. Lucia to Liverpool, was stranded on Saunton Sands this morning; crew saved

CORK, Sept. 30.—Arrived, the Kate Kearney from Jamaica.

SHIELDS, Sept. 30.—The Alice, from Archangel to London, struck on a rock near Bridsand, coast of Norway, on the 7th instant, and on the 9th the crew saved. Oct. 1. The Enchantress, of Exeter, with white the bar, has been got ready for running

OFF MARGATE, Oct. 1.—The Gambia from Sierra Leone, Africa from Newfoundland.

CARDIFF, Sept. 30.—Arrived the Marquis of Bute from Quebec.

The Lady Sarah Hamilton, arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday. She is one of the finest of that splendid line of packet ships trading between Liverpool and New York. Her dates are anticipated by the last steam.

The Katadden, late master Bowden, put into Cove on Friday, short of provisions, with only three hands on board, and they in so disabled and sickly a state that they had to be immediately taken on shore. She was bound from the coast of Africa, with oil, to Liverpool. She left Sierra Leone on the 12th of July, and was, consequently, seventy nine days at sea. She had lost her sails, &c., in a gale, and during the voyage the crew became sick, and had all died but three. Captain Donovan expired when off the coast, after experiencing dreadful fatigue and misery.

Extract of a communication from her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Alexandria to her Britannic Majesty's Consul-General for Syria, dated August 4, 1843 :—"I have the honour to report, for your information, that the British schooner Unicorn, having taken on board as part a full cargo of wheat and other commodities for Leghorn, is now lying here in a disabled condition, arising from death and sickness among the crew. The master (the late Captain Wolpole) died this day, having previously lost two of his men, and the rest of his crew, consisting of five men, including the mate, are in a sickly and helpless state."

Extract of a letter from Captain Wolpole, of her Majesty's ship Vernon, to Vice Admiral Sir Edward Owen, dated Smyrna, August 21, 1843. "On the 28th inst., in consequence of a letter received on the previous day from Colonel Rose, from Lieutenant-Commander Inglis, Vice-Consul at Alexandretta, a copy of which is forwarded herewith, I despatched the Geyser to that port, with the petty officers and men named in the margin, to assist in towing the Unicorn to Leghorn, and after towing the said schooner out for about seven hours, she returned to this port the following day."

EXCHANGE.—The Neptune frigate ship left Gravesend on Tuesday afternoon, for Cork, where she will take in a large number of Irish emigrants for Sydney

YARMOUTH, Oct. 1.—The Dorothea, from Wisby to London, was in contact with the Argus, off Shields, in Lowestoffe, yesterday, and received some damage, but it is expected will be able to proceed.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE. Since our last report the arrivals of English wheat up to this market have been but moderate, but of somewhat improved quality. On each market-day the attendance of factors has been rather numerous, and the best parcels of both red and white have sold at full prices; but the middling and inferior descriptions have not commanded quite as much money as of late. From abroad the receipts of wheat continue large. Although extensive quantities have been brought forward, the demand for the article has ruled active, at full currencies. Barley and malt, though not nearly so much in request, have met a slow inquiry, at rather lower quotations. From Ireland very large quantities of oats have come to hand, owing to which the oat trade has ruled dull, on rather easier terms. Beans, peas, and flour may be considered about stationary.

Average of English Wheat, [illegible] Malt, 6846 and Oats, 1910 quarters. Of [illegible] Irish Wheat, [illegible] and Oats, 3,760 quarters. Foreign Wheat, [illegible] Barley, 1626, and Oats, 2,000 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 44s; ditto white, 45s to 48s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 43s; ditto, white, 46s to 47s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 20s to 23s; distilling, 28s to 30s; malting ditto, 30s to 33s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 48s to 50s; brown ditto, 40s to 44s; Kingston and Ware, 48s to 50s; Chevalier, 53s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 18s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 36s to 38s; white, 36s to 40s; boilers, 32s to 36s per quarter. Town-made flour, 43s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per sack. Seconds, 30s to 32s; Irish, 34s to 36s per barrel.

Foreign.—Wheat, Dantzic, new, 38s to 42s; ditto feed, 34s to 36s; beans, 30s to 32s; peas, 32s to 34s per quarter. Flour, America, 28s to 31s; Baltic, 32s per barrel.

The Seed Market. We have had very little doing in any kind of seeds for a week, and prices have been with difficulty supported.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing 48s to 52s: Baltic, crushing, 42s to 43s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 42s to 45s; hempseed, 33s to 35s per quarter; coriander, 10s to 12s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 10s to 12s per bushel; white ditto, 11s to 12s; tares, 3s to 4s 9d per bushel; English rapeseed, new, £20 to £23 per last of ten quarters; Linseed cakes, English, £10 to £10 10s, ditto foreign, £7 to £7 10s per 1000; rapeseed cake, £11 to £11 per ton; cleaney, 7s to 8s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9d, of household ditto, 7d to 8d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Averages.—Wheat, 46s 8d; barley, 30s 4d; oats, 17s 10d; rye, 30s 8d; beans, 37s 8d; peas, 37s 9d.

Imperial Averages of Six Weeks and Quarters Duty.—Wheat, 52s 3d; barley, 31s 7d, oats, 19s 5d; rye, 30s 8d; beans, 31s 9d; peas, 32s 2d.

Duties on Foreign Corn.—Wheat, 18s.; barley, 7s; oats, 7s; rye, 10s 6d, beans, 10s 6d; peas, 8s. 6d.

Tea.—The stock of tea in London is now 27,512,000lbs, against 31,271,000lbs at the same time in 1842. The deficiency is principally in green sorts. The market continues dull, but prices are not lower. Sound common congou cannot be had under is 1½d to 1s 2d, cash

Sugar.—During the present week upwards of 2,000 hhds and tierces of West India sugar have found purchasers. The trade generally may be considered firm, at full prices

Coffee. There has been less demand for coffee this week, and Ceylon has declined 1s to 2s per cwt. Other kinds barely maintain their value.

Rice. We have had scarcely any inquiry for rice this week, and, in some instances, the quotations are a shade easier

Cotton.—East India cotton is in better request, and the quotations have improved 1 per lb, at which advance nearly 3,000 bales Surat have been taken

Provisions. Owing to the saltness of the weather, the Irish butter market is dull, and holders are inclined to give way in price. The best Dutch has advanced to 94s to 95s per cwt. Old bacon is very dull in sale, fresh-cured is quoted at 52s to 60s per cwt. landed Lard is quite as dear. Prime hams cannot be had under 66s to 70s per cwt

Tallow.—In consequence of the large arrivals the market is heavy, and it is difficult to obtain more than 41s 6d for fine P. Y. C. on the spot.

Rum.—As at present and was again despatched the same evening to accompany to the Admiral the news brought by the Tagus, on the 19th, of the revolution at Athens From the moment of leaving Malta, up to the latest accounts, the wind has been always fair and favourable, and for the Admiral's working to windward it would appear he had the view a destination in that direction, though a report prevailed on board that he would be here to Malta on the 30th. In all probability he would not touch at Athens on the Vesuvius rejoining him. The Tagus proceeded on her voyage to England on the 19th, with a full cargo of silk and figs, and several passengers. The Medea arrived the morning from Bandonn and Mahon. An extraordinary departure of a French steamer takes p to-day for Marseilles, in consequence of some important despatches which have just arrived by the French steamer for the French government, by which opportunity I noticed, I presume, to send the present letter, for no mail is made up. Since writing the above, the Hecla, English war steamer, has been despatched to the westward with sealed orders.—Exchange.

First Lieutenant H. Craigie, Royal Marines, from the Queen to the Monarch, second Lieutenant A. Butcher, from the Monarch to the Queen. Naval Instructors—John-Millon, from the Monarch to the Indus; Alex. Gerard, from the Indus to the Monarch.

HER MAJESTY'S SHOOT FANTOME.—A letter has been received from Captain Haynes, commander of Her Majesty's sloop Fantome, announcing the pleasing intelligence that, after the greatest exertions, her Majesty's ship has not only been recovered, but that she has been surveyed, and reported in a fit state either to proceed to sea herself, or into the Vasiliere (her original destination), or return to England, as the commodore on the station may think fit. Captain Hayne's letter is dated July 15, from Monte Video, at which period her Majesty's ship was ready for sea.

DEPARTURE OF THE FLEET FROM COVE. At an early hour on (Saturday morning her Majesty's ships St. Vincent, Caledonia, and Canopus were under way off Cove harbour, and anchored nearly opposite the light house till evening, when they proceeded on a cruize. On Sunday morning her Majesty's steam-ship Penelope, one of the largest, if not the largest in the service, entered the harbour, and in the course of the day was visited by hundreds, who admired this stupendous specimen of naval architecture. A naval court-martial was held on Saturday, on board the St. Vincent, on Robert Taylor, a sailor of the Majesty's ship Isis, who, whilst in a state of intoxication, on Tuesday, threatened his captain, called him a tyrant, and said he did not care a ——— for him. Admiral Bailey was president of the court. Taylor has served many years, and his character stood well with his officers. It is supposed that he will be transported.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

DISASTROUS SHIPWRECKS. FIVE VESSELS LOST AND LOSS OF LIFE.

Information was received at Lloyd's Coffee house on Monday of the loss of the undermentioned vessels:—The schooner Princess Augusta of Lunenberg, during very rough weather, capsized, at about fifty miles west of Cape Sable. The crew, consisting of five persons, having excellent swimmers, succeeded in regaining the vessel, and remaining on the keel, by lashing themselves to the rigging. The vessel was soon washed overboard. One of the crew, a young man named James Spanagle, was the only person who was saved, and he was picked up by a vessel in a very exhausted state, having been on the wreck five days without any sustenance.

The Caledonian (an American ship). During a dreadful storm on the 14th of last month, at eight o'clock in the evening, the splendid vessel, which was on her voyage from New York for Cette, endeavoured to escape the fury of the storm by taking shelter in the bay; but owing to the violence of the storm was obliged to anchor by another way, namely, the usual passage, where she struck and lost her rudder, by which she became unmanageable, and after having drifted for some time, at length struck on the rocks and went to pieces. Fortunately, the whole of the crew were saved.

The Alice, of Neola Shields, struck on a rock near Bridsand, coast of Norway, whilst on her passage from Archangel to London, on the 7th of last month. It appears that the master and crew remained with the vessel two days and two nights, when she was got off the rock with three feet of water in her hold and in a rapidly sinking state, when the Hannah Moore, Captain Hinchburn, from Ganga for London, happened to be passing and took the crew and master on board. It is expected that the master of the Alice (Mr. Kennedy) and the vessel will set on fire previous to leaving, in order to remove so dangerous an impediment as she would be if left in the place she was in, it being a frequented road by vessels.

The Hannah, schooner Rebecca, Captain Sawyer, whilst on her voyage from Honduras for New Orleans, was wrecked on Sortugas. Vessel was entirely lost, the crew and cargo were taken to the Havannah.

The Ellen, Captain Carey, from Halifax for Bucknche, was dragged from her anchors, off Marie Joseph, on the 25th of August last, during very rough weather, and was lost, master and crew were fortunately saved, and were taken to Halifax in the Isabel.

NEWBURGH: Oct. 1.—The Perseverance, of Exeter, was in contact this morning near the Nore with the James Watt steamer, and had her bowsprit carried away, bows stove, stern split, &c., but was taken in tow and proceeded for London.

SUNDERLAND, Sept. 24.—The Mary, from Riga to Belfast, which got ashore at the entrance of this harbour on the 21st instant, has been assessed at £1,000, and will require that sum to repair

ST. PETERSBURG, Sept. 22.—The Williams, from Inverkeithing, got aground on the north point of Hogland on the 20th instant, but was assisted off, after throwing part of her cargo (coals) overboard, and arrived here to day making a great deal of water. A three masted vessel was also driven ashore on the 19th instant, by the Nicolai steamer, and lost all her masts.

MEMEL, Sept. 24.—A schooner dismasted was seen yesterday about sixteen miles N.E. by E. of this port. A steamer will go in search of her.

ELSINEUR, Sept. 23.—The Norval, from Liverpool to Riga, has put in here to repair, having lost her topmasts and sails in a squall in the Cattegat. The White, from Newcastle to St. Petersburgh, got into Gothenburg on the 20th instant, with loss of topmasts, &c., and has proceeded.

COPENHAGEN, Sept. 26.—The Johannes, from Newcastle to Lisbon, has put in here leaky, and, it is supposed, will have to discharge.

GIBRALTAR, Sept. 25.—The Patriot, from Carthagena to London, put in here on the 22nd instant, leaky, and must discharge.

MILFORD, Oct. 1.—The Jupiter of Newport, calm-laden, went on shore in St. Bride's Bay yesterday, lodged, and sunk; materials saved.

BIDDEFORD, Oct. 2.—The St. George from St. Lucia to Liverpool, was stranded on Saunton Sands this morning; crew saved

CORK, Sept. 30.—Arrived, the Kate Kearney from Jamaica.

SHIELDS, Sept. 30.—The Alice, from Archangel to London, struck on a rock near Bridsand, coast of Norway, on the 7th instant, and on the 9th the crew saved. Oct. 1. The Enchantress, of Exeter, with white the bar, has been got ready for running

OFF MARGATE, Oct. 1.—The Gambia from Sierra Leone, Africa from Newfoundland.

CARDIFF, Sept. 30.—Arrived the Marquis of Bute from Quebec.

The Lady Sarah Hamilton, arrived at Liverpool on Tuesday. She is one of the finest of that splendid line of packet ships trading between Liverpool and New York. Her dates are anticipated by the last steam.

The Katadden, late master Bowden, put into Cove on Friday, short of provisions, with only three hands on board, and they in so disabled and sickly a state that they had to be immediately taken on shore. She was bound from the coast of Africa, with oil, to Liverpool. She left Sierra Leone on the 12th of July, and was, consequently, seventy nine days at sea. She had lost her sails, &c., in a gale, and during the voyage the crew became sick, and had all died but three. Captain Donovan expired when off the coast, after experiencing dreadful fatigue and misery.

Extract of a communication from her Majesty's Vice-Consul at Alexandria to her Britannic Majesty's Consul-General for Syria, dated August 4, 1843 :—"I have the honour to report, for your information, that the British schooner Unicorn, having taken on board as part a full cargo of wheat and other commodities for Leghorn, is now lying here in a disabled condition, arising from death and sickness among the crew. The master (the late Captain Wolpole) died this day, having previously lost two of his men, and the rest of his crew, consisting of five men, including the mate, are in a sickly and helpless state."

Extract of a letter from Captain Wolpole, of her Majesty's ship Vernon, to Vice Admiral Sir Edward Owen, dated Smyrna, August 21, 1843. "On the 28th inst., in consequence of a letter received on the previous day from Colonel Rose, from Lieutenant-Commander Inglis, Vice-Consul at Alexandretta, a copy of which is forwarded herewith, I despatched the Geyser to that port, with the petty officers and men named in the margin, to assist in towing the Unicorn to Leghorn, and after towing the said schooner out for about seven hours, she returned to this port the following day."

EXCHANGE.—The Neptune frigate ship left Gravesend on Tuesday afternoon, for Cork, where she will take in a large number of Irish emigrants for Sydney

YARMOUTH, Oct. 1.—The Dorothea, from Wisby to London, was in contact with the Argus, off Shields, in Lowestoffe, yesterday, and received some damage, but it is expected will be able to proceed.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE. Since our last report the arrivals of English wheat up to this market have been but moderate, but of somewhat improved quality. On each market-day the attendance of factors has been rather numerous, and the best parcels of both red and white have sold at full prices; but the middling and inferior descriptions have not commanded quite as much money as of late. From abroad the receipts of wheat continue large. Although extensive quantities have been brought forward, the demand for the article has ruled active, at full currencies. Barley and malt, though not nearly so much in request, have met a slow inquiry, at rather lower quotations. From Ireland very large quantities of oats have come to hand, owing to which the oat trade has ruled dull, on rather easier terms. Beans, peas, and flour may be considered about stationary.

Average of English Wheat, [illegible] Malt, 6846 and Oats, 1910 quarters. Of [illegible] Irish Wheat, [illegible] and Oats, 3,760 quarters. Foreign Wheat, [illegible] Barley, 1626, and Oats, 2,000 quarters.

English.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 42s to 44s; ditto white, 45s to 48s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 42s to 43s; ditto, white, 46s to 47s; rye, 34s to 36s; grinding barley, 20s to 23s; distilling, 28s to 30s; malting ditto, 30s to 33s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 48s to 50s; brown ditto, 40s to 44s; Kingston and Ware, 48s to 50s; Chevalier, 53s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 17s to 21s; potato ditto, 18s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, black, 17s to 18s; ditto white, 19s to 20s; tick beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 36s to 38s; maple, 36s to 38s; white, 36s to 40s; boilers, 32s to 36s per quarter. Town-made flour, 43s to 45s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s, Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 38s per sack. Seconds, 30s to 32s; Irish, 34s to 36s per barrel.

Foreign.—Wheat, Dantzic, new, 38s to 42s; ditto feed, 34s to 36s; beans, 30s to 32s; peas, 32s to 34s per quarter. Flour, America, 28s to 31s; Baltic, 32s per barrel.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—Having now passed the ordeal of experiment for a long period, and become recognised by the public at large as the Family Paper of largest circulation and influence in the Weekly London Press, and as the ONLY Illustrated Journal—if Truth and News are to be associated with Art-embellishments—it is unnecessary (when an important improvement in what may be called the statistics of the paper requires a new public announcement) to resume the form of a mere prospectus, or to recapitulate the principles and policy which have made themselves so thoroughly known throughout the empire, and, we have reason to believe, not more known than respected and approved.
But, in proportion as the ILLUSTRATED NEWS has proved itself established—in proportion as it has found some assistance dying, and to die with prosperity—now, by the advancement of science, succeeds in bringing its machinery to keep pace with its success—the greater has been the temptation held out to piracy, and the consequent curtailation, until they could command the opportunity of returning more certainly the public embrace.
That opportunity has now arrived.—For some time past their extensive premises have been preparing for the reception of two beautiful Steam Printing Machines, upon an improved principle, which will in a few days be fixed, and enable the proprietors to distribute any number that may be required of their paper within the period of publication—not only at times to suit the convenience of the public, but with a higher degree of finish and refinement in the mechanical walk of art than has been ever yet attained in periodical literature. Then will those vast resources which the Journal has hitherto only developed according to its means of supply, at once meet the whole spirit of the demand, and the proprietors can promise a degree of rapidity in the illustration of news events—of fidelity in the realisations of public intelligence by art—of power on the multiplication of copies of that intelligence for the million—such as will prove less what the paper has done than what it will do—less the influence and strength it has exhibited than the strength and influence which it has been obliged to conceal.
For this auspicious consummation of a young prosperity the proprietors have ardently onged, and they now rejoice in being able emphatically to announce it to the public.
The ILLUSTRATED NEWS—hitherto impeded only by its own prosperity—now, by the advancement of science, succeeds in bringing its machinery to keep pace with its success
The result is, that the proprietors need no longer be afraid to extend their publicity They may now swell the zone of permission for the illustration of every event upon the tapes of public life, without fear of disappointing any of the responsive orders which them manifests may call forth. With no hitherto been their guide—in the field of art—truth with lavish exp" nditure for its attainment and scorn of the untravelled deception whom in false ambition "still sped the traveller, one at never knew." As in the case of the Queen's Visit to Scotland and subsequently to France and Belgium, their artists will "follo o the footsteps of modern adventure" and record them faithfully for the pleasurable instruction of the people and the historic information of future time.
The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS need hardly refer to its principles. They have made it the recognised Family Paper of the Empire. It has advocated it shall advocate virtue only (virtue wedded to religion) in morals and in politics alike. No party—no predilections of sect—of tribe—in doctrine—in philosophy—in the affairs of Church or State—but an unswerving impartiality—a high dignity of purpose—a leaning to what seems the right—and to that only—for the love of God and man. The whole spirit of the natural justice and freedom of the British constitution—the Journal would have reflected from every phase of its career.
Its objects have been long before the world. It is the faithful expounder of the present, to itself, and to the future. The mind and heart of man—the manners natural and artificial—the changes of his intellectual nature worked out by art, science, literature, and general civilisation, the government—the commerce—the pleasures and the education of the people—in a word, the living philosophy of the world, are to be reflected in this matter-of-fact news mirror—and reflected they are, here, then, and since, by with vivid fidelity and truth.
There is only this change in the condition of the paper, that the proprietors now know that they can keep pace with the kind enthusiasm of public patronage, and that if they are admitted by their novel and successful enterprise to have done good, they have now the means of increasing that good fourfold.
 The ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS can be had of ordered of Booksellers and Newsmen, price 6d., and may be sent free of postage to all parts of the United Kingdom.

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL, WINDSOR.
NEW ARRANGEMENT OF THE STALLS AND BANNERS OF THE KNIGHTS OF THE GARTER.

In consequence of the express command of the Queen that the banners, helmets, mantles, &c. &c., of the Knights of the Garter (which had been taken down at the commencement of the extensive repairs and renovations in the interior of St. George's Chapel, and placed in Cardinal Wolsey's Chapel during the progress of the works) should be again put up and re-arranged, previous to the arrival of his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, upon a visit to her Majesty, at the castle, Sir Charles George Young, Garter king at Arms, arrived at Windsor on Monday, for the purpose of carrying into effect the commands of the Queen.
The whole of the gorgeous banners (many of the most ancient being in an extremely dilapidated state, and requiring to be replaced with the greatest care), the crowns, coronets, helmets, crests, swords, &c., have been carefully and thoroughly cleansed, which, together with the several plates of armorial ensigns, have now been placed according to the present order of the seniority of the several Knights of this most noble and ancient order in their respective stalls.
The banners, mantles, &c. of the following recently created knights were put up for the first time on Tuesday. His Majesty the King of Prussia, the Duke of Beaufort, the Duke of Buckingham, the Marquis of Salisbury, and the Duke of Cleveland.
The stalls of the Marquis Wellesley and the Duke of Dorset are now vacant in consequence of the decease of those noblemen; and a stall has also been left vacant for the banners and achievements of the King of Saxony, who was installed at Windsor in October 1842, by the Earl of Wilton and Sir Charles Young, the Garter King at Arms.
The banners, &c. of the following Knights of the Order have been removed in consequence of their decease.—The Duke of Sussex, Duke of Dorset, the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquis Wellesley, and the Marquis of Hertford.
The following is now the "Order of the Stalls," as they have been arranged by Sir Charles Young:—

ON THE SOVEREIGN'S SIDE, FACING THE ALTAR.	ON THE PRINCE'S SIDE, FACING THE ALTAR.
1. The Sovereign.	2. Void for the Prince of Wales.

41. Marquis of Salisbury.	40. Vacant.
43. Vacant.

The Duke of Wellington left the Folkstone station of the London and Dover Railway by the seven o'clock train on Monday morning, and arrived in London at forty-four minutes past ten. His Grace left London-bridge station, on his return to Walmer, by the train which started at half-past five in the afternoon, thus accomplishing the distance to Walmer and back in one day, besides being nearly seven hours in town.
When the Duke de Nemours entered the cathedral at Lyons, on Sunday last, to hear mass, the archbishop addressed his royal highness in the following terms:—"Fear not that flattery may sully the holy air breathed in this sanctuary and disturb the calmness of your prayers. We shall only say to your royal highness, with sacred and respectful freedom, that if France has recognized in your race the valiant sword of Louis IX., repelling the barbarians on the soil of Africa, religion hopes ever to find in the heart and works of a son of St. Louis that faith which is more powerful than violence. But, though adhesion is rejected from our temples, we touch from our pulpits that heads of governments are entitled to the tribute of our love and gratitude, and that the laws they promulgate ought to be received with respect and obedience. Sir, I express, as St. prince, the sentiments of the clergy; and I am happy in having this opportunity of expressing them to your Royal Highness. Incessantly resolved to keep ourselves out of the whirlwind of human politics, we employ the influence of our ministry only in uniting men with each other in amity, in maintaining good order, and thus serving the interests of France and of the King." His royal highness replied:—"Monsieur le Cardinal—I have been much affected by your evangelical sentiments, and your efforts to give expansion to that sweet peace which resides at the foot of altars, and of which you have me to partake. You have received great eulogiums upon me, but I can accept only of your hopes. The sacred model which you have presented to me is dear to me on more grounds than one. I shall be happy to follow the steps of that great King, whom I honour doubly as my ancestor and patron."
REBECCA in 1727.—"About the latter end of February, 1726-7, a petition was sent to the Commissioners of Excise Assessment, from some of this city (Bristol), and thereabouts, complaining of the great duties laid upon their trade, and praying relief, and provision for keeping them in good repair. In consequence of this, an act of parliament, 13 Geo I. 1727, was obtained, and turnpikes were first erected here about Midsummer, and tolls collected for many days. But the country people showed a violent hostility to the measure, and great disturbances ensued, and the gates were soon cut down and demolished, chiefly by the colliers, who would not suffer coal to be carried to market, whereupon the Mayor and the city supplied from Swansea, which, when the colliers perceived, they brought their coals as usual. Soldiers assisted at the gates to take the toll, but the next night, after the soldiers were withdrawn, the gates were all cut down a second time, by persons disguised in women's apparel, and high-crowned hats."—Memoirs of Bristol and its Neighbourhood, by the Rev. Samuel Seyer, Bristol London, 1823, 4to. Vol. 2, p. 571.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 76.—Vol. III. FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1843. [Sixpence.

THE IRISH PROCLAMATION.

The past week has been one of exciting interest. There are periods when the march of events seem stayed, and there is a pause in the working of the mighty machine of society. But though there may be stillness, there is never retrogression; the index never goes backward; the tide of history "knows no retiring ebb"—for good or for evil, it flows on for ever.

The Government, after a period of inaction that seemed almost inexplicable, have taken that one step forward, in dealing with the portion of the empire that for a year past has been trembling on the verge of rebellion, which places them in open collision with the leader of the agitation.

The conflict is watched with intense interest; if we may compare great things with small, and illustrate the strife of principles and parties by the analogy of a contest of individuals, we should say the interest attached to this momentous encounter is of the same description as that which accompanied two of the Athletes of old to the arena. Each sides watches its champion, and calculates the probabilities of his success or failure, founded on the strength and skill which the combatant possesses, or is believed to possess. The people of England, removed from the actual scene of action, can judge only of results, for on both sides there is probably exaggeration as to the causes that are at work. They can see enough, however, to make them wish that the troubled drama should close, or take some definite form that could enable them to judge as to what is to be its termination. Englishmen are not unjust—their sympathies are generally on the side of justice—they love good order—they have a feeling of respect for the laws; prove that a wrong exists, and point out a practical remedy, and they will seldom fail in their hearty co-operation on behalf of the complaining party. But these very qualities make them impatient of imaginary grievances—to doubt highly-coloured statements—to fear the effect of appeals to the passions rather than to the reason—to suspect those who have even the appearance of trading on public wrongs—above all things to despise all endeavours to make grievances where none exist. In the real patriot they have an unbounded regard, proved by the worship they have paid to those who wore the mask of the benefactor of a cause only to hide the features of its traitor;—but woe be to the hypocrite when he becomes suspected; still deeper disgrace when what he is suspected to be, he is proved, for measureless then is the contempt that becomes his portion. But, however the demon of discord is evoked, however vile the means that rouse it, or the purpose for which it is awakened, not the less must every attempt be made to allay its fury. When the house is blazing it is no time to ask how the flames were raised—the first great object is to extinguish them. The conflagration may be caused by the uncalculating folly of the idiot, "who flingeth about firebrands, and saith, am I not in sport?" or it may arise from the dark malice of the incendiary who applies the match in terrible earnestness. In either case the one straightforward duty is the same. Leaving, then, all relating to causes, motives and persons out of consideration, let us take the present circumstances as they actually exist—let us ask what is the evil? and follow up that question by another—how does the Government intend to meet it?

The evil is visible enough. A people excited, as we have said, to the very verge of rebellion, but kept within the bounds of order by an extraordinary exercise of individual influence—which, however, the events of an hour, the most casual incident, may destroy; and which, at best, has but the frail security of one human life for its continuance. A combined power, and an organization exceeding anything of the same kind the world has seen for its completeness, and the facility with which it can be put in operation; which is directed so as to perform many of the functions of a legitimate government—its one great purpose being the establishment of national independence. On the other hand, the constitutional and responsible rulers of the country have the resources of the empire at their command—armies, fleets, railways, steamers, and last, but not least, the power that can put all these in motion—money; for the exchequer once more is cognizant of a surplus. Having these means at their disposal, why has an open declaration of the opinions of the Government been so long delayed? We wholly disbelieve that the inaction has arisen from any conviction that the excitement would die out of itself. Preliminary steps are necessary in everything, and the Executive could not have done anything more unadvised than to strike a blow, as long as no outrages were committed, till it had the means of supporting it. Let us recollect that in great movements, either of war or policy, it is not enough to be prepared for the probable; what is even in the most remote degree possible, however frightful to contemplate, must be provided for. It may appear strange to many who have had their ideas directed exclusively to the political aspect of the struggle, but it is, nevertheless, strikingly apparent, that military reasons rather than political or legal considerations, have delayed the hour of action. Let us recollect that in the ministry and at the head of the army is the Duke of Wellington a commander whose caution is as remarkable as his decision, and whose judgment in his profession is clear and unerring. The beginning of the movement found Ireland unprovided with everything necessary to resist a revolt except an army amounting to a mere fraction of the population. It was dispersed in small bodies over a great extent of country; each corps separately would, in a general rising, have been powerless, would have been annihilated, before a junction could have been effected with others; such, to a military eye, calculating on military principles, would seem to be the possible consequence. Delay, then, was the policy, with the view of acquiring strength in the interim. And this is precisely what has been done. Troops have been gradually introduced, forts have been repaired, armed and provisioned. These places form strongholds, where armed men may, almost for any length of time, defy the efforts of unarmed and undisciplined mobs, to whom the want of immediate success is assured defeat. The Government has strengthened itself to the extent it thinks necessary in case of the worst, and now it acts. There was evidently nothing in the prospect of the Clontarf meeting to make it more formidable or dangerous than any of the previous "monster" gatherings. If it was necessary to repress it, it was still more necessary to repress the others. What could be more exciting than the recollections which eloquence and passion could summon from the swelling mounds of "Tara of the Kings?" the scene at once of ancient grandeur and modern bloodshed. What could be more dangerous than the feelings which were called forth at Mullaghmart, which tradition points as the scene of a dire and terrible massacre: Why were not these repressed? We can see no reason so satisfactory as that the Executive was not prepared for the worst that might happen after such a step. There may be others. The Premier is supposed to be averse to extreme measures; he is believed to have differed from his colleagues; and it is rumoured that he now gives his consent to the present course, only on the solemn representations of the law officers of the Crown. But it appears to us that there was another whose fiat was required, and that it is not till now he has judged that "the pear is ripe."

And after all this what is to come? Those against whom the proclamation was launched have yielded a prompt obedience to the law. They declare their intention of scrupulously observing it for the future. The sad "worst" then may not—as it should be the fervent prayer of all that it will not—happen. But society cannot go on in this dead "lock" of dreaded outbreak and prepared defence. There must be other measures, and there is also a conviction in the quarters from whence those measures must come that this necessity exists. Let us trust that they will be conceived in wisdom and applied with justice. Then may we hope to see the cloud,—far, far bigger "than the man's hand"—pass away. While it hangs over us, there can be nothing but dread and gloom. Confidence is destroyed—security is shaken—trade is paralyzed and it is in Ireland that the worst effects of the agitation are visible. It is at once the source and centre of its own calamities. It is as useless as it is criminal to "rake up the buried enmities of the past"—to revive old hostilities, perished with those who felt them—to infuse into the present generation the direful hatred between race and race, which afflicted and disgraced the past. To cite the cruelties that stained the barbarous ages of both nations, as a justification of hatred and enmity between them now, when civilization should make them one, seems to us something worse than an error: it may suffice to rouse the passions, but in the eye of reason it stands inexcusable. The post facto zeal that

> Visits ancient sins on modern times,
> And punishes the Pope for Cæsar's crimes, is equally unjust, but not so mischievous. Let this be thrown off, or small indeed will be the sympathy of the "Saxon" with the endeavours of the Irish people to obtain any amelioration of their condition. If England were to retaliate in the same way, would Ireland be bettered? and, if not, why provoke an injury? Things have now reached a crisis; the resolution of the Government to maintain the law is declared, and there is an equally open avowal that every endeavour shall be used to evade it—at the same time, that exertions shall be made to prevent any attempt to break its provisions. Thus has the first act of the great drama ended: on what position of the characters will the curtain next ascend?

[COUNTRY EDITION.]

THE DUKE OF BORDEAUX.

The recent visit of this young Bourbon prince to the Court of Berlin has excited considerable comment on the Continent, although it has been confidently stated that the object of his Royal Highness's journey was a mere visit of pleasure, unconnected with any political object. The King of Prussia is stated to have given the Duke an exceedingly warm reception.

His Royal Highness arrived at Berlin on the 21st, and proceeded immediately to meet the King at Potsdam. He did not reach the latter place until the evening was too far advanced to admit of his taking part in a fête champêtre which his Prussian Majesty had prepared for him. Great pains were taken in arranging the Sans Souci Gardens for this fête. The delightful spot in front of Neptune's Grotto was reserved for dancing. Fourteen marble columns, recently brought from Italy, were raised on pedestals which had been prepared for them; and numerous statues and other specimens of antique sculpture were tastefully grouped amidst orange trees and fragrant shrubs. The interior of the grotto was fitted up as a tent, and hung with red drapery, bordered with gold. The ball terminated at half-past three, and the party then proceeded to the picture gallery in the palace of Sans Souci, where dinner was laid. In the evening the royal family and their distinguished guest adjourned to the Court Theatre, where Scribe's "Verre d'Eau" was performed. Meanwhile the Duke de Bordeaux arrived at Potsdam. When the King quitted the theatre, his Royal Highness repaired to Sans Souci, and remained for a considerable time with his Majesty.

The King, on ushering the young Prince into the palace, told him to consider himself as much the master there as he was himself. In the Frankfort Zeitung it is stated—"At our court the visit of the Duke of Bordeaux is not presumed to have any political object whatever; and therefore on occasions when the Duke de Bordeaux has been invited to visit the royal family no diplomatist or statesman has been included among the guests. That the French embassy at Berlin should have kept a vigilant watch on the Bourbon Prince was naturally to be expected, as the political interests of the French reigning dynasty rendered such a course necessary."

THE DUKE OF BORDEAUX.

The Duke (the Count of Chambaud) having quitted Berlin, proceeded to Magdeburg, and thence to Hamburgh, where he arrived on the 3rd, and put up at the Hotel de France. In his suite are the Duke of Levis, and the Marquis de Chabannes; and it was his Royal Highness's intention next day to embark for Hull on board the steamer Hamburgh.

It is stated that the Duke intends to remain in London for some time, and to receive a great number of his partizans, amongst others M. de Chateaubriand, who had hitherto refused to undertake the journey to Goritz, in order not to meet Prince Metternich. The Duke will visit Scotland before his return to Austria.

Among the on dits of the day is the following. In an album belonging to an august personage at Berlin, and destined for collecting the autographs of the celebrated and illustrious individuals who may visit him, the Duke de Bordeaux inscribed his signature thus—"Henry V. of France."

The Duke de Bordeaux is in his twenty-third year, having been born in November, 1820. A singular anecdote is related of his birth. It was dark when the order was given to notify the auspicious event to the inhabitants of Paris, and it was observed to the Duke de Richelieu, that it might, perhaps, be better to wait for the break of day to fire the cannon; to which the Duke replied, "For news so glorious it is break of day at all times."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE

Our accounts from Madrid come down to the 1st inst. inclusive state that the [illegible] continued to adopt extraordinary [illegible] measures of tranquillity [illegible] of the 20th ult. the [illegible] remained undisturbed, in consequence of information received by General [illegible] that a movement would take place at break of day the next morning. Everything, however, passed off quietly.

The inquiry into the causes of the [illegible] was proceeding with much activity at Seville. From what had transpired [illegible] there was little doubt but that it was the work of the Ayacucho party [illegible] The evidence clearly demonstrated that it was premeditated [illegible] addressed by a lady residing in Cadiz to her husband in Madrid, stated [illegible] we have in a state of anxiety and [illegible] who informs me that this evening the explosion of the gunpowder [illegible] ambitious to be a Duke of Bilboa is to be the signal for the proclamation of the Central Junta in Madrid [illegible] trouble for your readers. The Ministry, [illegible] obtaining possession of this letter, immediately despatched [illegible] addressed to denounce that the [illegible] was the result [illegible] of an accident, but of a plot.

[illegible] from the provinces was rather more satisfactory. [illegible] Junta of Saragossa had demanded an interview of the new Captain-General of Aragon, Canedo. The General acceded to the request, and two members of that body repaired to his head-quarters. Subsequently to the conference, which produced no satisfactory result, the General intimated to the Junta that he would sacrify common hostilities, and he hoped that the Junta would reciprocate the same disposition. The Junta and the General had a second interview on the 1st, but matters continued in the same situation at Saragossa.

According to the same print, several confidential friends of Maria Christina are to leave Paris a few days in order to attend the opening of the Cortes on the 15th. "It appears," the Constant adds, "that she [illegible] Spain as soon as a vote of the Cortes shall have proclaimed her abdicataire of Espartero. It is also known that the Cabinet of the Tuileries likewise awaits that vote to send back an ambassador to Madrid."

Fifteen thousand electors of the Asturias are stated to have voted for the Count de Toreno, the news of whose death arrived but after the elections, and for M. Mon, the Minister of Finance, who is likely to enjoy great influence in the approaching [illegible]

The Phare de Perpignan of the 6th says:—"On the 5th ult. it was believed at Barcelona that matters had reached their crisis. General Seoane had warned the foreign Consuls that the insurgents having fired on the troops stationed at Gerona, he had ordered the fort of Montjuich and the citadel to open their fire on some fortified parts of the town where the troops might be fired on. Lyons. About 60 Bavarians, officers of the Guard, and many Bavarian civil servants, were on board. Prince Constantine, the King's Aide de Camp, the Austrian Ambassador and his lady, and many others, accompanied the Princess to Patrikí. The scene was very affecting. The Queen was accompanied on board by [illegible] The cheers of the people were deafening. The several ships of war in the Piræus fired royal salutes [illegible] minute guns. A little before the time the King and Queen disembarked, the steamer left, and in time arrived at Patrikí, where the noble visitor was cordially received. Cheers everywhere followed, and cries of 'Long live the Constitution' were everywhere heard. At Nauplia, where disturbances were expected, everything went off in a quiet and orderly manner. On arriving at Patras, the Princess hearing of some existing feeling, would not disembark. Her determination was not to be prudent, and landed in full uniform, with several Bavarian officers on his breast. He was obliged again to seek refuge on board, having been both stoned and hooted."

The same journal gives the following extract of a letter from Zante, Sept. 20:—"England, France, and Russia, are agreed on procuring the abdication of King Otho, and then of placing on the throne of Greece his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, born 26th March, 1819; the object of this Prince in coming to the Ionian Islands with the title of Commander of the Troops, is to be in the neighbourhood of Greece and thus in due time to be well [illegible] short distance of his kingdom, which will be increased by the cession of Thessaly and part of the empire to the Gulf of Valona, with the Ionian Islands (Corfu excepted) and the Island of Candia; in which case the debt of 60,000,000 of francs due to the three Powers will be [illegible]

AMERICA.—The fast-sailing ship Hibernia, Captain Bunting, arrived at Liverpool on Sunday evening from New York [illegible] of her sailing, the 5th ult., inclusive. She has made a quick passage of eighteen days, but has only a few passengers. The Garrick arrived at New York on the [illegible] Europeans possesses no politics [illegible]

[illegible] is on the increase in the United States, where the dollar notes afford great facility. In addition to the case of Saunders, lately [illegible] in this journal, the last arrival of papers supplies the particulars of a forgery at New York, to the amount of [illegible], by [illegible] navy-agent, at New York; and others by [illegible] C. Winston, late the keeper of the store at Shokoholl, Richmond, Virginia, for 5,000 dollars, the greater portion of which had been discounted by the banks.

[illegible] — The late [illegible] Neptune—Melbourne Port Philip, June [illegible], H.M. Henry Beswick, and George Bates were placed at the bar, charged with having shot several natives in a tea-tree scrub near Messrs Sandt and Osbrey's station, at a place named Mustin's Creek, about the latter end of February [illegible] It appeared from the evidence of George Arabin, and [illegible] from named M'Guinness, that about the latter end of January last [illegible] Bates came to Arabin's hut, and requested to have the loan of his gun, to shoot a large eagle [illegible] Arabin loaded his gun with ball, and gave it to him. He then went to the door of his hut, and saw Messrs. Hill, Beswick, Bates, and four others, leave his master's hut on horseback, all armed with guns. M'Guinness said to Arabin, as perhaps the gentlemen might prepare the kangaroo dogs, he would follow with them and see the sport. M'Guinness returned about twenty minutes afterwards, and likewise the gentlemen on horseback. Arabin saw Messrs. Hill and Beswick with some black fellows' weapons in their hands; and asked M Guinness what sport they had. M'Guinness answered the party had been shooting blacks, not kangaroos. Bates returned him his own gun. M'Guinness had been examined on a previous day, and stated on his approach with the kangaroo dogs he heard several shots fired, and perceived two blacks running from the tea-tree scrub, from whence the sound of the shots proceeded. Mr. Sievwright came to the station three days afterwards, and stated a most barbarous outrage had been committed by a party of white persons, a few days previous, they having murdered a native woman and one child at Mustin's Creek, and offered a reward of £30 to find out the murderers. Heard it was the same thing as coming to a settler's hut and shooting their wives and children. Mr. Sievwright, after holding an examination on the bodies of the poor murdered natives, ordered their remains to be buried. On a further examination, the three persons at the bar were finally committed for trial at the ensuing criminal sessions, which were to commence on the 23d inst. The above dreadful affair has created a great sensation here, several of the parties implicated being settlers and their overseers. The length of time since the crime was committed (nearly seventeen months since) marks the mysterious ways of Providence, in sooner or later bringing forward evil doers to justice.

Mr. Boyd's steamboat Seahorse, on her passage from Port Phillip to Sydney went on shore on a reef of rocks, near the entrance to Launceston river, on the night of the 2nd of June last. Her engine is broken to pieces, besides other serious injury, and she is supposed to be a total wreck. Crew and passengers saved, and likewise part of her cargo.

CHINA AND INDIA

The Oriental steamer arrived at Malta on the 1st instant, without, we [illegible] to say, the Indian mail, which had not reached Alexandria when she left. She brings Captain Malcolm, the bearer of the treaty between this country and the Emperor of China, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 23d of June on the island of Hong-Kong. It is inferred that the delay in the second mail has been occasioned by the loss of the first, the routine of the service having been delayed by the loss of the Memnon. The Oriental conveys to England the crew and passengers of the Memnon.

The advices from Hong Kong are to the 27th of July from Calcutta to the 10th of [illegible]

Later advices were brought to Suez by the Hindostan (the intermediate mail), and do not embrace the usual accounts from Bombay. The dates are somewhat later than those of the mail lost in the Memnon. Of that ill-fated ship this arrival supplies us with no information in addition to that which we published last week.

The following is a list of passengers by the Oriental, most of whom arrived at Suez by the Hindostan:—

Colonel Malcolm, Mr. and Mrs. Kelsall, Lieut.-Col. and Mrs. Lane and two children, Mr. and Mrs. W. Allen and servant; Dr. and Mrs. Du[illegible] [illegible] Lieut. Colonel and Mrs. [illegible] and servant, Mrs. Dennys Campbell, Mrs. M'Glashan and child, Mr. Church; Mrs. Parker, three children, and servant; Mr. G. Walker, Captain Steed, Dr. Smyth, Mr. Thomp[illegible] Mrs. Rainey, child, and servant; Masters Cooper (three), and Mr. and Mrs. M'[illegible] General Considine, Captain Laurence, Captain [illegible] Mrs. Dunbar, Mr. J. H. Young, Hon. Mr. Moncton, [illegible] Captain Wise, Mr. Hotkinson, Mr. Mackintosh, Dr. C. Mr. and Mr. Bolst; Mr. and Mrs. Grant, two children, and servant Miss White, Mr. G. Bowes, Mr. Foster, Mr. Ernest, Mr. G. Tait, Mr. Sillgrue, Mrs. Hume, Capt. Barker, Lieut. Crewe, Mr. F. Burr, Lieut. Rinkead, Captain Dawson, Capt. and Mrs. Wise, Mr. Arbuthnot, Lieut. Kirby, Cornet Smith, F. Jackson, Mr. John Grant, Lieut. Gubbins, Mrs. Overman, Major Montresor, Lieut. G. Selby, Mr. J. Pitt; Rev. J. Wenham, Mrs. Wenham, Miss Wenham, and Miss C. Wenham; Capt. Garrow, Lieut. Crawford, Lieut. Southey, Miss, Tombs and servant; Mr. Walker, Captain Steed, R.N., Mr. Harker, Mr. F. Johnstone, Mr. Downes, R.N., Count Stozelecki, Rev. Mr. Mahoney, Mr. and Mrs. Abro, Mr. Blumer, &c.; in all 110 passengers.

We subjoin the most important items of the news Chinese treaty but cannot find room for the items of the tariff, which are comparatively unimportant to our readers. The new system was to commence at Canton on the 27th of July, on which day the formalities at Hong-Kong were to end, and the negotiations carried on with the utmost order of things, ceased and determined. The other ports, Amoy, Foohow-foo, Ningpo, and Shanghai, could not be opened without a special edict to that effect from the Emperor; but that edict was expected at Hong-Kong from Pekin about the middle of September.

G. Tradescant Lay, Esq., has been appointed British consul at Canton, pro tem.; R. Thom, Esq., was to act as interpreter; and Messrs. Meadows and Meredith were to assist in the consular office.

By the proclamation of the Imperial Commissioner we observe that the trade is to be open to all nations, and therefore other nations are to be permitted to have consuls at the five ports is not stated.

The Hong debts have now been fully liquidated—the richer of the Hong merchants having each paid a thousand dollars; the confiscation of Howqua is said to be a million of dollars.

One of the greatest difficulties which is likely to be experienced at Canton is the want of warehousing room. Three of the factories still remain in ruins, and the opposition which the others is very inadequate. Howqua, it seems, refuses to proceed to repair or rebuild one unless an agreement is entered into to pay an enormous rent. The question was formerly put, and that rent was sufficiently exorbitant.

We observe that Major Aldrich has proposed that the town of Victoria should be fortified on an extensive scale. His proposal has been placed in the hands of Government for their consideration, without, however, being recommended for adoption by his excellency the governor.

The regulations for trade and the tariff, we are advised, have given universal satisfaction to the mercantile community, the scale of duties fixed by the latter being exceedingly moderate when compared with what used to be paid formerly.

We are informed, in reference to the proclamation of Sir H. Pottinger, recommending or permitting him to prohibit the import or storing of opium at Hong-Kong, that excellency has strongly urged upon Government the propriety of not interfering with the trade, and we also learn that the Imperial Commissioner and the other high mandarins have expressed themselves to the effect that the British Government ought not to interfere, but leave the Chinese to interfere with the opium trade themselves.

PROCLAMATION

Sir Henry Pottinger, Bart., G.C.B., her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, &c., &c., in China, has the gratification to announce, for the general information and guidance of all subjects of her said Majesty, that he has concluded and sealed, with the High Commissioner appointed by his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of China to treat with him, a supplementary Treaty, stipulated for in the Definitive Treaty of Peace, signed at Nanking, on the 20th day of August, 1842, and the ratifications of which have been lately exchanged under [illegible] between Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, &c., [illegible] Majesty the Emperor of China.

Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, &c., now publishes the export and import tariff, and the general regulations under which the British commerce shall be duly subjected to examination and search, and finally agreed upon, and which tariff and regulations of trade are to be promulgated in Chinese, simultaneously with this proclamation, accompanied by a proclamation on the part of the Imperial Commissioner, &c.

Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, &c., trusts that the provisions of the [illegible] treaty will be found to be equally beneficial and advantageous to the interests, the honour, and the future augmented prosperity of the governments of the two mighty contracting empires, and their subjects. And his Excellency now calls upon all her Majesty's subjects to conform to the British Crown, individually and collectively, by their allegiance to their Sovereign, by their duty to their country, by their own personal reputation, respect, and good name, and by fair dealing and honourable conduct, to maintain inviolate the imperial rights of the Emperor of China, not only to strictly conform and act up to the said provisions of the commercial treaty, but to spurn, decry, and make known to the world any attempt, impropriety, or unbecoming overture which they or their agents, or employés, may receive from, or which may be in any shape made to them, by any subject of China—whether officially connected with the Government or not—towards entering into any collusion or scheme for the purpose of evading, or acting in contravention to, the said provisions of the commercial treaty.

Her Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, &c., will not allow himself to anticipate or suppose, that the appeal which he now makes to all her Majesty's subjects will be unheeded or overlooked, by even a single individual; but at the same time it is his duty, in the exercise of his high and responsible station, to state that he has been placed by the course of events to distinctly intimate, that he is determined, by every means at his disposal, to see the provisions of the commercial treaty fulfilled by all who choose to engage in future in commerce with China; and that in any case where he may receive well grounded representations from her Majesty's Consuls, or from the Chinese authorities, that such provisions of the commercial treaty have been evaded or have been attempted to be so, he will adopt the most stringent and decided measures against the offending parties; and where his present powers may not fully authorise and sanction such measures as may seem to him fitting, he will represent the circumstances to his Government, and will hold him indemnified for adopting them, in an emergency directly compromising the national honour, dignity, and good faith in the estimation of the Government of China, and of the world at large. God save the Queen.

Given at Government House, at Victoria, Hong-Kong, this 22nd day of July, 1843.

HENRY POTTINGER

GENERAL REGULATIONS UNDER WHICH THE BRITISH TRADE IS TO BE CONDUCTED AT THE FIVE PORTS OF CANTON, AMOY, FUCHOW, NINGPO, AND SHANGHAI.

I. PILOTS.—Whenever a British merchantman shall arrive off any of the five ports opened to trade, viz. Canton, Amoy, Foochow, Ningpo, and Shanghai, pilots shall be allowed to take her immediately into port; and, in like manner, when such British ship shall have settled all legal rates and charges, and is about to return home, pilots shall be immediately granted to take her to sea, without any stoppages or delay regarding the remuneration to be given those pilots: that will be equitably settled by the British Consul appointed to each particular port, who will determine it with due reference to the distance gone over, the risks run, &c.

II. CUSTOM HOUSE GUARDS.—The Chinese superintendent of customs, at each port, will adopt the means that he may judge most proper to prevent the revenue suffering by fraud or smuggling; whenever the pilots shall have brought any British merchantman into port, the superintendent of customs will depute one or two trusty custom house officers, whose duty it will be to watch against frauds on the revenue; those will either live in a boat or stay on board the English ship, as may best suit their convenience. Their food and expenses will be supplied them from day to day from the Custom house, and they may not have any fee of their own whatever given to them by the commanders or consignees: should they break this regulation, they shall be punished promptly according to the amount created.

III. MASTERS OF SHIPS REPORTING THEMSELVES ON ARRIVAL.—Whenever a British vessel shall have cast anchor at any one of the above-mentioned ports, the captain will, within twenty-four hours after his arrival, present to the register tonnage of the ship, and the particulars of the cargo she has on board; all of which being done in due form, permission will then be given to discharge the same, as hereafter is provided for in the tariff.

IV.—COMMERCIAL DEALINGS BETWEEN ENGLISH AND CHINESE MERCHANTS.—Having been stipulated that English merchants may trade with whatever merchants they please, without any hong whose merchants shall sanction, second, or incur debts which they are unable to discharge, the Chinese authorities, on complaint being made thereof, will, of course, do their utmost to bring the defendant to justice. It must, however, be distinctly understood, that if the dealer really cannot be found, or be dead, or bankrupt, and there be not wherewith to pay, the English merchant may not appeal to the former custom of the Hong-merchants, paying for one another, and can no longer expect their losses made good to him.

The regulations from five to ten inclusive refer to the payment of tonnage dues, and the mode of ascertaining the ad valorem duty payable on goods at the Custom House.

XI. TRANSSHIPMENT OF GOODS.—No English merchant ships may transship goods without special permission from the superintendent, except where transshipment is necessary, the circumstances must first be submitted to the Consul, who will give a certificate to that effect, and the Superintendent of Customs will then send a special order to be present at the transshipment. If any one presumes to transship without such permission being asked for and obtained, the whole of the goods so illegally transshipped will be confiscated.

XII. SUBORDINATE CONSULAR OFFICERS.—Should any place selected for the anchorage of the English merchant ships, there may be appointed a subordinate consular officer of approved good conduct, to exercise due control over the seamen and natives. He must report himself to the superintendent between the English seamen and natives, this being of the utmost importance. Should any thing of the kind unfortunately take place, he will in like manner do his best to arrange it promptly. When sailors go on shore to walk, officers shall be required to accompany them; and, should disturbances take place, such officers will be held responsible. The Chinese officers may not impede natives from coming alongside the ships to sell clothes or other necessaries to the seamen living on board.

XIII. DISPUTES BETWEEN BRITISH SUBJECTS AND CHINESE.—Whenever a British subject has reason to complain of a Chinese, he must first proceed to the Consulate, and state his grievance. The Consul will thereupon inquire into the merits of the case, and do his utmost to arrange it amicably. In like manner, if Chinese have reason to complain of a British subject, he shall in less haste [illegible] complaint and endeavour to settle it in a friendly manner. If an English merchant has occasion to address the Chinese authorities, he must send such address through the Consul, who will see that the language is becoming, and if otherwise, will have it changed or will refuse to convey the address. If [illegible] mutually any disputes take place of such a nature that the Consul cannot arrange them amicably, then he shall request the assistance of a Chinese officer, that they may together examine into the merits of the case, and decide it equitably. [illegible] parcial men of English criminals, the English Government will enact the laws necessary to attain that end, and the Consul will be empowered to put them in force. In all regarding the punishment of Englishmen, those will be tried and punished by their own laws, in the way provided for by the correspondence which [illegible] Nanking, after the concluding of the peace.

XIV. BRITISH GOVERNMENT CHINESE SERVANTS RESIDING WITHIN THE PORTS.—An English Government ensign will anchor within each of the five ports that the Consul may have the means of better restraining sailors and others, and prevent rising disturbances. But these functionaries are not to be put upon the same footing as merchant seamen, as they bring no merchandise and do not come to trade, they will of course pay neither dues nor charges. The resident Consul will keep the Superintendent of Customs duly informed of the arrival and departure of such Government cruisers, that no may take his correspondence with [illegible]

XV. DUES AND CHARGES FOR BRITISH MERCHANT VESSELS.—It has hitherto been the custom, when an English vessel entered the port of Canton, that a Chinese Hong merchant stood security for her, and all duties and charges were paid through such security merchant. But these security merchants being now done away with, it is understood that the British Consul will therefore be security for all British merchant ships entering any of the aforesaid Chinese ports [illegible]

ISSUED BY THE IMPERIAL COMMISSIONER, &c.

Keying, High Commissioner, &c., &c., Kekung, Governor-General, &c., [illegible] Sinkwei, Governor, &c., issue this public proclamation for the purpose of giving information and commands.

Whereas, when the English had last year entered into hostilities, our august Sovereign commanded them cautiously to attack Canton and four other ports, and was graciously pleased to sanction the treaty that had been concluded, the ratifications of that treaty have now therefore been exchanged, and commerce, a blessing to all, has again its security restored. But these security merchants are abolished, has been distinctly settled. Taxes, as soon as the High Commissioner, with the Governor-General and Governor, shall have received the [illegible] to be observed in the various ports. The Tariff of Duties will then [illegible] with reference to the commerce with China of all countries as well as of England the ancient [illegible] and profit shall be the perpetual lot of all; neither slight nor few will be the advantages reaped by the merchants, alike of China and of foreign countries. From this time forth, all past [illegible] free themselves from suspicions; pursuing each his proper avocation; and careful always to refrain no hundred feeling, from the recollection of the hostilities that have before taken place. For such recollections can have no other effect than to hinder the growth of a good understanding between the two people.

With regard to Fuchow, Amoy, Ningpo, and Shanghai, the four ports which [illegible] his Imperial Majesty's gracious permission are now newly opened for trade, it is requisite that the replies of the Board of Revenue should be received before the commerce of these ports should be actually thrown open. But Canton has a market for English goods during more than two months in each year; and therefore, the new regulations having been decided upon, they ought at once to be brought into operation, that the far-travelled merchants may not be any longer detained in the outer seas, disappointed in their wishes and hopes. The High Commissioner, the Governor-General, and the Governor, have, therefore, in concert with the Superintendent of Customs, determined, in fulfilment of their Sovereign's gracious design, that the aforesaid tenderly new form shall be commenced, and [illegible] the opening of the port of Canton under the new regulation on the last of the 7th month. The wishes of the merchants will thus, it is hoped, be met.

The island of Hong-Kong having, in the munificence of his august Majesty, granted as a place of residence to the English nation, the merchants of that nation, who will proceed from thence to the various ports, will be numerous, and such persons as they may employ, as linguists and so forth, will therefore be required to be under no restriction, but merely to accept engagement at fair and just rates. If, however, such passengers convey goods in the same boats, with the view of evading the dues of government, they shall be subject to such fines as the law shall direct. Should merchants of China desire to proceed to the island of Hong-Kong aforesaid, to trade, they will be required only to report themselves to the proper Hong-Kong house, and to the Hong merchant to according to the new tariff, obtaining a pass before they quit port to commence their traffic. Any who may dare to go and trade without having requested such a pass, on discovery shall be dealt with as offenders at the ports against clandestine trade, and against contumacious visiting of the open seas.

As to those natives of China who, in days past, may have served the English, soldiery or others with supplies, and may have been apprehended in consequence, the High Commissioner, has obtained, from the good favour of his august Sovereign, [illegible] and boundless as that of Heaven itself, the remission of their punishment for all past deeds; and any such who may not yet have been brought to [illegible] are therefore no longer to be sought after; while all who may have been seized and brought before government are granted a free pardon. All persons of this class must join attend quietly to their occupations, and with a diligent pursuit of everything that is good and right; they need entertain no apprehension of being [illegible] High Commissioner and his colleagues; and in this hope they command implicit obedience to what is now thus specially promulgated.

INDIA.

The following extracts from the Overland Calcutta Star of the 6th of August will be found to contain a small [illegible] of the month's Indian news, combining the usual miscellaneous and commercial intelligence:—

The military intelligence of the past month is not of a very interesting character. The most important point is that connected with the health of the troops in Scinde, and that, we regret to say, is not, taken altogether, of a very satisfactory character.

The party that were sent out against Sher Mahommed suffered very severely from the extreme heat of the sun, as did also those that remained in Hyderabad. Capt. Backett's battery, in marching up from Selwan, lost nine [illegible] gunners in that short march. Sir C. Napier's report of this [illegible] from the 22nd, to the 29th, of one officer and fifty European soldiers.

The nature of these attacks appears to have been most sudden, those men who had led intemperate lives being the most predisposed to them. The last death we have to record amongst the officers is that of Lieut Pottinger, of the Bombay 15th regiment of Native Infantry.

The whole of the Hyderabad force had returned to that station, where the Schwan Brigade, under Col. Roberts, had also joined. Sickness, though not to the same extent, or of the same violent and sudden nature, still existed by the last accounts, and considerable apprehension was felt that on the fall of the river, and the consequent subsidence of the inundations, disease would be still more prevalent.

[illegible]

At Kurrachee and Sukkur the troops had enjoyed better health than at Hyder abad; and though the sick lists were tolerably heavy, the stations, particularly Sukkur, were rather popular than otherwise.

From Sukkur, a force, consisting of a wing of the 55th Regiment Native Infantry, and three companies from the 9th and 10th Regiment Native Infantry respectively, together with four guns from Captain Cornish's Camel Battery, and a detail of Shahmerdan's Horse, had crossed over to Roree, where they remained for some time, expecting to have to march towards Golekee, where Meer Ali Mahommed had taken up a position with a party of followers, threatening the Khyrpore districts. The object of the movement, as it is by numerous canals and water courses at this time overflowing, was much against the movement, particularly as the waggons and guns were entirely dependent upon camel transport and draught. Ali Moraz, the Khyrpore Ameer, remained against the [illegible] in the interim, when they dispersed, and took to the hilly districts across the river, when the whole detachment returned to Sukkur. During the time they were encamped here, a melancholy accident occurred through the upsetting of a boat, by which Lieut. Horne, the Adjutant of the 55th Regiment, lost his life. His body was carried down the Indus, and was not recovered for some days. He was a very promising officer, and greatly regretted, not only in his own regiment, but in the whole brigade. Two other officers, who were with him at the time, had a narrow escape, and only saved themselves by being good swimmers. It is rumoured that a cantonment will be formed at Roree, it being considered a more preferable situation for a permanent station than Sukkur. A garrison would, of course, be still maintained at Sukkur.

All officers on staff employ belonging to corps in Scinde, who can be spared from their appointments, have been ordered to join their regiments. Capt Baker, of the Engineers, in charge of the canals west of the Jumna, has been ordered down to survey the rivers, canals, and forests of Scinde; and Captain Keith Young, Deputy Judge-Advocate at the Presidency, has also been directed to proceed immediately to the Indus, and will not be relieved for some time in the new province; he leaves in the Queen steamer for Bombay, as also does General Simpson, of Her Majesty's 29th Foot, who is placed at the disposal of Sir C. Napier, of whom it is understood he is to be second in command of Scinde.

It is rumoured that her Majesty's 9th Lancers, and the 13th or Prince Albert's Light Infantry, will both proceed in one direction at the commencement of the cold weather, marching through the province to Kurachee, where they will embark for England early next year, their services being made available on their way if found necessary. Sir Jasper Nicholls, the late Commander-in-chief, also follows the same route with his family, and expects to sail from Bombay during the cold weather. It is rumoured that a troop of European horse artillery will be added to the force from Kurnaul or Loodiana before very long

The recent disturbances in the Punjaub, together with those still existing at Gualior, have given rise to a report, very generally credited, that a large force will be assembled in the cold weather, to be ready in case of necessity.

We regret to learn that the European corps at the new hill-stations, more particularly at Subathoo, have been far from healthy this season. We trust, however, that this circumstance may not be looked upon as any argument against the general salubrity of these stations.

The Commander-in-Chief has stopped the furloughs and promotion in the 29th Regiment Native Infantry at Nusseerabad, on account of certain disturbances as connected with a quarrel between them and the bullock drivers of the artillery, and the subsequent inquiry into the matter by the native commission and non commission ranks, as well as the privates of the corps. The penalty is a serious one, but apparently fully deserved

We perceive by the Madras papers that the 5th Regiment of Cavalry, in the Chudda service, has been reorganised and placed upon the same footing as the other four regiments of that efficient service.

In the obituary of the month we regret to have to include the names of Captain James Oliver, of the 73rd Regiment of Native Infantry, and Lieutenant John Stapleton Cleveland, of Engineers, both of whom died at Delhi; Lieutenant Alexander Fraser, of the 45th Regiment of Native Infantry, and Lieut. William D Goodyear, of the 47th Regiment of Native Infantry, both of whom died at Benares. From Madras we learn the demise of Captain Dyvadin, of the 1st Regiment of Madras Native Infantry, and Capt. W. P. Deas, of the 9th M. L. G., Deputy Adjutant General of the Mysore Division

At Cawnpore a court-martial has been held upon two officers of her Majesty's 4th Regiment, the result of which has been published in general orders. The officers in question, Lieut. Mount and Assistant-Surgeon Burke, were severally sentenced, the former to be severely reprimanded and the latter be dismissed; but the sentence, however, was remitted, at the recommendation of the court, by the Commander-in-chief.

The whole matter appears to have arisen in an altercation between the parties, during which intemperate and insulting language passed on both sides.

General Cartwright and his staff, the commanding officers, and supper to the Governor-General on Monday, the 24th ult., and General Considine and the officers of her Majesty's 10th Regiment entertained him at dinner at their mess on the 26th, which was preceded by the officers of artillery at Dum Dum having given him a dinner, ball, and supper, on the 11th inst. This regiment gave a similar party last month to Major Anderson, C.B., of that regiment, on his return from Affghanistan, where he had so much distinguished himself; and also, at a short time previous to Major Eldred Pottinger, C.B., of the Bombay Artillery, whose gallant conduct during a series of years, and in the most trying circumstances, gained him the credit upon that branch of the service.

On the 7th inst. the Semaphore reported that the Samarang, with Sir Hugh Gough on board, had arrived at Sand Heads that morning, and three guns from the fort gave the pre-arranged signal for preparations to be made for his reception in the course of the day it was announced that he would land at half-past five o'clock p.m. The troops were accordingly drawn up, and all the staff of the garrison at Calcutta were in attendance, but a semaphorist station arriving that he had only passed Hooghly Point at half-past four p.m., and that he would not land until the following morning, the troops returned to their quarters.

The next morning they were on the ground again at half past five o'clock, drawn up in front of the Governor General's ghaut, her Majesty's 10th Regiment on one side, and the reserve guard from Barrackpore on the other, forming a street; all the military officers in the presidency and a number of civilians, including most of the secretariat officers, were assembled at the ghaut to receive his Excellency, who arrived in the Irrawaddy steamer, about half past six, and immediately landed under the usual salute, attended by two of his staff, Colonel Warren, the Town Major, and Captain Hilber, aide-de-camp to the Governor-General, who had been sent to meet him. After an introduction to several of the officers present, and addressing a few words to those with whom he was previously acquainted, he walked through the street formed by the troops, and then, getting into a carriage that was waiting for him, proceeded to the government house in Le Bee, which was prepared for his reception.

We are happy to state that the gallant general appeared to be in excellent health and spirits.

IRELAND.

PROCLAMATION AGAINST REPEAL MEETINGS.

Great excitement prevailed in Dublin during the whole of Saturday last, owing to the sudden and unexpected arrival of the Lord-Lieutenant and the Lord Chancellor, it being understood that a proclamation would be adopted respecting the meeting which had been announced to take place at Clontarf on Sunday. On Saturday morning a privy council was held at the Castle, which was attended by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Donoughmore, Lord Eliot, J. Blackburne (the Master of the Rolls), Sir E. Blakney, the Attorney General, and the Right Hon. Frederick Shaw. At the council the following proclamation was agreed upon, and in the afternoon it was posted in conspicuous places in and about the city, policemen being appointed to prevent its being torn down—

"BY THE LORD-LIEUTENANT AND COUNCIL OF IRELAND.

"A PROCLAMATION.

"DR GREY,—Whereas it has been publicly announced that a meeting is to take place at or near Clontarf, on Sunday, the 8th of October instant, for the alleged purpose of petitioning Parliament for a repeal of the legislative union between Great Britain and Ireland.

"And whereas advertisements and placards have been printed and extensively circulated, calling on those persons who propose to attend the said meeting on horseback, to meet and form in procession, and to march to the said meeting in military order; and

"And whereas meetings of large numbers of persons have been already held in different parts of Ireland, under the like pretence, at several of which meetings language, of a most seditious character has been addressed to the persons there assembled, calculated and intended to excite discontent and disaffection in the minds of her Majesty's subjects, and to bring into hatred and contempt the Government and Constitution of the country, as by law established:

"And whereas at some of the said meetings such seditious and inflammatory language has been used by persons who have signified their intention of being present at, and taking part in, the said meeting announced to be held at Clontarf:

"And whereas the said intended meeting is calculated to excite reasonable and well-grounded apprehension that the motives and objects of the persons to be assembled thereat are not the fair legal exercise of constitutional rights and privileges, but to bring into hatred and contempt the Government and Constitution of the United Kingdom as by law established, and to accomplish alterations in the laws and constitution of the realm, by intimidation and the demonstration of physical force:

Now we, the Lord Lieutenant, and with the advice of her Majesty's Privy Council, being satisfied that the said intended meeting so proposed to be held at or near Clontarf, as aforesaid, can only tend to excite dissatisfaction and seditious persons, and to the violation of the public peace, do hereby strictly caution and forewarn all persons whatsoever, that they do abstain from attendance at the same meeting: and we do hereby give notice, that if, in defiance of this our proclamation, the said meeting shall take place, all persons attending the same shall be proceeded against according to law. And we do hereby order and enjoin all magistrates and officers entrusted with the preservation of the public peace, and others whom it may concern, to be aiding and assisting in the execution of the law in preventing the said meeting, and in the effectual dispersion and suppression of the same, and in the detection and prosecution of those who, after this notice, shall offend in the respects aforesaid.

"Given at the Council Chamber in Dublin, this 7th day of October, 1843.

"God save the Queen."

The agitators had been sitting in a committee-room for some time previously, and it was generally announced that no public meeting would take place, but soon after Mr. O'Connell had read the proclamation, he suddenly started up and told the committee to accompany him to the room in which the public meetings of the association are held. Mr. O'Connell placed himself in the chair and was received with unpremeditated applause

A voice. We will get repeal in spite of them (tremendous uproar)

Mr. O'Connell and the committee came there to take the chair was in compliment to his Liverpool and Manchester friends who had kindly come to aid in the great demonstration of Sunday. He wished to explain to them the state of affairs as they actually stood, and the measure he intended taking in consequence. They were not perhaps aware that the government had issued a proclamation, and, although it was, he declared, illegal, he thought it better not to allow them to have a triumph over the people, but to put them in the wrong, and put off the meeting, rather than have it accompanied by any species of violence (hear). The proclamation was delayed until three o'clock this day, the latest hour possible, and half the people that intended to be at the meeting could not, in the ordinary course, have heard of it; but he had resolved to issue a counter notice, calling on the people not to assemble there to-morrow, though he did not allow that government document to be at all legal (hear, hear). Let them not think that it would interfere with the progress of the repeal agitation (cheers); but if they held the meeting to-morrow disturbance might ensue, and the business was to keep the people safe (cheers). He had therefore thought it right to get a notice printed, cautioning the people in the country parts from coming into the town. (Hear.) He would ask down the notice by that night's post to Tara, Kells, Navan, and all the other towns and villages whose multitudes would have poured in, and to every Catholic clergyman in that part of the country, cautioning them against holding the meeting. There would, therefore, be no meeting; and if any one were speculating on the blood of the people they would be disappointed (cheers.) He thought the conduct of the Government very strange; this was to have been almost the last of their meetings. He had gone through Ireland, and it certainly did not look well that they did not send out their proclamation till three o'clock that day, when, but for his activity, the notices he thought right to issue might not reach the people. However, he looked on the proclamation as an accommodation, for there was not another meeting advertised. He might have called one or two on his way to Derrynane, but no day for any of them was fixed. (Hear.) He thought it his duty to give this attention for the sake of his friends from Manchester and Liverpool, and he could assure them that the repeal cause, so far from being tarnished by this salutary act, should receive an additional stimulus, and every one should be encouraged thereby to advocate the cause of the union. (Cheers.) The usual weekly meeting would take place on Monday, and the dinner would take place on Monday evening. Mr. O'Connell then left the chair

The following counter-proclamation, surrounded by the harp and crown, was afterwards issued —

"PROCLAMATION OF MR. O'CONNELL.

"NOTICE.

"Whereas, there has appeared under the signatures of E. B. Sugden, Donoughmore, Eliot, F. Blackburne, E. Blakeney, Fred. Shaw, T. B. [illegible] a paper being, or purporting to be, a proclamation drawn up in very [illegible] accurate terms, and manifestly misrepresenting known facts, the object of which appears to be to prevent the public meeting intended to be held to-morrow, the 8th inst., at Clontarf, to petition parliament for the repeal of the baleful and destructive measure of the legislative union

"And whereas, said proclamation has not appeared until late in the afternoon of (this day) Saturday, the 7th inst., so that it is utterly impossible that the knowledge of its existence could be communicated in the usual official channels, or by the post, to the distant parts of Ireland, whose inhabitants are intending to meet at Clontarf for the purpose of petitioning as aforesaid, whereby ill-disposed persons may have an opportunity, under colour of said proclamation, to provoke breaches of the peace, or commit violence on persons intending to proceed peacefully and legally to said intended meeting:

"We, therefore, the Committee of the Loyal National Repeal Association, do most earnestly request and entreat, that all well-disposed persons will, immediately on receiving this intimation, repair to their own dwellings, and not place themselves in peril of any collision, or of receiving any ill-treatment whatsoever.

"And we do further inform such persons that, without taking any step in anything to the unfounded allegations in said alleged proclamation, we deem it prudent and wise, and, above all things, humane, to declare that said meeting is abandoned, and is not to be held.—Signed, by order,

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

"Saturday, 7th October, three p.m., 1843.

"Resolved, that the above cautionary notice be transmitted by express to the Very Reverend and Reverend gentlemen who signed the requisition for the Clontarf repeal meeting, and to all adjacent districts, so as to prevent the influx of persons coming to the intended meeting.

Tom Steele appeared at the Corn Exchange door, in a coach and four, supplied with a large bundle of printed copies of this document, which he was about to post in all parts of the counties of Dublin and Meath that he could reach on Saturday evening and the next morning. Expresses were also sent off to all the parish priests in the country whose flocks were supposed likely to be concerned or misled at the meeting. A person was sent from the Corn Exchange to see the platform removed, and in fact every means that could be thought of were adopted for making known the fact that the meeting was prohibited. To increase the excitement, about one thousand Irish Repealers, resident in Liverpool, Manchester, &c. had chartered one of the City of Dublin steamers, and arrived in Dublin about ten o'clock, to attend the Clontarf meeting. They were an exceedingly well-dressed and comfortable-looking body of men.

The Commander of the Forces issued orders to have all the men confined to barracks. Accordingly, at the Royal Barracks, Richmond Barracks, Island-bridge, and Beggars bush, all the guards were doubled, and the men kept in readiness to fall in at a moment's notice. At the Castle the guards were not only doubled, but two extra companies of foot and a squadron of Dragoons were quartered in some of the office buildings. In the course of the day the Pigeon House fort was placed in a state of siege. The guns already mounted were made ready for instant action, and others were run out so as to command the Clontarf shore.

In the morning the 34th Regiment arrived at Kingstown from Glasgow. It was intended to disembark at the North Wall; but owing to the strong gale and the state of the tide, the steamer ran into Kingstown harbour. They disembarked about 10 o'clock, and came by railway into town. On crossing Carlisle-bridge, to proceed to the Royal Barracks, the assembled crowd gave them three cheers, which the officer in command mistaking for a hostile movement, ordered the regiment "to halt," which was followed by "fix bayonets;" upon which the crowd gave three additional cheers! The regiments then marched to the barracks.

In the evening the Rhadamanthus war-steamer arrived at Kingstown harbour with a portion of the 87th Royal Irish Fushiers on board. They disembarked on Sunday morning.

At an early hour on Sunday morning, a large body of troops, in full marching order, 60 rounds of ammunition having been served out to each man, proceeded to the ground at Clontarf, where it was intended to hold the repeal meeting. On Saturday night, by order of the committee of the Repeal Association, the platform which had been erected was taken down, and all the preparations for the meeting that had been made were entirely removed. The place at the Pigeon House fort was "Conquer Hill," which is on the Howth side of Clontarf, very near the entrance into Dollymount. Numerous tents for the accommodation of parties attending the meeting had been erected in the vicinity, but they were all removed at an early hour. From nine in the morning, the city was all excitement. Every species of vehicle was put in requisition by parties anxious to view the scene of operations. Thousands of equestrians and pedestrians moved towards Clontarf to see the military display. On moving towards the ground, the first thing that attracted attention was a picquet of the 5th Dragoon Guards stationed on the Clontarf side of the Dublin and Drogheda Railway, near Seapoint Terrace. Several staff officers with orderlies were observed patrolling up and down, among whom Lord Cardigan, Col. Frith, and some officers of the Horse Artillery, were distinguishable. At the approach to Clontarf, the 5th Dragoon Guards were mounted. The men were all dismounted, as on parade, ready to mount. The men were all accounted for active duty—each man and horse being provisioned for 24 hours.

At Clontarf Green the 60th Rifles were stationed. Their arms were piled, and the men standing at-ease in divisions. They were not the shako, but their service caps, and each man had sixty rounds of ammunition. Towards the bridge of Clontarf there was one brigade of the Royal Horse Artillery, with two six-pounders limbered, and ready in all respects for instant action. Further on, the 11th (Prince Albert's) Hussars were stationed—the men dismounted, and at ease mounted. The men were all dismounted, as on parade, ready to mount. THE GREEK REVOLUTION.—STEAM EXCURSION FROM ENGLAND TO CONSTANTINOPLE.

THE TAGUS PREPARING TO SAIL FROM SOUTHAMPTON.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's splendid steam ship, Tagus, of 1000 tons measurement and 300 horse power, has just returned from performing the third experimental voyage between England and Turkey.

The passengers, during these three trips, have invariably expressed themselves in terms of the highest praise and delight; and certainly an opportunity has thus been afforded the public, especially those who are in pursuit of health, of pleasure, or business, of seeing and enjoying some of the most celebrated and most beautiful localities in the Mediterranean and the Levant; and this too without any trouble, in a short space of time, on board a vessel abounding with luxuries, and at a moderate outlay.

GIBRALTAR, FROM THE SEA.

The mercantile community have expressed the greatest anxiety for the permanent establishment of a regular line of steam vessels between England and Constantinople; but, unless the company can extend their present contract arrangements with the post-office authorities as to carrying also the mails between England, Greece, and Turkey, it is feared that the receipts from goods and passengers alone, will not defray the actual expenses necessarily attendant on such an undertaking, carried out at least on the scale it ought to be.

THE GREAT HARBOUR, MALTA.

It cannot but be interesting to our readers in general, to be enabled to form some idea of the principal places visited by the Tagus during the performance of these voyages; we have, therefore, much pleasure in presenting them with a series of views relating thereto, accompanied by explanatory notes, which, although necessarily brief from the short stay made at each place, are still quite sufficient to elucidate the pictorial illustrations they relate to.

We embarked on board the Tagus on the 15th of August, and soon afterwards this noble vessel took her departure from Southampton, freighted with a full cargo of merchandise, but with only twelve passengers, although she has ample accommodation for ninety persons. We glided rapidly and majestically down the Southampton waters, and passing through the "Needles," proceeded down the English Channel, crossed the Bay of Biscay, made the coast of Spain on the third day, entered and passed through the Straits of Gibraltar with almost railroad speed, the vessel passing the land at the rate of fifteen miles an hour; and thus we reached Gibraltar on the 21st. The current in the Straits, or Gut of Gibraltar, always runs from the Atlantic into the Mediterranean; to counteract which it is supposed that there is an under-current running the other way.

The appearance of the celebrated Fortress of Gibraltar, both on entering the bay, and also from the anchorage, is as beautiful as it is astonishing; while the view from the signal station on the centre peak of the rock is truly magnificent. The number, the extent, and the prodigious strength of the military works, together with the vast galleries excavated in the solid rock, bristling at various points with ordnance of the heaviest calibre, excite admiration. Within the last few years, fortifications have been added to this already impregnable fortress, on various parts of which at least 1,200 pieces of ordnance are mounted, which completely command the approaches from the land or sea. A new lighthouse, 170 feet high, has also been just erected on Europa Point, which will be of great service to navigation.

In four days and a half after quitting Gibraltar, the Tagus entered the great harbour of Malta, on the 26th.

We landed at once, being naturally anxious not to lose any of the time allowed us, to see as many as possible of the various striking objects contained in this interesting British colony. Although so small, this island may truly be said to be the most important one possessed by Great Britain. It is scarcely second to Gibraltar as a military stronghold; it is the station of her Mediterranean fleet: it is the connecting link between England and India: it is, in short, the master-key of the Mediterranean and the Levant. Valetta, the capital of Malta, is a very handsome city; it is situated on a peninsula, between two of the finest ports in existence, defended by fortifications, which may, perhaps, be considered as impregnable as those of Gibraltar. The Great Harbour is situated on the S.E. side of the city; it extends nearly two miles inland, and, being surrounded by heights, affords a perfectly secure refuge to the largest ships. The entrance is not a quarter of a mile in width, and is protected on each side with strong batteries. A splendid dry dock, now constructing here, will be of great advantage to the naval service. The smaller harbour, on the north side of the city, is chiefly used as the quarantine station, and is also protected by strong fortifications.

The Governor's Palace is a very splendid building, and was formerly the palace of the Grand Master of the Knights of Malta. Major-General the Honourable Patrick Stewart has recently been appointed Governor of Malta and its dependencies.

Having made an addition to our number of passengers, we left Malta on the 27th, and, in about fifty five hours afterwards, came in sight of the coast of Greece. Passing Cape Matapan, the southernmost point of the Morea, and Cerigo, which forms one of the seven ture harbour, as it may be called, was celebrated in the earliest period of Greece's ancient glory; and now affords secure anchorage to the largest line-of-battle ships. A new town has been built here within the last few years. The Piræus is the port of Athens, which capital is distant by land five miles. The modern road runs parallel with what were the ancient double walls, connecting the Piræus with Athens. At present, the traffic between these two places, of all kinds of vehicles, is nearly as great as on the Islington and New Roads.

The first view of the Acropolis, at Athens, invariably strikes every traveller as perhaps the most lovely sight of the kind that it is possible to imagine. The ruins contained within its precincts, or situated near its base, undoubtedly form the finest remains of Grecian architecture extant—the locality, the atmosphere, and the climate add an indescribable charm to the whole coup-d'œil. Since Athens became the seat of Government, almost a new city has replaced the miserable one which existed under the Turkish dynasty, and the walls which then encircled it have been thrown down.

The modern wonder of Athens is, decidedly, the new Royal Palace, which has been built by king Otho, of marble brought from Mount Pentelicus. It was commenced in 1836, but only finished and occupied by their majesties just before our arrival. It is of immense dimensions, being larger than Buckingham Palace; the plan of the structure is a hollow parallelogram, divided through the centre, thus forming two internal courts. The plans were sent from Munich, and the palace has been entirely erected under the superintendence of Bavarian architects, at a probable cost of half a million sterling. At a short distance from Athens, the ugliness of the palace is most perceptible, and it is invariably compared by travellers to a huge manufactory; while the interior plan is, if possible, in worse taste than the exterior. During our brief stay at Athens, the almost universal topic of conversation was the probability of a Revolution on the part of the Greeks, to obtain from King Otho that constitution which had been so long promised, but always obstinately withheld, and to the want of which the Greeks attributed the deplorable state into which the country has been plunged for such a length of time.

[The Revolution here alluded to, actually took place on the nights of the 14th and 15th of September, when the Tagus had returned to Athens, on her voyage back to England; and our contributor has thus furnished us with a view of King Otho's new palace (taken from a different point from that which we gave with the portrait of his Majesty in No. 62), thus enabling us to illustrate the precise moment and manner in which the Greek people, represented by the military, the Council of State, and the citizens of Athens, assembled on the esplanade before the palace, obtained without bloodshed or outrage of any kind, that constitution to which they were so justly entitled.]

Quitting the Piræus, we traversed the Grecian Archipelago, so thickly studded with beautiful islands, that it almost appears a mystery to the landsmen how a vessel safely threads her way between them, and reached Smyrna on the 2nd of September.

Smyrna is one of the largest cities in the Levant, and until about eighteen years since, had enjoyed for a long time the chief part of the import and export trade of the whole of Turkey; but, since that period, a considerable portion of the trade of the empire has been transferred to Constantinople, or transacted direct between England and various other Turkish ports, so that the commercial prosperity of Smyrna has sadly declined. The city is beautifully situated along the water's edge, at the head of a large bay, which affords excellent anchorage to vessels of every description and size. Consuls of all nations are resident here, and, as each Consulate has its flag-staff, the various national banners impart a very gay appearance. The old citadel on the brow of the hill is in ruins.

Weighing anchor for the last time, we took our departure from Smyrna, and passing Mitylene and Tenedos, entered the Hellespont, or Straits of the Dardanelles. A strong current constantly runs out of the sea of Marmora, down the Dardanelles, into the Archipelago, so that, as the current always also runs into the Mediterranean at the Straits of Gibraltar, from the Atlantic, it would be difficult to account for this vast accumulation of waters, always apparently pouring into the Mediterranean by these two straits, except on the supposition that there are under currents. We quickly passed the Turkish castles and batteries, where are mounted immense pieces of ordnance, some carrying marble shot of 800lbs. weight; we entered and traversed the sea of Marmora, and, on the 5th of September, Constantinople, in all its glory, burst like a beautiful scene of fairy enchantment upon the view.

Constantinople is situated at the junction of the sea of Marmora with the Bosphorus. It is impossible here to even attempt a description of this beautiful, this immense, this truly extraordinary city, to see which alone would amply repay a voyage from England, while by that thus just completed by the Tagus, it will be seen that we have had the opportunity of visiting several other places of great beauty and interest.

[A picturesque View of Constantinople will be found in our No. 24.]

The whole voyage has indeed been a most delightful one, and we cannot part with the noble vessel and her attentive commander, without expressing the gratification we have experienced in every respect.

LIVERPOOL.—On Friday a great many Irishmen (Repealers) left Liverpool in a steam-boat hired for the occasion, to attend the great Repeal meeting to be held at Clontarf, on Sunday. Many more (making about two thousand in all) quitted Liverpool on Saturday for the same purpose. A breach of the peace was likely to have been committed on the occasion of an attempt made to detain by a number of Orangemen to prevent the Repealers from embarking. The Mayor, aware of the designs of the Orangemen, ordered the whole of the police force to be called out, and the Repealers were consequently permitted to embark in peace.

THE CITY OF KINGSTON, JAMAICA.

In our late edition of last week's journal, we detailed the awful conflagration on August 26, the anniversary of the great storm which desolated Jamaica in 1722. By this calamity it is calculated that at least one-tenth part of the whole city of Kingston has been destroyed.

Kingston, the capital of the island, is situated in the county of Surrey, on a gentle slope of about one mile in length, which is bounded on the south by a spacious basin, through which all vessels must advance beneath the commanding batteries of Port Royal. The extended inclined plane, on the verge of which Kingston stands, is inclosed on the north by the loftiest ridge of the Blue Mountain chain, termed Liguana, which, forming a semicircle, terminates in the east at the narrow defile of Rock Fort; from thence a long neck of land stretches far away to Port Royal, forming the south of a beautiful haven; in the west the semicircle terminates at a contracted pass upon the edge of an impracticable lagoon; from thence the land, sweeping round to Port Henderson, and the projecting Saltpond Hills, secures an harbour in which the navies of Europe may safely ride. For nine miles around Kingston is an alluvial plain, surrounded by a series of irregular mountains, constantly cloud-capped, and appearing as if made up of several hills piled one upon another, with various valleys, picturesque valleys and chasms, impressing the mind with an idea of volcanic origin, or that some convulsion of nature had caused the strange irregularity displayed.

Kingston is a considerable city, and a place of great trade, with a population of more than 33,000 persons of all descriptions. The streets in Lower Kingston are long and straight, built with a mathematical regularity like the new town of Edinburgh; the houses in general two stories, with verandahs above and below. The English and Scotch churches are really elegant structures, particularly the former, which is built on a picturesque spot, commanding a splendid view of the city, the plains around it, the amphitheatre of mountains, and the noble harbour of Port Royal. On a plain at the top of the declivity on which Kingston is built are the fine barracks called Up Park Camp; and not far from hence, on a still more conspicuous spot, is the residence of the naval commander-in-chief on the station, called the Admiral's Pen.

It is stated by a correspondent of the Times, that the recent fire consumed about 600 houses, stores, &c., the estimated value of from £200,000 to £300,000. The black population rendered little or no assistance, observing, "Get those who ordered our pigs to be killed to put out your fire;" they were obstinately ignorant as to salt water extinguishing fire. There is no proof as yet of its originating wilfully, but the Mayor has offered £1,000 for discovery.

THE HARBOUR OF HONG-KONG.

The news just received from Hong-Kong by the overland mail, and which will be found in another part of our paper, is of the most satisfactory kind; and the island will hereafter be memorable as the spot whereon were exchanged the ratifications of the treaty between her Britannic Majesty and the Emperor of China. Meanwhile, as the latest received advices show, our countrymen are making themselves at home in their new location; and among the signs of vigorous colonization is cited the establishment of a debating society.

One of the principal recommendations of Hong-Kong is the excellence of its harbour, which has an entrance from the southward and another from the north; and at the angular point formed by the two arms of the strait there is a very convenient berth. The arm of this strait, which separates Chinx-sang-Chow and Obtee-Chow, two islands to the northward of the Great Lemma, stretches out to the westward, and has on the south side a small cove, with two isles in it; and to the westward of these is a very snug berth, where the largest vessels may be land-locked and moored to the shore. Opposite this place, the tide flows up a low valley, where a large stream of fresh water falls into the sea, which may be approached in a boat of any size at high water.

The harbour of Hong Kong bears N.N.W. by compass from the east end of the Great Lemma; and the entrance to the harbour may always be known by a white beach at its head, which is visible at several miles distance. The strait being once entered, the navigation is clear, and no further danger need be apprehended. The other entrance to Hong Kong harbour is from the north-east, on the north side of a group of three islands, which, with two or three rocks or islets, are situate near the north-easternmost of Hong Kong.

PLYMOUTH.—DREADFUL THUNDER STORM.—On Saturday last Plymouth and the adjoining towns and neighbourhood were visited by one of the most severe storms of thunder and lightning ever witnessed. It commenced about nine o'clock in the evening, the wind being then from the south west, and in less than half an hour the storm was at its height. The peals of thunder were unusually loud, and the flashes of forked lightning exceedingly vivid. There was, too, a great deal of sheet lightning, which added much to the grandeur of the scene and the whole was accompanied with heavy falls of rain, and, at one time, of hailstones. The storm continued until nearly eleven o'clock, by which period the wind had changed to the northward. The sheet lightning appeared just at the same time as the claps of thunder and the forked lightning rendered it difficult to mark the number of seconds which intervened between the latter, so as to judge the exact distance, but, at one moment it was ascertained that the thunder was within 2 000 yards of the town. We have not yet heard of any damage having been sustained during the storm, but we think it is more than likely that one so violent did not pass off without producing some injurious results in parts of the neighbourhood.

28.—Table shewing the number of Deaths Registered in England and Wales at different ages, in the year ending 30th June, 1841, and the proportion who died in each age in every 10,000 Inhabitants.

This work has been compiled at great expense and forms a most useful authority for reference to the CLERGY, GENTRY, MAGISTRATES, JUSTICES OF THE PEACE, CLERKS OF THE PEACE, POOR-LAW GUARDIANS, PARISH CLERKS, REGISTRARS, and all other PUBLIC OFFICERS.

The whole has been drawn up with great care and accuracy, forming a complete Digest of a Parliamentary Report exceeding 500 pages; and is decidedly the most comprehensive abstract of which has ever appeared at a price to bring it within the reach of all classes.

To afford facilities for the circulation of this useful work in all parts, copies have been Stamped as a Supplement to the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, of this day, the 14th October.—Price Sixpence.

 Orders for this Supplement must be given as early as possible to the Newsvenders; and in places where there are no Booksellers or Newsvenders, parties will have it forwarded to them by post, by enclosing Sixpence in a letter (post paid), addressed to Mr. LITTLE, No. 198, Strand, London.

☞ It is entirely optional with our subscribers as to purchasing this supplement; and to obtain it, a special order should be given for "The Census Supplement." In case of difficulty, sixpence inclosed in a prepaid letter to our publisher will insure the supplement, post free.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We regret to find that, owing to the imperfections incident to the first working of our new machines, a few unsatisfactory impressions of our last week's Journal were issued. This to "A Subscriber," "Don't Cure," "A Subscriber," "P. J.," Penlee; "X. Y. Z.," "Citizen."

"C. B. S." Ryde.—We will consider of the suggestion.

"A. M. C."—We have not at present room for such articles.

"Viola."—The sketches suggested are inappropriate for a newspaper. Our correspondent will find a collection of Memoirs of Eminent Divines—published by Parker, 445, West Strand—to be a sound work.

"Clerwus."—It will soon be concluded.

We have received a ticket for the soiree at Newcastle, on Monday next

"E. N. C.," Harrogate, is thanked; but we cannot insert poetry which has appeared elsewhere.

"A. C. S." will probably find the information required in the Art Union.

"A Peasant, Wrington."—We are happy to find in our correspondent a true friend of religion, though we have not space to print his long and spirited letter.

"A Dockyarder" will find the suggested illustration in the present paper.

"A Subscriber," Dover, is thanked for the sketch, which we may probably engrave.

"C. D." Newport.—Thanks for the offer, but our object in the illustration might possibly be misunderstood.

"A Subscriber," Barnstaple.—We cannot furnish the information sought.

"F. W. H., Henley.—Thanks

"E. N."—The romance was commenced on March 18, so that the extent is twenty-six weeks

"W. H. B."—We shall be glad to receive the preferred details by next Monday.

"Mungo Croft," Bristol.—All our supplements, except one, have been gratis.

H. G. M. W."—Half a year's notice can be demanded; the point of understanding depends upon the agreement made.

"A Constant Reader" should write to the Master of the Military Academy.

"A Supporter" unfairly complains, that the tower of the Hotel de Ville, Brussels, in our engraving at page 213, is not in the centre of the edifice; neither should it be, since the tower is reversible on this account. It is said that the architect, when he found that he had not placed the tower in the middle of the roof, destroyed himself—a most improbable story. It appears more likely that the edifice was originally only of the present length; that the tower at first stood at one end, but that an addition made at a later period, not altogether corresponding with the original plan, produced the irregularity, which, after all, is no defect in a building of this style of architecture. The cut to which our correspondent refers is another publication, is not, therefore, correct.

"An Early Subscriber."—It is optional on the part of our subscribers in purchasing the Census Supplement; but we recommend the valuable document, if purchased, to be bound with the volume at the end of the year.

"Pantechnic."—The party is not liable

"G., Deptford."—We cannot entertain the offer.

"A Subscriber," Carlisle.—The church may appear in our series of "Churches of London."

"A Constant Reader."—We think not.

"A Subscriber," Gloucester.—The misstatement that the Messrs. Baring have contracted for cutting the canal across the Isthmus of Panama has already been corrected in our Journal.

CHESS.—Solutions to problem No. 40 received from "Clericus Derrensis," and "Checkmate;" and to problem No. 41 from "I. E. C.," "Edward," and "Checkmate."

Problems received from "Q. E. D." and "Edward."

We have forwarded the address of "I. E. C." to "Edward."

"A Subscriber."—If you will forward your address, we will send you the explanation. A chess-player would explain it to you in much less time than it would take us to write it.

"D. Wilkinson."—Received.

We are sorry that in our last problems the chess-board has been misplaced, the white square having been placed at the left corner instead of the right.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1843.

The Emperor of China has ratified the terms of the treaty with England; the event is one of great importance, when we consider the peculiar character of the nation with which it has been concluded. Their whole policy, social and commercial, was exclusive in its tendency and unchanging in its forms. Innovation was a thing unknown; no generation must change its usages, though for the better: change was bad simply because it was change. What they believed two thousand years ago, that they believe still. Morals, religion, arts, all were fixed to a certain standard, from which it was treason to depart. Their civilization—for its kind—was high, and they were marked with all the vices and many of the virtues that civilization brings in its train. But no records seem to say when the Chinese were a "growing" people. As far as we can gather, they were "always thus."

When the ancient Briton was hunting his game across the sites of what are now populous cities, the Chinese had discovered gunpowder, and had the rudiments of printing. But they have learned to make little more than fireworks with the one, and have not progressed beyond the rude cut blocks with the other. Europe, out of the same materials, has found the weapons and tactics that decide the fate of empires, and determine the existence of nations, and created the instrument that moulds opinion and governs those who wield the more material power. What was to be said of a nation that counted its inhabitants by myriads, and whose institutions were crystallized into eternal fixedness? They not only did not attempt to learn from us, but held us in supreme contempt; we could not comprehend them after all our attempts, and as to understand us—they did not deem us worth the trial. But what does not change may terminate, and that which will not alter may come to an end. And so it has happened with the Chinese system of proceeding. Commerce introduced the point of the wedge, and war has driven it home; the consequence is that the mighty mass of life, which built a wall round itself to shut out the rest of the world, lies open to the world at last. Change breeds change, and China has only now seen the first of its revolutions. Our intercourse is no longer to be a kind of tolerated smuggling, but is a recognised and honourable traffic, except in one article, the soul-destroying drug-opium, which we perceive is excluded from the Chinese Tariff. All other things are legalised commodities. And who can foresee the effects of the change? Will they feel the want of our manufactures, an encourage a taste for them? They are not to be so easily satisfied as men emerging from the savage state; they have arts, and skill, and products of their own, many of them of superior quality. Our manufacturers will make a great mistake if they imagine that the Chinese will accept goods of a low quality, or of any kind, and act on the supposition. What would glad the eyes of the Negro of Africa the shrewd and clever Chinaman would laugh at. His tastes are by no means coarse in such matters, though not formed upon our standard. Then we, on our side, know scarcely anything of the interior of the empire; its resources are unexplored; its natural productions may be inferred from its manufactured products, but we have little of the certainty that investigation alone can give us. They must possess mines of the precious metals, but have they been worked as well as they can be by the means of modern science and machinery? They have much of the materials of wealth; there is great personal wealth among them. Might not they have more comfort and convenience than it seems now to secure them? All these questions at once occur; but their solution is left to the future.

THE REVENUE.

The returns for the year ending Tuesday, Oct. 10, have been published, and on the whole present a result highly favourable.

The total revenue of the financial year just ended is.....	£49,346,273
Against the previous year	45,269,927
Increase on the year	£4,076,346

The increase on this quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, is £1,565,931.

The increase in the year is mainly attributable to the produce of the Property-tax, which has been augmented by £3,738,313, and to the results of the miscellaneous department, amounting to £1,071,435.

The increase in these two items (the only two in which there has been an increase for the year, is £4,809,748. Against this is to be set a total decrease for the year of £1,863,431; namely, in customs, £138,150; in excise, £338,522; in stamps, £83,907, in assessed taxes, £89,547; in the Post-office, £1,000; and in the produce of the crown lands, £12,500.

The increase on the quarter comprises—in the excise, £249,511; in the stamps, £18,386; in taxes, £16,603; and in the produce of the crown lands, £7,500; the mean source of increase being in the year in the Property-tax (the increase on which for the last quarter is not less than £1,734,000. Against the gross increase of £2,017,024 on these items is to be placed a deficiency of £414,469 in the customs, £8,000 in the Post-office, and £5,189 in the miscellaneous department, forming altogether a decrease of £426,649, against an increase of £2,017,024 on the ordinary revenue. The "repayment of advances" and other items make, as already stated, a total increase in the quarter of £1,565,931.

A comparison with the corresponding quarter of 1842 shows a decrease in the customs of £371,222, in the Post-office of £8,000, and in the imprest and other moneys of £76,760, and in the miscellaneous department of £7,189; while, on the other side, there is an increase in the item of excise of £336,124; on stamps £18,886; in the produce of crown lands £7,500; in assessed taxes £18,263, the principal increase being under the head of Property-tax, which has risen from £313,844 to £2,047,904.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, SUNDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Royal suite, and the household, attended divine service at the private chapel. The Rev. and Hon. Charles Leslie Courtney officiated, and took his text from the 4th chapter of the Epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians, and the 1st verse, "I, therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called." Her Majesty and Prince Albert took their usual morning walk in the Park and Slopes. The Prince Bariatinsky and Viscount Hawarden attended Divine service at Eton College. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended Divine Service in the parish church. The Rev. Mr. Gossett officiated.

MONDAY.—In the afternoon her Majesty and Prince Albert, unattended by a single member of the household, and quite alone, strolled through the Slopes across the Home Park, to the new dog kennel and aviary, and from thence through the dairy, across the high road to the new royal gardens at Frogmore. The Queen and the Prince, who were extremely plainly attired, promenaded for nearly an hour in the gardens, the workmen being unconscious of the presence of their illustrious visitors. Her Majesty and the Prince then walked through the private shrubberies, and paid a visit to the Duchess of Kent at Frogmore, returning to the Castle through the new plantations in the Home Park. When midway between the kennel and the Castle, a heavy shower set in, and the rain descended in torrents, and before her Majesty and the Prince reached the royal residence, they were completely drenched. Neither the Queen nor his Royal Highness have since experienced the least inconvenience from the drenching which they had to endure ere they could find shelter from the pelting rain.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their accustomed early walk within the precincts of the Castle. Prince Albert, attended by Colonels Bouverie and Grey, enjoyed the sport of shooting in the forenoon in the Great Park. Mr. Goulburn went to town, but returned in the afternoon. The Earl of Devon arrived on a visit to her Majesty. The Duchess of Kent and Lady C. Dundas joined the royal dinner circle in the evening.

WEDNESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert took their usual early walk. The Earl of Devon took his departure, and the Right Hon. Henry Goulburn also left the Castle for town in the forenoon. In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by the equerries in waiting, the Honourable Colonel Grey and Colonel Bouverie, went to the riding school. The Earl and Countess Delawarr, and the Ladies Elizabeth and Mary West, arrived in the afternoon at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael honoured Lord James at Lloyd, Graham's, on Sunday last, at their residence in Hill street.

The Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief transacted business on Wednesday at the Horse office.

THE QUEEN DOWAGER.—WITLEY COURT.—His Serene Highness Prince Edward Leopold Langenburg arrived on a visit to the Queen Dowager, on Monday afternoon, from Droitwitch, having come by railroad to that station. Her Majesty sent her carriage to convey his Serene Highness to Witley Court. Viscount and Viscountess Barrington arrived last week, her ladyship succeeding Dowager Lady Clinton in waiting on her Majesty; and Miss Hudson has arrived and received the Hon. Miss Eden and Miss Mitchell of their duties about the person of the Queen Dowager. Lady Charles Somerset has arrived, and Earl Howe and Lady Georgiana Curzon, Hon. Captain Curzon, Sir Andrew Barnard, Earl of Denbigh, and Lady Mary Fielding and Lord Fielding are staying here. Sir Horace Seymour and the Hon. Lady Clinton and Miss Seymour have taken their departure. The Queen Dowager has transmitted a donation of £20, in aid of the fund for defraying the expenses of erection of Ramsgill Church, near Middleham, Yorkshire, and has recently sent a donation of £5 to the Female Asylum, Worcester.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel were fully expected to have returned from town on Monday evening; but urgent business has detained the right hon. baronet in the metropolis. His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael of Russia, with his Excellency Baron Brunow, and the officers in the suite of his Imperial Highness, are expected to arrive at Sir Robert and Lady Peel on the 31st instant, when a distinguished party will assemble to meet the Grand Duke

DEATH OF LADY KATHARINE PHIPPS.—Her ladyship, who was the eldest daughter of the late Earl of Mulgrave, and sister to the Marquis of Normanby, expired at Richmond, on Thursday, in her 41st year.

It is said that the Earl of Westmoreland will shortly return from his embassy at Berlin, that he forthwith succeed in the diplomacy at the Prussian court will be Sir Hamilton Seymour, our resident minister at Brussels, being a step higher as diplomatic rank for that envoy.

MR. HENRY LYTTON BULWER.—It is now stated, on what is generally considered good authority, that Mr. H. L. Bulwer is not to be appointed British Minister at Madrid. It is also said that her Majesty's Government do not intend to appoint a successor to Mr. Addington, that the business of the embassy will be transacted for the present by a Member of the Legation, as Chargé d'Affaires.

The remains of the late Countess Stanhope were interred in the family vault at Chevening, on Monday. The funeral proceeded from the town residence, in Charles-street, Berkeley-square, at an early hour in the morning—Lord Mahon, and other members of the family, following from town.

Sir Ed. Hardinge, Secretary at War, and the Lottery General, had a long audience with Sir James Graham on Wednesday morning, at the Home Office. After which Sir James visited Sir Robert Peel at the right hon. baronet's residence in Whitehall Gardens.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer arrived in town on Wednesday morning, from a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle. The right hon. gentleman, after transacting official business in Downing-street, left for his seat, Bletchley, Surrey.

The Earl of Aberdeen is entertaining a select party at Haddo-house, Aberdeenshire. Lord Claude Hamilton, M.P., Captain and Lady Harriet Hamilton, Hon. Captain Gordon, M.P., &c., are among the visitors.

His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge arrived at Corfu on the 19th inst., as colonel in command of the troops in the Ionian Islands.

APPROACHING ALLIANCES.—The Earl of Marsh's marriage with Miss Gye will take place early next month. The nuptials of the Earl of Shelburne with the Hon. Miss Elphinstone Fleeming, daughter of the French ambassador at Vienna, it is understood will shortly take place. Miss Alexander, cousin to the Earl of Caledon, will be shortly united to the Rev. Mr. Sali, son of Mr. Salt, the banker. Mr. Watson Taylor is understood to be the wealthy commoner who will shortly lead Lady Charlotte Hay, daughter of the Marquis of Tweeddale, and sister to the Marchioness of Doure, to the altar.

ELECTION OF LORD MAYOR.—A Common Hall was held on Tuesday morning shortly after twelve o clock, at Guildhall, when the Common Sergeant declared that the sheriffs had cast up the pollcooks, and that the numbers were as follow:—Alderman Magnay, 843; Lord Mayor, 149; Alderman T. Wood, 82; and they would therefore return Alderman Magnay and the Lord Mayor to the Court of Aldermen, in order that they might choose one of them to serve the office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year. The Common Sergeant and the Sheriffs then retired; and after being absent about twenty-five minutes, they returned, when the Recorder declared that the choice of the Court of Aldermen had fallen upon William Magnay, Esq., citizen and stationer. Mr. Alderman Magnay then came forward, and thanked the livery for the honour which they had conferred upon him, in electing him as their chief magistrate, and he could assure them that he would use his utmost endeavours in so filling his term of office, as, at the end of it, that he might again receive their approbation. Mr. Alderman T. Wood also addressed the meeting. After the motion of Mr. Deputy Stevens, seconded by Mr. Goss, a vote of thanks was unanimously passed to the late Sheriffs for the urbanity and humanity which had characterised their conduct in the office generally. Alderman Hooper and Mr. Jeremiah Pilcher then returned thanks for the resolution which had just been agreed to, both Sheriffs declaring that if called upon at any future period to fill a post of honour, they would be found always be found ready. Mr. Deputy Stevens came forward to propose a vote of thanks to the present Lord Mayor for the impartiality with which he had exercised his office. The vote being seconded by Mr. Prior, it was carried unanimously. The Lord Mayor expressed his satisfaction at the vote which had passed, and would assure the citizens that the few days of office which yet remained should be filled up in the same manner as hitherto, and which had secured to him their approbation. He begged to assure the Livery that it was unknown to him that it was the intention of any one again to propose him, as on the present occasion; it had been done by his deputy without his knowledge. He had now to furnish to every member of the chief magistrate a second time, but would rather yield it up to his juniors. (Cheers.) The Common Hall then separated. A Court of Aldermen was then held, at which it was announced that the office of chief clerk at the Mansion House had become vacant by the resignation of Mr. Hobler. Mr. Payne was appointed to the situation pro tem. The salary is 500*l* per annum, with an assistant at 90*l*. per annum.

THE WELSH COMMISSION.—The Welsh special Commission was issued and forwarded from London on Monday. It nominates Mr. Baron Parke, Mr. Baron Gurney, and Mr. Justice Cresswell as the presiding judges. The trials will take place in Carmarthen, in Carmarthenshire, as being considered advisable to try the prisoners at a distance from the county which has been the chief scene of the disturbances. The day named for the commission to meet is the 31st of the present month.

EXPERIMENTAL TRIP OF THE GREAT NORTHERN.—On Wednesday last the Great Northern steam-vessel (of which we gave an engraving and description in the 27th of July paper) was taken a trial trip down the river, which, we are gratified to state, was most successful. A numerous party of gentlemen, among whom we observed the Bishop of Norwich, Captain Chappell, R.N., Sir James Duke, Mayor, Mr. Lloyd, Deputy Lieutenant of the Trinity House; Mr. Guppy, engineer of the Great Britain; Mr. Smith, inventor of the Archimedean screw, &c., were on board. It will be remembered that the Great Northern is a first-class steam-vessel, having the Archimedean screw and the auxiliary means of propulsion. She is a handsome man-of-war-like craft, delicately modelled, and very tastily rigged. It is not intended that she shall use the screw along with her sails, but in the event either of a dead calm or a head-wind the steam can be put up, and a sure means of locomotion ensured. The Great Northern started from the Brunswick wharf, Blackwall, shortly after twelve o'clock. The weather was then not at all propitious, being a cold raw day, with a steady breeze from the south-west, and every body fancying looking cross and further outside. A strong tide was running up the river, and against this the Great Northern had to contend. She screws her way steadily along—a cumbrous barge it was certainly, but still presenting a grand subject for pencil interest to the crews of the vessels working upwards with the tide. Shortly after starting, the log gave a speed of nine knots, but as the engine worked more freely it was found to do seven. The Eagle Grass-end steam-boat cried creepingly very slowly astern of the Great Northern, and the London, of Dundee, the largest sea-going steamer which ever came into the Thames, was by a few topsail sheets her usually pace the fastest boat, proceeding as she did without any help from canvas. Altogether, the success of the experiment was complete. It was demonstrated beyond doubt that the great Northern will be able to perform the same service, passing a high voyage with ease, safety, and perseverance as an ordinary

THE METROPOLITAN CATHEDRALS.—The melancholy condition of our metropolitan cathedrals, St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, is attracting not only very general attention, but exciting very general indignation. Twice during the late session of Parliament did Sir Robert Peel express himself in most unequivocal terms as to the propriety of abolishing the exorbitant fees demanded for entrance into those sacred edifices, and of affording increased facility for religious worship; but the authorities appear to treat these suggestions and opinions with the most contemptuous disregard, and no doubt will continue to do so until the legislature undertakes to decide the question whether this is really a Christian mode of promoting national devotion, or one calculated to uphold the sacredness of the house of God?

Cameron was confined, share the same fate. The prisoner was then taken out of the prison, and triumphantly carried away by the men, who led Cromarty without doing further mischief. On Thursday evening, as the officer returned from Cro

The previous outrages perpetrated in Resakeen, Logie, and Resolis, on the adheaccordingly, the civil power applied for military aid to the Lord Advocate for the sup-

DREADFUL FIRE AT JAMAICA.—FOUR HUNDRED HOUSES BURNED, WITH IMMENSE LOSS OF PROPERTY.

The following brief but full account of this calamity is from the Royal Gazette of Aug. 30

The Falmouth Post devotes upon us to record one of the most terrible conflagrations of Fre whose that has befallen the city of Kingston since the memorable fire of the year 1815.

On Saturday last, the 26th instant, at about a quarter of an hour after two, the inhabitants of the city were aroused by the cry of fire. On inquiry it was directly ascertained from the east end of the city, and soon learned that the premises known as Jones's Foundry were on fire. But little danger was felt at first, from the nature of the premises, few pre-sons apprehended that the fire would have extended to any great distance. We, however, hastened to the spot, at which time the fire was confined to the foundry premises, which were in a few minutes totally consumed, and extended its devouring flames to the rum and lumber yard of Messrs. Da Costa and Maxwell. The sea breeze, which had previously had been moderate, now began to blow with an unusual violence, which carried the flames to that part of the city in the utmost danger. There were several engines early on the spot, but, owing to a great scarcity of fire-buckets, much difficulty was experienced in procuring water, and the want of water was increased by the fact that the generality of the people employed in bringing it were impressed with the absurd idea that salt water would not extinguish fire.
The flames by this time had communicated with the houses on the north side of Harbour street, and spread, in spite of all that could be done to stop them, in a north-western direction. A range of houses extending from Harbour street to Thames-street were speedily consumed, and the houses on both sides of Goldsmith street, up nearly as far as Lombard street, were burnt to the ground. The Methodist chapel in Thames-street escaped by the lofty nature of its walls, and the great attention that was bestowed on its safety. The fire then ran with fearful velocity up the houses on both sides of Rum-lane, of which nothing remained but the bare walls. By the greatest exertions on the part of the military, by the violence of the sea breeze, had ignited the upper part of Mrs. Mair's various places, and a house in Law's street, formerly used as the Athenæum was soon enveloped in flames, and became the nucleus of a distinct conflagration, more disastrous in its results than even the original one. The fire engines being at the time all engaged in the attempt to check the fire in the lower part of the town, the inhabitants were at hand for a considerable length of time to assist in extinguishing that which threatened speedily to reduce to ashes the whole of the upper and more valuable dwelling-houses. The flames spread with rapidity which no human power could control along George-lane, up East-street, John's lane, and Duke-street, consuming as their resistless fury became as nodes in the direction to which they were carried by the breeze, finishing their wild and fearful career in the direction at the Catholic church, near the Parade.
Meanwhile the fire continued to rage with unabated vigour in the direction of Harbour street, and the land wind commencing about five o'clock, threatened to waft the flames towards Port Royal-street. At the fire, when had by this time extended to within a few houses of Lom bard street, now began to make its way southward; and a large number of houses on the east side of Hanover-street, including Mr. Wilcock's coach-building establishment, became completely in flames. A party of artillery, under the command of Major Rossland, had been from the earliest period engaged in rendering assistance, by blowing up buildings which appeared likely, while standing, to communicate the flames to the other parts of the slight and open nature of the houses rendered gunpowder inefficient for the purpose, was therefore, considered about eight o'clock, a most awful sight to witness. The were burning as fiercely as ever, to bring out a twelve pound howitzer, in order the more effectually to bring down the buildings immediately in advance of the fire. By these means, and by the aid of a large body of troops and seamen, the fire was eventually put down at about four o'clock in the morning of Sunday.

It is very difficult, if not impossible at present, to form anything like a correct estimate of the loss occasioned by the awful calamity; we believe, however, we do not exaggerate when we state the number of houses destroyed at upwards of 400. Many poor families, who lived in the neighborhood of the fire, darmed last the dwellings should become envelloped in the general conflagration, and anxious to save what little property they could from destruction, went to be seen throwing their furniture from the windows into the street, only to become the prey of a horde of thieves, who were buzzed in plundering among the confusion. It was a melancholy spectacle, more forcibly to the feelings which was destroying all around, to behold the wretched inmates of the unfanned buildings many of them without a shoe on their feet, or a bonnet on their heads—hurrying from one place to another in search of a shelter from the fury of the fire, and, when they had change of linen to replace the soiled and torn garments alone left risen of the world's goods
The Royal Gazette was the first newspaper that appeared in the streets after the ravages houses; and at a late hour in the evening, many of the unhappy creatures who endered homeless by the fire, had themselves down here and there in the streets, and and passed a night such as never perhaps had been passed in Jamaica. In spite of all their watchfulness, however, and notwithstanding the large concourse of persons who were present, the pandemon contrived to carry off an immense quantity of goods.

We regret to have to record the following accidents, which have already come to our knowledge:—A fatal accident occurred to one of the engineers, he fell from a house, and broke his leg.

ATTEMPTED MURDER OF A WINE-MERCHANT IN THE CITY.—Throughout the whole of Friday a powerful sensation was created in the City, in consequence of a report that a highly respectable wine-merchant, named Waller, living in Cross-lane, St Mary-at-Hill, Billingsgate, had been shot dead by his servant. On making an inquiry, the following were found to be the facts of the case, as near as we can ascertain:—Shortly before ten o'clock a man named Rowe, aged 78, and who was for twenty-four years in the service of Mr. Waller, as cellarman, rang the bell which was answered by the porter. He inquired of Mr. Waller, if he was at home, and was answered in the affirmative; he (Rowe) was then shown into the counting-house where Mr. Waller was sitting; the porter then left, and Rowe asked for some compensation for the long period he had been in his employ, and stated that he had discharged last Saturday three weeks). Mr. Waller said he was then very busy, but if he (Rowe) would call some other time, he would consider of the matter. These words, however, were no sooner uttered than Rowe drew from his pocket a pistol, and fired it at Mr. Waller. The noise of fire-arms alarmed the porter, and he rushed into the counting-house, when Mr. Waller exclaimed, "Rowe has shot me." The porter instantly seized him by the collar, perceiving that he had another pistol in his hand, he became alarmed, and let him go. No time was lost in sending for a surgeon, who promptly attended, when it was discovered that a ball had entered Mr. Waller's left side, and after wounding one of the ribs, fell out. Another ball was also found on the ground. Information of the atrocious attempt was instantly sent to the police-office in Lombard-street, when Inspector Waller sent several officers in different directions, and from information he received, he went in pursuit of the accused, whom he apprehended in the Bow-road, and brought him in a cab back to Tower-street. On his person two pistols and a dagger were found in his pockets, together with a phial containing some gunpowder, a powder flask, and lbs. 4d in silver and copper. In a later part of the day the prisoner was taken before the Lord Mayor, when the above facts were stated. He did not deny having committed the act, but said "his late master was a very rich man, and ought to be transported." The Lord Mayor said it was a most serious case, and remanded the prisoner for a

VISIT OF THE GRAND DUKE MICHAEL TO WOOLWICH

On Monday last his Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael, accompanied by Captain Meynell, Royal Navy, and accompanied by Prince Dolgorouky, General Tolstoy, General Lanskoy, Col Ogareff, Baron Brunow, M. de Berg, M. Benkendorf, and Count Rosen, arrived at Woolwich, at about half-past 12 o'clock, and was received by General Sir George Murray, G.C.B. and I. G. C. H., Master General of the Ordnance; Lieut.-General Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B., and G.C.H.; Commandant of the Garrison; Col. Sir Frederick Smith, C.B., Inspector-gen. of the Royal Engineers; Col. Cockburn, Col. Paterson, Col. Lacy, Col Cleaveland, Col. J. E. Jones, Assistant Adjutant-General; Col. Dynely, C.B.; Lieut.-Colonel Dansey, C.B.; Lieut.-Colonel Boothby, C.B.; Lieut.-Colonel Hall, C.B.; Lieut.-Col Blackley, Lieut.-Col Whatty, Lieut. Colonel Colquhoun, Major Harding, K.H.; Major Sandilands, Brigade-Major Cuppage of the Royal Artillery, and Brigade-Major Sanford of the Royal Engineers, and Captain Bolders, M.P. who arrived with the Master General.

On His Royal Highness alighting, with his suite, at the residence of Lord Bloomfield, the Governor received him at the entrance with a Russian salute on the drum. Lord Bloomfield in front of the establishment for the first or practical class of the gentle men cadets. The field battery was under the command of Captain Tyden

The Grand Duke, immediately on his arrival, entered the residence of Lord Bloomfield, and partook of an elegant dejeuner with the principal officers of the Russian and British services present, and at half-past 12 o'clock proceeded through the Royal Arsenal to visit the various departments. The first place his Imperial Highness entered was the boring department, at the entrance of which Lord Bloomfield introduced the Grand Duke to Lieut.-Colonel Dundas, who has the charge of it and the foundry. The beautiful machinery recently erected by Napier for boring and turning the best description of brass guns by aid of steam was in full operation; and the whole of the process was minutely examined by the distinguished visitors. In another wing of the department was witnessed the engraving of royal arms and other ornaments generally executed on brass guns and the finishing of musket-stocks and barrels. After visiting the spacious foundry, his Imperial Highness entered the laboratory department, at the entrance of which Lord Bloomfield introduced the Grand Duke to Colonel Cockburn and Lieutenant-Colonel Dansey; and on visiting the branch of the finish likewise where percussion caps are made, and the igniting composition applied the whole process was explained by Col. Dansey, and the Grand Duke appeared so interested in examining every detail, that he remained witnessing the whole hour and upwards, and in making personal remarks was very nearly half an hour. His Imperial Highness then proceeded to the branch of the establishment where balls are made by pressure by a powerful machine invented by Napier, and worked in the greatest ease by hand; and on leaving this branch, entered the model-room, where specimens of almost every description of shot, shells, and rockets and rocket tubes, are preserved; and subsequently visited the laboratory for making harness department, proceeding to enter into very minute particulars to every object of interest which came under his observation.

After leaving the harness branch of the building, where 10,000 rounds per week could be equipped on the shortest notice, the Grand Duke glanced at the extensive ranges of ship and garrison guns, and piles of balls and shells, in the grounds of the Royal Arsenal, and then entered a square where old guns are deposited, and examined some brass guns recovered from the wreck of the Royal George, at Portsmouth, and several from the wreck of the Mary Rose, after they had been several hundred years under water. In the same square is the garment in a 9-pounder gun which burst last year during the experiments with heavy ordnance at Deal, with the particulars of which the Grand Duke appeared to be deeply interested.

On entering the proof department, his Imperial Highness tried the effect of a her caused to fall upon a tube by pulling a thong six feet in length, and the tube fired in the vent of a 24-pounder by the force of the hammer descending upon it. In one of the buildings in the proof department are kept a selection of guages for measuring the diameter of every kind of shot used in the service, and the exterior and interior of every description of shell, and a beautiful machine for measuring the bore of every size of ordnance pieces used in the naval or military service. A piece of ordnance, a handsome and perfect 24 pounder brass gun, was presented to his Imperial Highness by the population, through the medium of a fin drachm pressure of 30lb. to the square inch, and on the plug being withdra from the vent of the gun, the water gushed in a height of about 30 feet, from a cock which had been applied. In one of the rooms of the proof square are dep sited a number of guns on various principles, which have been submitted to the select committee, and the Grand Duke examined them all very minutely

On leaving the proof department his Imperial Highness went on board the Jaffida convict-ship, and went over the whole vessel. There are at pres ent on board this ship 300 of the convicts employed at work in the dockyard of the arsenal at the time. His Imperial Highness then visited the saw-mill and afterwards left the Royal Arsenal on horseback, with his suite and a brilliant staff of officers, for the garrison.

On arriving in front of the splendid barracks for the Royal Artillery in the garrison at Woo wich, his Imperial Highness was received by the whole of the garrison, consisting of the two companies of the battalion of the Royal Sappers and Miners, and eight companies of the Royal Marines at present doing duty at Woolwich, with the bands of the respective corps, and a salute was fired from the royal brass battery.

The whole of the troops, headed by their bands, marched past the Grand Duke in slow and quick time, headed by Lieut. General Bloomfield, with his immediate staff officers, Colonel Dansey, Major Colonel Blackley, Major Sandilands, and Brigade Major Cuppage. Colonel Parke, C.B., Commandant of the Royal Marines, gave the word of command for the whole of the troops, and Colonel Blackley the word for the whole of the Royal Artillery. Major Lynn, Royal Engineers, headed the Royal Sappers and Miners when they marched past Lieut. Colonel the Hon. W. Arbuthnott and Lieut. Colonel Macbean paraded with the battalion of the Royal Artillery; and Lieut. Colonel Powell and Lieut Colonel Gibsone with the companies of Royal Marines.

The exercises occupied about an hour, and at four o'clock p.m. the troops proceeded to visit the Royal Military academy, where his Imperial Hi received by the gentlemen cadets under Captain Burnaby, and afterwards occupied about half an hour in going over the institution. On leaving the grounds of the Royal Military academy, two of the Ordnance guns were fired in front of the fired twenty one rounds in honour of the distinguished visitors.

At half-past four o'clock the three troops of the Royal Horse Artillery in detachments of 6 guns each, and the field batteries of Royal Artillery under Colonel Cleaveland, assembled on the Common, and marched past in the usual manner in review order. The Horse Artillery afterwards went through their exercises in superior manner, notwithstanding the wet state of the ground, and concluded the exercises for the day at half-past five o'clock.

His Imperial Highness and the distinguished officers and members of the Russian embassy who accompanied him, with a select number of British officers, dined with Lord Bloomfield at his residence in the evening, and the Grand Duke slept at the Royal Arsenal. Major General Sir T. Downman a residence in the Arsenal was called up for the remainder of the officers.

TUESDAY.—His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Michael having repeated during the night at the residence of Lord Bloomfield, in the Royal Arsenal, in question and answer with Major Gen. Sir George Murray, arose from an early hour in the morning of Tuesday, in consequence of the number of officers entering and leaving the Arsenal in full costume to communicate the wishes of Commander-in-chief relative to the duties required in the different departments tention of the Grand Duke to visit before leaving Woolwich.

At precisely eleven o'clock, am., his Imperial Highness, attended by Captain Meynell, R.N., and accompanied by Duke Dolgorouky, and the other distinguished personages, as on the previous day, left the Royal Arsenal, with Sir Geo Murray, Lord Bloomfield, &c., &c.

On arriving in front of the Garrison-barracks, a royal salute was fired from the mortar battery at the west end of the guard-mounting parade, the Grand Duke and the brilliant staff of officers on horseback, all in full costume, having a standard bearer, proceeded along the entire length of the guard-mounting parade on their way to the Repository grounds, and, on reaching the entrance of that beautiful and interesting spot, Lord Bloomfield introduced to his Imperial Highness the Royal Engineer officer, Mr Lee the clerk of the works of the valuable contents of the extensive grounds and the Rotunda. Upwards of 200 of the Royal Artillery ing arrived, were stationed at the garrison guns. Guns and heavy ordnance models exhibited to the Grand Duke the ingenious modes by which large guns, of from forty to fifty cwt., are placed on their carriages when required for service, and moved backwards or forwards when necessary to change their position. Similar exercises were exercised with a 10 inch mortar, to show how it could be raised from the ground, and placed on a small flat four-wheeled carriage for use when engaged in the field of battle. The interesting exercises carried on nearly a whole hour, and his Imperial H ness examined all the details in the most particular manner, and appeared to comprehend at once the principles of the movements, and the advantages to be obtained by them in rendering the duties of the British artillery man more easy, and more quickly effective, than by the plans adopted in other countries. At the conclusion of the Repository exercises, which were carried on under the eye of Lieutenant-Colonel Macbean, the Grand Duke entered the Rotunda, and on the right hand witnessed a very handsomely constructed representation of a fount formed on the most beautiful principles of hydraulic science. The moulds are made for Mehemet Ali for discharging balls of fifteen inches in diameter, or wards of 400lb. weight. His Imperial Highness went round the whole of the interior of the Rotunda, and across the centre, and it is impossible to describe the objects which attracted his attention most as he had an opportunity every thing, and almost all called forth some observation or marked notice.

On leaving the Rotunda, the Grand Duke ogfered a private model-room, not the numbers granted to the members of the Royal Artillery, Sir Alexander Dick son, and witnessed a representation of bridges which had been constructed by the Royal Sappers and Miners, for the passage of troops and heavy ordnance over ha dismantled bridges, and the whole process was carried on and brought to a happy termination for the glory of England, by Field Marshal the Duke of Welnominates to one o'clock. Imperial Highness left the Repository grounds and proceeded to one of the barrack rooms of gunners and drivers of the Artillery, in the western wing, and also entered one in the eastern wi upon both occasions, dinner, in parcels of four soup, meat, potatoes, and beer, and when he found the whole so good, he said, "Bravo, bon, boo," evidently plea with the excellent fare supplied to the humblest ranks in the British service.

Grand Duke afterwards entered the guard-house, in front of which a guard was received by the guard under arms. His Imperial Highness then proceeded through the grand centre archway and visited the reading-room of the non-commissioned officers, which is well supplied with the London daily newspapers, and a great number of the best periodical publications of the present age. The l contains many thousand volumes of valuable standard works, in history sciences, and various branches of literature, with globes, maps, and va reference.

His Imperial Highness on leaving the non commissioned officers library, p ceeded to the stables for the horses of the field batteries, and witnessed the mode of the men in harnessing their horses, orders having been given at that moment that the Horse Artillery and field batteries should proceed to the marshes at ten minutes before three. The hour eventually named. The Grand Duke first visited the farriers' shop, and asked the age of the horses, and how long they were considered fit for service. The building where the soldiers messes are cooked next engaged his Imperial Highness's attention, as did every phase of the horse in pers ance in the garrison On entering the school for the children all boys of the non commissioned officers, gunners and drivers, Lord Bloomfield introduced his Imperial Highness to the Rev. M. D. Scott, one of the chaplains of the garrison, who conducted him over the school, in which were present upwards of 300 scholars, who are taught general education by intelligent and fully qualified non-commissioned officers appointed for the purpose. In a separate building in school for girls, over which his Imperial Highness was also conducted by the Rev M. R Scott. The Grand Duke, after visiting the library of the gunners and drivers, which is well supplied with newspapers, and the publications, returned since the field battery stables, and passing through the riding school attached to Royal Horse Artillery branch, proceeded to visit the hospital.

When his Imperial Highness arrived at the entrance of this spacious building, constructed on such an extensive scale, in case of necessity, as to afford room for 700 beds for sick, the Director General of the Ordnance Medical Department, J.
John Webb, K.C.H., was introduced to the illustrious visitor, and conducted him over the principal part of the establishment.

On leaving the hospital, the Grand Duke proceeded to the grand depôt, when Lord Bloomfield introduced to his Imperial Highness Lieut-Colonel Gardiner, Assistant Director General in charge of the grand depôt, Major-General Sir Tho
Downman, C.B. and K.C.H., Director General of the Royal Artillery, Army

absent on leave, Lieut.-Colonel Chalmer and Wm. Young, Esq., Commissary of the Field Train Department, conducted the Grand Duke over the depôt, where he witnessed sixty-six pieces of ordnance, mostly nine-pounders, but including several twelve and twenty-four pounders, mounted on carriages, and all ready in every respect for immediate field service at one moment's notice.

The next place visited by his Imperial Highness was the barracks of the Royal Sappers and Miners, where the Grand Duke was received by Colonel Sir George Hosie, Commandant of that branch of the Ordnance corps, and Brigade Major Sandham, of the Royal Engineers, who had previously left the staff to be present in their own department to receive him. His Imperial Highness went over the barrack rooms, examined the handsome arms recently issued to the men, and appeared to admire them much, and then inspected the great variety of curiosities, models, specimens of woods highly polished, coins, petrifactions, and other interesting objects, besides drawings of bridges and models of pontoons, and other articles connected with their branch of the service. The museum attached to the library is daily acquiring foreign productions of a valuable and interesting nature, as the companies abroad take great interest in forwarding such as they think worthy of preservation, that they may have the gratification of seeing them on their return to their native country.

The Grand Duke, with the brilliant staff of his own and British officers, on leaving the barracks of the Royal Sappers and Miners, again returned to the Royal Arsenal, but apparently with the view of taking a circuitous route to the marshes; and by the time the distinguished visitors emerged at the south-east gate of the Arsenal into the Plumstead-road the Royal Horse Artillery and field batteries had passed at full gallop, on the way to the marshes.

On entering the marshes an imposing scene was presented to the eye of the Grand Duke, the three troops of Horse Artillery and the three field batteries being drawn up near the entrance—the Royal Horse Artillery, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Cobbe, and the field batteries under the command of Colonel Cleaveland. In various parts of the marshes were stationed large detachments of the Foot Artillery. At a range of 800 yards, the men for practice practice were under the charge of Major Dalton, another detachment at a range of 900, and a party under the charge of Major Armstrong were stationed at General Miller and Colonel Dundas's guns, at a range of 1,300 yards, the whole of these troops being under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Grantham. Practice in the marshes commenced from ten-inch and eight-inch howitzers and an eighteen pounder gun, and the Grand Duke and the principal officers present having taken up a station on the left, very near the works erected to imitate a fortification, had an excellent view of the effects of the shells and shot, and the firing was very good and effective. The field batteries were then drawn up at a range of 300 yards under Major Wood, and fired several rounds of case shot.

They then retired and took up a position at 600 yards distance from the target in a line with the Royal Horse Artillery, who commenced firing first at this range, and at the third round knocked down a considerable part of the target; and at the fourth round caused the fallen piece of wood to separate in large splinters, which were thrown high into the air. The field batteries, also, made excellent practice from this range, with shot and shrapnel shells of a most destructive nature. Rocket practice was carried on from this range, under the command of Captain Gossett, and their discharges were very good, and, in general, correct in their flight and aim.

The practice in the marshes was concluded by firing four rounds from General Miller's gun with a solid shot of upwards of one hundred pounds weight, and four rounds from Colonel Dundas's 68-pounder gun, and the aim was remarkably correct on each occasion, the shot falling close to the target, and only in one instance about a foot eastward. The Grand Duke seemed greatly interested with his practice, and examined the guns, the mode of discharge, the barrel being by a flint lock, the same as was used for muskets before the introduction of percussion caps, and the other by tubes, the action of discharge being communicated to both guns by pulling a thong six feet in length.

His Imperial Highness left the marshes at a quarter before four o'clock, and proceeded to the residence of Lord Bloomfield in the Royal Arsenal, where he partook of a déjeuné à la fourchette with the principal officers, the band of the Royal Artillery being present during some of their finest airs.

About ten minutes before five o'clock a field battery under the command of Major Wood fired a salute to announce that the Grand Duke had entered one of her Majesty's carriages with four horses, and was followed by Prince Dalgorouky, Lord Bloomfield, and Captain Meynell, and immediately left for town. General Sir George Murray, with Captain Bobiero, left at the same time, and the other Russian officers followed in plain clothes, having substituted them for their military costumes. Baron Brunow, M. de Berg, and M. Benkhausen arrived about two o'clock, at the gate-house, in plain clothes, and accompanied the distinguished visitors to the marshes, and returned in the evening to town.

To the preceding details of the Artillery exercises, we are enabled to add a series of illustrations, which will convey to the reader a more correct idea of the effective state of the practice than would whole pages of letter-press:—

TAKING UP POSITION.

Several brigades of Horse Artillery occupied the right of the line, the centre being formed of that portion of the battalions who perform, at head-quarters, infantry duty; supplying the numerous guards required for the protection of the Royal Arsenal, military stores, barracks, &c. &c. On the left were various brigades of Foot Artillery, now denominated "Batteries." Of the movements of the latter our artist has availed himself; and we have the gratification of offering to our readers some of the most interesting features presented during the morning.

The various movements by the separate branches of this noble service were executed with a precision perfectly astonishing, and elicited the warmest encomiums, not only on the scientific principles on which they were founded, but the perfection with which these were brought into practical use.

The above engraving represents a field battery gun taking up its position in a canter. The piece of ordnance is attached, or "limbered up" to an ammunition carriage, capable of carrying two gunners, or privates, whilst the drivers are also drilled so as to be able to serve at the gun in action, in case of casualties.

Having reached its destination, and been detached or "unlimbered" from the front carriage, we see the action of loading; the ramrod having at its other extremity a sheep skin mop, larger than the bore of the piece, and called "a sponge." This instrument, before loading, is invariably used, whilst the touch-hole or "vent" is covered by the thumb of the gunner especially numbered off for this important duty, and the air being thus excluded, the fire, which often remains within the bore, attached to either portions of cartridge-case or wadding, is extinguished. Serious accidents have been known to occur from a neglect of this important preliminary to loading; as a melancholy instance, a poor fellow may be seen about the Woolwich barracks, both of whose arms were blown off above the elbow joint, whilst ramming home a cartridge before the sponge had been properly applied.

If it is deemed essential to keep up a fire upon the enemy during a temporary retreat, or in order to avoid an overwhelming body of cavalry directed against guns unsupported by infantry, in that case the limber remains as close as possible to the field-piece, as shown in our next engraving.

The skilful provision made against the various contingencies likely to occur in action formed a most interesting portion of the military display. A wheel is supposed to be shattered by the enemy's shot, and the gun thereby disabled for the moment; this accident is met by supporting the piece upon a handspike, firmly grasped by one or two men on each side, according to the weight of the ordnance, whilst a spare wheel, usually suspended at the back of "the tumbril," or ammunition waggon, is speedily obtained, and in a few moments made to remedy the loss; as represented.

The extraordinary rapidity with which a gun can be dislodged from its carriage, and every portion of its complicated machinery scattered upon the ground, is hardly to be believed until witnessed; but the wonder is increased tenfold on seeing with what magical celerity the death-dealing weapon can be put together again. These operations will be readily understood by an examination of the accompanying illustrations. In the first, the cannon is lying useless upon the earth, one wheel already forms the rude resting place of a gunner, whilst the other is in the act of being displaced.

By the application of a rope round the termination of the breech, and the lifting of the trail of the carriage, care being previously taken that the trunnions are in their respective sockets, a very slight exertion of manual labour is required to put the gun into fighting trim. That we may be perfectly understood, especially by our fair readers, we will add that the trunnions are the short round pieces of iron, or brass, projecting from the sides of the cannon, and their relative position can be easily ascertained by a glance at the gun occupying the fore ground of the illustration, where the dismantling is depicted.

It may not be deemed malapropos to relate, that some years ago Mr. Joseph Hume moved for "a return of the expenses of the Horse Artillery in 1794." The Secretary of the Ordnance was present, and met the economist's motion by handing him over a page of blank paper. The "great arithmetician" looked surprised, but became confused on learning that the total expense was thereon represented, as no such branch as the Horse Artillery existed in the British army at the period named.

SUPERB SWORD FOR PRESENTATION TO MAJOR OUTRAM.

This magnificent testimonial of British valour has been manufactured by Messrs. Widdowson and Veale, of the Strand. It is composed of standard gold, and contains nearly two pounds weight of the precious metal. The handle is studded with brilliants, interlaced by bands of laurel, surmounted with a lion's head, beautifully modelled; the cross is also elaborately enriched with brilliants of the rose, shamrock, and thistle, on royal purple ground. The scabbard of rich crimson velvet, is gorgeously mounted; the upper compartment has, upon a purple enamel ground, St George and the Dragon; the centre has a lion and tiger in combat, beautifully executed; and the lower part is covered with military emblems. The blade is richly ornamented in purple and gold, and bears the following inscription:—

Presented to Major James Outram, 23rd Regiment Bombay Native Light Infantry, in token of the regard of his friends, and the high estimation in which he is held for the intrepid gallantry which has marked his career in India; but more especially his heroic defence of the British Residency at Hyderabad, in Scinde, on the 15th Feb., 1843, against an army of 8,000 Beloochees with six guns.

On the reverse side is inscribed—

Major James Outram. Sans peur, et sans reproche.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE

Auber's "Gustavus" was revived at this house on Monday night last, but went off as something "stale, flat," and, we fear, very "unprofitable" to the manager. The only part of the performance worth mentioning was Giubilei's Ankerstroem, which was not only in the highest decree creditable to him as a vocalist but as an actor of no ordinary merit. The ballet of "The Port" concluded the evening's entertainment, with its usual deservedly brilliant success; but Mr. Bunn must do something more than reproduce operas that have been worn threadbare by their too frequent use, and import and get up one or two showy ballets in the course of the season. A new farce and Donizetti's opera, "The Favourite," are announced as being in preparation.

HAYMARKET.

On Monday night a new comedietta in two acts, entitled "Old Parr," was produced at this genuine establishment, which afforded an infinite pleasure to a numerous and fashionable audience. The principal object of interest in the piece was personated by Mr. Farren, with such truth, sentiment, and artistical skill, as leaves nothing on a par with it that we know of, unless we except his "Grandfather Whitehead," and even then we are forced to divide our applause, and say, "PAR nobile fratrum!" But a truce with jesting,—for never came there before the public a performance of more exquisite genuineness than that of Farren's Old Parr. It excited a melancholy reverence, that we do not recollect to have experienced before; we felt we were in the presence of

The patriarch of seven-score years and ten, the Methusaleh of modern times, and as he gradually declined into his growing senility, under the wonderful histrionic art of Farren, we for a moment forgot ourselves in a sympathy with the mimic scene, and almost wept at the babbling of the poor old man. From an ability that the style of the writing in this piece has to that of "Grandfather Whitehead," we concluded before we heard so that it was the production of Mark Lemon; for it abounds with many of his natural, unaffected home sentiments, and, coupled with them, such admirable measure taken of Farren's unequalled assumption of extreme old age We speak advisedly when we say that were we to abstract ourselves from the recollection of his ultra-drollery in some parts, that great actor's impersonation of Lear would be deeply impressive. Why should it not? Garrick played the very antipodes of tragedy and comedy. The piece was most eminently and deservedly successful.

PRINCESS'S.

This truly elegant house opened last Monday with ("continued from last season") Balfe's opera of "Geraldine" the most remaining in "statu quo," with one exception, which was that of Miss Gould, for the first time, in the part of Phillippa. The opera went off with increased éclat, and was succeeded by a new one-act piece, from the pen of Mr. Bourcault, called the "Old Guard," which was most enthusiastically received, for, independent of the excellent dramatic situation and eloquence of the piece itself, it introduced to the frequenters of this charming little theatre two of the most exquisite performers that we have witnessed for a long, long time—the captivating Eugenie Prosper (late of Mr. Mitchell's French company at the St. James's) and Mr. Morris Barnett. The former, in the part of Melenie, and the latter, as Haverone, her father, elicited some "true tears" from a crowded audience, by their exquisite pathos and genuine assumption of character. The ballet of "Giselle, or the Wills," followed, in which Miss Bahn and Mr. Gilbert made their first appearance at this house.

OLYMPIC.

On Monday Mr. J. Russell appeared at this house in poor Power's celebrated "Happy Man;" and, with all heartfelt regrets for the melancholy loss of the original, we feel convinced that he did not leave one behind him who could be so truly esteemed his "fellow" as Mr. Russell. He was frequently and loudly applauded, and is an acquisition of the highest value to this or any other theatre in the kingdom.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

MR. LUMLEY. The spirited entrepreneur of her Majesty's Theatre is at present in Italy catering with his usual judgment and liberality for the entertainments of the opera next season, which, as we learn, are intended to "outshine all rivalry!"

A NEW PRIMA DONNA.—A débutante, with the ponderous name of Madame Montenegro Hermen, has recently appeared at Amsterdam, where she created an extraordinary furore. She is to sing all the celebrated maitre du chant, Signor Celli—is engaged to make her début at La Scala, Milan, in November next, after which she will pay our metropolis a visit, and appear at her Majesty's Theatre early in the ensuing year. She is described as possessing an extraordinary soprano voice, with a highly cultivated and enthusiastic style of singing.

M. AUBER.—The distinguished composer of "Masaniello," "Gustavus," "Fra Diavolo," and other productions, alike remarkable for their originality and effect, intends to visit us in the course of next season, and conduct one of his own operas at the Princess's Theatre. This is on the part of international exchange: we exportation our countrymen—they are hospitably received abroad,—and the foreigners in return send their aristes here to pick up the crumbs which have been denied to our compatriots at the table where they are the legitimate, and ought to be most welcome guests! Alas! "far sought and dear bought," seems to be the motto most recommendatory of anything now-a-days to the once-national Englishman!

THE COLOSSEUM.—This magnificent pile has been purchased by Mr. Montague, the proprietor of the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, Oxford-street, who intends to give entertainments in it on a novel and most magnificent scale.

MUSICAL FESTIVALS.—"Last week," says the Hereford Times, "we gave a few interesting particulars respecting the annual festivals of the three choirs and others. We trust that the following memoranda will prove acceptable to our readers. The oratorio, the "Messiah," produced, for the benefit of the Foundling Hospital in London, the following sums:—From 1749 to 1759 (when the great composer died, 6,936; from 1760 to 1777, under the direction of Messrs. J. C. Smith and Stanley, 4,891; making a total of 10,297. The receipts at the commemoration at Handel's Westminster Abbey, in 1784, amounted to 12,735*l.*; and the receipts of the musical festival held in 1834, and the jubilee of King William and Queen Adelaide, amounted to 2,981*l.* 2*s.*; the expenses are said to about 1,000*l.* These pieces were divided into four and parts, between the Royal Society of Musicians, established in 1738, the New Musical Fund (1786—now defunct), the Choral Fund (1791), and the Royal Academy of Music, instituted in 1822. The great festival at York, in 1823, produced 16,174*l.*; and the one in 1828, 13,000*l.* The first meeting at Birmingham, in 1788, produced only 800*l.*; the one in 1834, 13,557. The Chester meeting, in 1821, 5,362*l.* The Derby, in 1822, 3,723*l.* The Edinburgh, in 1824, 4,940*l.* A grand festival will take place in the modern Athens (Edinburgh) this week under the direction of Sir H. R. Bishop, a magnificent music hall having lately been erected, with a splendid organ. A noble structure is in the course of erection at Liverpool, for the purpose of holding festivals and other large meetings; it is expected to be completed by the autumn of 1844." Why have we not some fitting edifice in the metropolis exclusively devoted to the purpose of charitable musical performances? Exeter Hall is not spacious enough either in its interior of "mind or body" for the liberal and comprehensive canon of universal liberality.

MR. WEBSTER. We learn that the active and liberal manager of the Haymarket Theatre has become lessee of the Theatre Royal, Liverpool. We heartily wish him success; but there is such a thing as having too many irons in the fire.

SIVORI.—This peerless violinist continues his extensive provincial tour with quite as much success as his great maestro predecessor Paganini.

ROYAL POLYTECHNIC INSTITUTION.—The hydro-electric machine at this institution has given a new impetus to the study of the phenomena of electricity. In the numerous experiments, as which have been present the most distinguished philosophers of Europe, some very novel and astounding results have been obtained. In fact, the scientific world must feel indebted to the directors for their [illegible] exertions in promoting this object, and their liberality in placing the [illegible] machine at the disposal of such men as Dumas, Faraday, Brande, D'Arcy, Quetelet, &c. Longbotham's opera, the microscope is also an object of much attraction, although it is very evident that the exhibitor has yet a good deal of difficulty to overcome in obtaining proper objects. Time and experience will, however, remedy this.

The constant hoops, occasioned by the proceedings of the Repealers in Ireland, the Rebeccaites in Wales, and the free church rioters in the Highlands of Scotland, if it does no other good, will help to improve railway dividends. On the Grand Junction line orders are carried from Birmingham to Liverpool at the rate of 9s. to 10s. a head, so that the sending down a regiment of 900 men, such as the 94th, which arrived in Liverpool on Friday, must have realized little less than £400 from Birmingham, and perhaps half as much from Weedon to that place.

On Monday morning two couples presented themselves, arrayed in wedding garments, and accompanied with the usual paraphernalia, at Bromley church, as candidates for the joys of wedlock. Unfortunately the Bishop of Rochester was engaged at the time of their arrival in the delivery of the visitation charge to the clergy of his diocese; the ceremony, of course, could not be proceeded with, much to the chagrin of the parties more immediately concerned, who were compelled by this contre temps to return to their homes, and enjoy another day of single blessedness.

Information was received at the Police offices in Liverpool on Saturday last, that a great number of thieves distinguished in the metropolis as the "swell mob") had left London by railway on the previous day for that town It is supposed that these ingenious artists are on their way to Ireland, in order to assist in any new distruction of property that may take place in the present unsettled state of things in that country.

The Prussian Government having determined to put down gambling in the funds, the Minister of Justice has announced to the Council of State a Bill, declaring that all fictitious operations in national or foreign stocks, and particularly all sales or purchases for the end of the month, are to be considered null and void; that no parties, consequently, shall be bound to pay the difference, and that fines shall be laid on the subject be brought before the tribunals, not only shall the engagement be non suited, but both parties punished, if possible, by a fine proportioned to the sum at stake.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

The present season of the year vibrates between the turf and the [illegible]. Oakdaleston was next to declare when he was master of the Pytchley. When the October meetings were on the tapis, the sporting squire used to hunt on the Monday evening, by means of relays of hacks, galloped over to Newmarket, some seventy odd miles, race on Tuesday and then galloped back into Northamptonshire, so as to be ready for the morrow's meet. Thus it is with the close of the season. Cricketing as it does not in the Broadlands and the racer on the plains—giving the negative to the old saying that two things cannot be done at once to the purpose We are coming fast to our moving narratives of the field and albeit the race-course is our office for the nonce. On Monday last the Second October week began at Newmarket, and if the Bores and the other seasonable deities were a little out of temper, the Goddess of Sport was propitious—and great is Diana of the Ephesians! Five more ample days' meeting are now seldom been discussed; and if they did knock on the head the hopes of a few sanguine gamblers on the odds—"the more mischief the better sport." With the next ensuing number our space nor the convenience of our readers will permit us to meddle: to the great issues we, therfore, confine ourselves.

Of the great south country two-year-old stakes, run for in "the full," the Cleaverwell course off during the week that with which we are now dealing. For this event, so influential upon the Derby betting, one of Scott's 1844 lot was backed at even, and for the Derby at 10 to 1. This was Mr. Watt's Voltri. A field of thirteen, and the [illegible] to every one of which the name of the Duke of Cumberland's stable went off as harmlessly as a bottle of ginger beer. Voltri was beaten without making even a pretence at a race, and straightway went to the dogs in betting—great times for the fielders. Next to nothing was done, and before it is to present interest, was the Cesarewitch, a handicap on which very extended business has been done. More horses were backed, and more started for it, than for any race ever run over Newmarket heath. A field of five-and twenty actually ran at the post—a field of [illegible] except the Derby. Count [illegible] was [illegible] as [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Col. Peel's b f Zenobia, by Slane .. .. (Chapple) 1
Mr. Wreford's b c by Camel, out of Wadrasta .. (J. Day, jun.) 2
Mr. Goodman's b c Running Rein, by the Saddler .. (Buckle) 3

Betting—Even on Voltri; 3 to 1 agst Running Rein; 9 to 2 agst Wadrasta; 5 to 1 agst Col. Peel's two; and 10 to 1 agst Antler

The start was one of the best ever seen, not more than a length having intervened between the first and the last when they quitted the post. Running Rein took a slight lead, and with the Wadrasta colt, the Sea-Kale colt, Zenobia, and two or three at his side, made strong running to the horde, when Zenobia went past him, and was hard held by a length. Wadrasta leading Running Rein for second by a length. The latter was run in very closely by Col. Peel's colt and Antler; Voltri was the pace for nearly the whole distance, but died away at the end, and at the finish was three lengths from Running Rein; Crosby, little Wally colt, Wanton colt, and Monkey, were beaten off. Running Rein started under an objection by Mr. Watt.

The Cesarewitch Stakes of 25 sovs. each, 15 ft., with 300 added by the Grand Duke Cesarewitch, for three-year-olds; 8 st. 7 lb. each; the winner of which; the owner of the second horse to receive 50 sovs. out of the stakes. The winner of the Doncaster St. Leger or Cup, or Great Yorkshire Handicap, to have carried 10lb. extra; or the winner of any handicap between the day of publishing the weights and the time of running 3 miles, of two 3lbs. extra; no horse more than 10lbs. extra. Two miles and a quarter. (40 Subs.)

Mr. Bowes's Corranna, by Hymen, 4 yrs. 7st. 11lb .. (W. Boyce) 1
Mr. Bell's Wiseacre, 3 yrs. 6st. 9lb. .. .. (Pettit) 2

Betting—6 to 1 agst Rectangle; 7 to 1 each agst Trueboy, The Curtier, and Arcanus, 10 to 1 each agst Wiseacre, Pitaroy, and Armytage; 20 to 1 each agst St. Francis and Corranna, and 100 to 1 each agst Newminster. A good start having been obtained at the first word, Newminster and Rectangle were the first and second pominons, followed by Armytage, Fairbairn, Wiseacre, Piggens, Corranna, Rowland Stephenson, Trueboy, The Curtier, Arcanus, Spicer, Winesour, and several other light weights, the heavy ones and Corranna lying off. Except that they lessened horses now and then changed places, the front rank remained as described to the new ground, where the two leaders and Farsley, having had quarters-and-a-half returned, and the last left with Rectangle and Corranna, who had gradually worked forwards the front after passing the ditch, taking his place at her side. Armytage and Wise acre were next them, and fourth was Trueboy, the two Saints, and Arcanus at their heels. Corranna kept forcing the pace until near the bottom of the bushes hill, and then taking the lead from Rectangle, went on with the running, and won by half a length. Wiseacre fourth, Rectangle in the end and beat her for second by a length. Nearly two lengths from the last were Armytage, St. Lawrence, St. Francis, and Trueboy, an near together that we cannot venture to say which was fourth. Arcanus and Saxifrage were also with the leading set up. Lady Eleanor, Dennybrook, and several others were beaten off before coming through the ditch, and Farsley lost any chance at 10lb. might have given him, by falling as soon as he got on the flat.

The Royal Stakes of 200 sovs. each, 12o ft., and only 25, &c., for three yrs old.
Mr. Bowes's Catherstone, 9st. 3lb. .. .. (F. Butler) 1

Lord Milltown's Bridegroom, 3 yrs .. .. (F. Butler) 3

Betting—2 to 1 agst Dr. Hill; 4 to 1 agst Treaty, 5 to 1 agst the Mecca filly, and 6 to 1 agst Mr. White's filly.

The Stag filly made the running, followed by the Mecca filly and Emmeth, the Doctor lying in the rear. At the dip Eliza dropped off, and the Doctor, taking up the running, won cleverly by a length, Bridgeroom a bad third. Marmgave was left behind at starting, and never got up. Lord Exeter claimed the winner.

The Town Plate of 50f. Winner to be sold for 200f, &c.
Mr. Batson's Rowland .. .. (Whitehouse) 1
Mr. J. Day's Morality, 4 yrs .. .. (Wakefield) 2

Betting—5 to 2 agst Stockman, 3 to 1 agst Crookman, and 5 to 1 agst Morality. Cracks was won off at the top of his speed, and made running to the distt, where Reverence took it and went on with it to the T.Y.C. post, Donnybrook then made an attempt to wear it on, but brought it a distance from home; Rowland then went in front, followed by Morality, and won easy by a length; Billingham Lass a good third, and Reverence well up.

The Bentley Stakes of 100 sovs each, h ft; for two-yr-old Colts, 8st 7lb. Last three quarters of a mile.

Lord Chesterfield's Joan of Arc .. .. (G. Edwards) 0

Rowing Match.—A sculler's wager for £10 aside was rowed for on Wednesday, between Goodman and Sanlter, both well-known men, the distance being from Westminster to Putney The start took place at near four o'clock, and was very even, there being no perceptible advantage in favour of either side, and was kept up for a considerable distance, when Goodman began to show a lead, which, small and small until nearing Lucas's-road, was considerably increased, and went through Vauxhall-Bridge despite the exertions of his adversary, he soon improved, and went through Vauxhall-Bridge (then in the middle place) nearly two lengths ahead. At the Red House he had gained four more, and went increasing his lead to the finish, all the way, and rowed with great pluck, but could not overhaul his opponent, who won by about a hundred yards.

Pensioners in Ireland.—The out-pensioners at present in Ireland amount to about 20,000, and according to the late act they will shortly be called into active service, the necessary arrangements being now gone through towards forming their completion, and it is expected that they will be ready for service in January next: earlier, if the state of the country should render such a course advisable. The staff, consisting of a director, organizing officer, &c., will be observed as with those in England. Their uniform will be a blue frock coat, with scarlet cuffs facings, and shoulder straps, with brass crescent similar to that worn by the Marines. The trousers are also to be blue, with broad scarlet stripes. The cap to be of black cloth, with glazed top, surmounted by a cap star. The coat similar to that usually worn by sergeants of infantry, the device on the buttons being a crown with a star. Leinster and Ulster supply a larger number than the other provinces.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

BANKRUPTCY COURT, Oct. 11.

[Before Mr. Commissioner Evans.]

FENNER AND FENNER'S BANKRUPTCY.

The bankrupts, who carried on business as merchants in Fenchurch-street, reappeared before the Court on their final examination. An adjournment was granted, and granted, on the ground of time being required to investigate the accounts they presented, especially in reference to a debt of £26,000, which they allege to be due from a brother at Antwerp, but which liability the brother wholly denies. The bankrupts stated that the whole of the correspondence passing between them and the brother had been destroyed, but they promised to give all the information they could, and, if possible, obtain corroborative evidence. Mr. Commissioner Evans said, it appeared a suspicious affair, and he should require a strict investigation. The bankrupts' debts and liabilities are estimated at from £25,000 to £30,000, and the assets, with the exception of this contested claim upon the brother, are about £70l..

SHERIFFS COURT.

Commission of Lunacy.—A commission de lunatico inquirendo was opened on Wednesday morning, at the Sheriff's Court, Red Lion square, before Francis Barlow, Esq., one of the commissioners in lunacy, and a special jury of 19 freeholders of the county, of whom R. Carpenter, Esq., was foreman, to inquire into the state of mind of Mrs. Harriott Uden, described in the commission as "for merly of No. 29, High-street, Camden-town, but now of Earl's court House Brompton, widow." After a great deal of evidence had been given, and the subject of the inquiry had been examined at considerable length, a dispute arose between the jury whether there had been any proof that she was incapable of managing her affairs; and, after some observations, a show of hands was taken, when the jury appeared unanimous as to the unsoundness of mind; and were also of opinion she was disentitled on the ground of incapacity to manage her affairs, and accordingly they recorded the verdict—"That Mrs. Uden was of unsound mind and incapable of managing herself and affairs from the 2nd June, 1841.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

These sessions commenced on Monday before Mr. Sergeant Adams and the usual number of magistrates. The grand jury having been sworn, the Chairman, after explaining the nature of the duties they were called upon to discharge, informed them that their attendance would be required but for a short time, owing to the extreme lightness of the calendar, there being altogether but seventeen prisoners for trial, twelve of whom were charged with felony, and the remainder with assaults, misdemeanours, &c

Mary Taylor, the wife of a coal porter, residing in Bull-inn-court, in the Strand, was indicted for assaulting her step-daughter, a girl about fifteen years of age.

The prisoner, on the occasion in question, after stripping the girl, beat her severely with a leather strap, at the end of which was an iron buckle. The jury found her Guilty, and the chairman, after commenting upon the extreme brutality of her conduct sentenced her to four months' imprisonment in the house of correction, and at the end of that time to find sureties to keep the peace towards the prosecutrix.—The prosecution was instituted by the authorities of the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields

The other cases tried during the day were not of the slightest public interest.

POLICE.

Mansion House.—Extraordinary Case of Forgery.—A man of respectable appearance, named Josiah James Lovejoy, was brought before the Lord Mayor, in the custody of Daniel Forrester, the officer, charged with having forged a bill of exchange for £50. There was a singular fact connected with the accusing of the bill. Mr. Mullins, of the firm of Burch and Mullins, solicitors to the Committee of Bankers for Protection against Forgeries and Frauds, appeared for the prosecution. The prisoner, who seemed to be in a very dejected state, was undefended.—John Hart, of No. 7, Devonshire-place, Commercial-road, baker, stated that he knew the prisoner well. The acceptance for £50, purporting to be payable at Messrs. Masterman and Co's, and to be accepted by John Hart, was not in his hand writing, neither had he authorised anybody to accept the bill for him. He kept cash at Masterman's house for the last five years, and this bill had been paid by them on his account.—The Lord Mayor: Have you had dealings with the prisoner?—Mr. Hart: Yes, but I always paid him with checks. He is a miller, and I always knew him to be a most respectable man.—Mr. Thomas Brand, cashier in Masterman's banking house, stated that he had seen the indorsing of that gentleman, and had been acquainted with several of his signatures. Mr. John Kempster stated that he had signed his name to the bill as the drawer. The prisoner was a client of his, and was indebted to him money upon three several bills. Witness was in the habit of lending money to the prisoner at times, and upon the occasion to which the bill of exchange referred, the prisoner said it was inconvenient to him to pay the difference between them, but that he had an acceptance which was drawn in blank, and was as good as a note of the Bank of England. Witness took the bill for £50 produced, and kept it until the day it was due, and then he put his name to it as the drawer, for the purpose of presenting it for payment. At Masterman's he endorsed the bill, and received the amount in £50 note, which he paid into his bankers, the London and County bank.—The Lord Mayor: How came you to put your name to the bill as the drawer?—Witness: There was no time to send to Mr. Lovejoy, in Essex.—The Lord Mayor: Then you were the innocent promulgator of the forgery, to a certain extent? Witness: I certainly uttered it, but of course entertained not the least idea that it was a forgery.—The Lord Mayor: Have you anything to say prisoner? Prisoner: Nothing at present.—Mr Hart: I would have placed every confidence in him, and I hope he will be able to exonorate himself.—The prisoner was committed.

On Thursday morning a man, named George Sutherland, was brought before Alderman Hunter, charged with attempting self-destruction. Judge, a police inspector, stated, that at about four o'clock on Wednesday afternoon the accountant suddenly mounted the parapet of the west side of London-bridge, and waving his hat in the air vociferated, "Huzza for Scotland," and then precipitated himself headforemost into the water, and disappeared. The latter, however, it would seem, caused him suddenly to change his mind, as he almost immediately re-appeared, and struck out most vigorously till he was taken up. Henry Sutherland, brother to the accountant, stated that he was a pensioner belonging to the 24th Dragoons, and having come up from Leeds to receive his money had managed to spend it, and in order to enable him to return, he gave him 8s., but that he also spent. He would, however, have no objection to pay for his passage if he could get it. The Alderman go to by the first vessel. As a steam-vessel sailed for Leeds on Friday, the Alderman ordered him to be kept in custody until that time

Bow-street.—Anne Hickey, a woman of the town, forty-five years of age was placed at the bar before Mr. Hall, charged with having attempted to drown herself in the Thames. Myers, the gallant waterman who has saved so many persons from a watery grave, at Waterloo-bridge Wharf, on the 20th Dec. appeared against her. He had seen her running down the steps, and prevented her in the very act of attempting self-destruction. Mr. Hall asked the prisoner what induced her to contemplate self-destruction? The poor woman, with tears streaming down her cheeks, told the magistrate that she was the wife of a steel musician living in Drury lane, who made her walk the streets to get money procured for the daily necessaries of life; and because she did not get as much as he thought she ought, he had ill-used and beaten her until not a limb was free from pain. This he had repeatedly done, and threatened to burn her clothes if she did not bring home more money. Tired of the wretched life she was leading, and smarting under his gross ill-treatment, she had, in a moment of vexation, attempted to put an end to her existence. Mr. Hall, in a manner that imagined he had heard the poor woman's story, he sent an officer with a warrant to apprehend the husband. After a short interval he was brought into the court and put into the dock. He bowed to the magistrate, and the charge was allowed time to wait until under the influence of liquor.—The poor woman then repeated her tale of wretchedness in the hearing of the prisoner, and her evidence was taken down by the clerk.—The fellow was meanwhile shedding the tears of a drunken man.—When called upon to say what he could say in defence of his brutality, he stammered out a rigmarole story about his having been in the army, and the navy, but that he had unfortunately had "the misfortune" to have a considerable sum of money left him, wh a having run through, he had turned street musician. He could not, however, get a livelihood by his profession.—Mr. Hall said his conduct was disgraceful, and he should commit him to prison.—The prisoner was then locked up in default of bail.—Mr. Hall then gave directions that the poor woman should be taken to the workhouse, with a certificate of cause and a full description furnished from him that it should be attended to. In the meantime he gave her some money from the poor-box, which she received with tears of gratitude.

Worship-street.—Charlotte Thomas, a single woman, thirty years of age and Jan. Friend, a married woman, with an infant at her breast, of the same description, were charged before Mr. Broughton, with having in their possession a stolen gown. A land agent in Seward-street, Goswell-street, of £17 odd. The prisoners were lodgers of the prosecutor, occupying separate rooms on the first floor, and the prosecutor retaining the upper rooms as bedrooms for himself and wife. In the front of one of these rooms he had a chest of drawers, in one of which he kept his money, and, on Sunday evening last, on going to church with his sister, had locked up upwards of £20 in the drawer. On return to the entire house in a state of great confusion and disorder, with the contents of several drawers strewed about, and the back parlour and kitchen windows open, as if thieves had been busy on the premises, and had escaped in that way. It was then that the fire was played for two days in investigating the affair, at length traced the robbery to the prisoners, who, in their defence, recriminated on each other, but substantiated the charge against both; and Mr. Bingham fully committed them to Newgate for trial.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AND CALAMITOUS LOSS OF LIFE

At the early hour of two o'clock on Wednesday morning, the inhabitants of St. Martin's-lane and neighbourhood were greatly alarmed by the breaking out of a fire in the premises of Mr. J. Labram, boot and shoemaker, who occupied the shop for so many years well known by the name of Noah's Ark, situate at No. 36, St. Martin's court, which is an exceedingly narrow thoroughfare leading from St. Martin's-lane to Castle-street, near Leicester square. The cause that the fire was discovered by a female who was passing, and whose attention was arrested by seeing a large body of smoke issuing from Mr. Labram's shop-windows. She immediately gave the alarm, when several of the police instantly repaired to the spot, and proceeded to rouse the inmates by knocking violently at the door, and shouting out "Fire." The inhabitants, thus alarmed, were soon seen endeavouring to make a rapid escape, almost in a state of nudity, from the upper part of the house, in front of one of these rooms he had a chest of drawers, in one of which he kept his money, and, on Sunday evening last, on going to church with his sister, had locked up upwards of £20 in the drawer. ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AND CALAMITOUS LOSS OF LIFE

At the early hour of two o'clock on Wednesday morning, the inhabitants of St. Martin's-lane and neighbourhood were greatly alarmed by the breaking out of a fire in the premises of Mr. J. Labram, boot and shoemaker, who occupied the shop for so many years well known by the name of Noah's Ark, situate at No. 36, St. Martin's court, which is an exceedingly narrow thoroughfare leading from St. Martin's-lane to Castle-street, near Leicester square. The cause that the fire was discovered by a female who was passing, and whose attention was arrested by seeing a large body of smoke issuing from Mr. Labram's shop-windows. She immediately gave the alarm, when several of the police instantly repaired to the spot, and proceeded to rouse the inmates by knocking violently at the door, and shouting out "Fire." The inhabitants, thus alarmed, were soon seen endeavouring to make a rapid escape, almost in a state of nudity, from the upper part of the house, in front of the building, which was three stories high. Hardly a quarter of an hour had elapsed before several of the brigade engines arrived; but, owing to the extreme confinement of the passage, could not get quite near the spot, and were therefore obliged to conduct their hoses through the court. The conflagration had by this time gained so much head, that it was feared the destruction of the whole court was inevitable; but, fortunately, the engines were supplied with a plentiful supply of water, that the firemen s end in confining the fire to a comparatively small compass; and the damage to property, although amounting to at least £5,000, was far from being so great as was generally anticipated. The cause of the fire is not known, but it has been ascertained that it commenced in a small room at the back of Mr. Labram's shop, the entire of whose premises are completely destroyed. Several other buildings have been considerably damaged, by the scorching of the flames; among the owners of which are Mr. King, hair dresser; Mr. Barford, comb-maker; Mr. Dalton, comb maker; Mr. Ackermann, confectioner; Mr. Walker, umbrella-maker; Dr. Tweeddale, surgeon; and Mr. Lofling, hair dresser. The stock and furniture belonging to all of these individuals have been much injured, by the water thrown in by the engines. The fire was not entirely extinguished till about five o'clock.

We wish that our account of this calamity stopped here; but it is our painful task to relate that the fire caused the death of three individuals—two children and their mother. A person of the name of Pollock occupied the first floor of the Noah's Ark, in the back room of which he and his family slept; no sooner was the alarm of fire raised, than he immediately ran to the front room to ascertain where the flames were, and on suspecting that the flames were raging directly underneath their sleeping room; in his confusion, he endeavoured to render assistance to his wife and children, but unfortunately the ascending flames drove him back, and he was called out of bed, but was only enabled to rescue three; they were consequently soon overpowered by the smoke, and eventually perished. About eight o'clock in the morning, the firemen discovered their remains in the ruins, which were completely burnt and mutilated; indeed, they were so much injured, that the whole were placed in one shell, and conveyed to the workhouse, there to await the coroner's inquest.

We regret to add that a little boy, between nine and ten years of age, a nephew of Mr. King, was also much injured by a fall. It appears that he was endeavouring to make his escape from the first floor window of his uncle's dwelling, by means of a narrow leaden penthouse, placed immediately above the shop fronts in St. Martin's court, with a view of entering the window of some adjoining house; in so doing, however, in a state of trepidation, he lost his footing, and he fell upon the pavement, a distance of 12 or 14 feet. He was directly picked up, and carried to Charing-cross Hospital, where, upon examination, it was found that he had received some rather severe internal injuries, besides some wounds on the head.

The following is the official report of the damage done at the fire:—

No 36, St. Martin's-court, Mr. J. Labram, boot-maker—burned down. Contents of ditto burned in the ruins. Insured in the Sun Fire Office

Do., Mr. Pollock, lodger. Uninsured.

Do., Mr. King, hair-dresser. Stock supposed to be insured in the County Office

No. 1, St. Martin's-court, Mr. J. Botsford, comb-maker, insured at the Atlas—front slightly scorched, and contents damaged by water and removal

No. 34, Mr. T. Dalton, comb-maker, insured in the County—front severely scorched. Stock and furniture damaged.

No. 35, Mr. W. Ackerman, confectioner, stock and building insured in the Westminster, Crown and Globe Fire-offices—windows burnt out, stock damaged by wat

No. 33, Mr. Walker, umbrella-maker—stock and buildings slightly damaged.

No. 32, St. Martin's-lane—Dr. Tweedlie, surgeon; building and furniture much damaged by water and removal

No. 31, Mr. C. Lofling, hair-dresser—stock insured in the Sun; windows and front much injured, stock and furniture damaged by removal and water.

Daring Robbery on an Officer.—On Monday last a drummer of the Royal Marines absconded from Weedwich, with a ten case, containing a dress uniform coat and spauletties, for which he had been sent by Captain Johns, R.M., commanding the Dockyard Guard. What rendered the robbery more unfortunate, was the fact that the case contained the manuscript of a work upon which Captain Johns had been twelve months engaged.—A Calendar of Victory—giving an account of the principal actions fought from the earliest period, in the compilation of which much labour and research had been expended. The fellow, whose name is Henry Hurlbert, is a native of Chatham, about five feet five inches high, of a dark complexion, hazel eyes, and dark brown hair. He is supposed to have left in one of the Waterman steamers.

Bathing in the Serpentine.—Thomas Grey, a private in the 72nd Highlanders, lost his life whilst bathing in the Serpentine on Sunday morning last, in consequence, it is supposed, of having gone beyond his depth without being able to swim. The body was found in ten minutes afterwards, and conveyed to the Humane Society's receiving office, but the efforts to restore animation were also rather ineffectual.

Death from Suffocation by Foul Air.—A middle-aged man, named Bassy, who was employed to cleanse a drain, about sixteen feet deep, in Gloucester street, Whitechapel, on Saturday last, was so overcome by the stench on attempting to descend, that he fell dead to the bottom. Another man, named Johnson, who humanely tried to rescue him, almost shared a similar fate, but on being conveyed to the London Hospital, was happily resuscitated.

Malicious Outrage.—Information was received at Bow-street police office on Monday morning that late on the 2nd of the present month some evil-disposed persons entered the stable on the premises of Mr. W. Hodges, Mount Sion, Tunbridge Wells, and cut the throat of a valuable pony, the property of P. F. Johnson, Esq. Mr. Hodges has offered a reward of twenty guineas, and Mr. Allington eight guineas, for the apprehension of the wretch who was guilty of so malicious an act.

Embezzlement.—On the night of the 4th instant a youth of the name of Henry Burt, who is only seventeen years of age, and who was lately employed by Mr. W. Whittington, auctioneer, of Neath, Glamorganshire, absconded from his employer's house, taking with him a large sum of money, together with a number of promissory notes and bills of exchange. He induced a youth who lived near to accompany him. Information was immediately given to the police, and Mr Whittington has offered a reward of £20 for the apprehension of the offender.

Robbery.—A serious robbery, which for dexterity strongly resembles that committed upon the person of Mr. Richard Blakemore, M.P., and upon which we have recently had to comment, was committed on Saturday last, at the Swan public house, in the Broad Sanctuary, Westminster. The landlord discovered the theft, but could not identify the party who had robbed him, as there were about 30 persons round the counter at the time. Information was immediately sent to the police-office, but no clue has been obtained of the thief. The following are the numbers of the stolen notes.—One £100., Liverpool, 24th of May, 1842—No. 98,104; Ten £10 notes—No. 25,077, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 26,076, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 23,175, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 17,407, dated the 23rd of May, 1842; 4, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 20,955, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 20,956, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 24,024, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 25,348, dated the 23rd of May, 1843; 26,075, dated the 23rd of May, 1843. A reward of £20 is offered for the apprehension of the thief Drowned whilst Bathing.—On Wednesday a man, named Robert Cartwright, whilst walking in an intoxicated state along the bank of the river Lea, near Hackney-marshes, sat down on the grass, and soon fell asleep. In about an hour he awoke, and, apparently with the object of refreshing himself with a bath, undressed, and went into the water. In a short time, a man, passing by, saw the clothes on the bank, and, being unable to perceive an owner for them, concluded that some one had been drowned, and at once called for the dr. They were brought without delay, but search was unsuccessful. The body was found. The deceased was a brickmaker, and resided in Hackney.

Poaching on the Thames at Eton.—Two notorious poachers, named Francis and Charles Cartwright (the latter a boy of fifteen) living for the last thirty years by plundering the river by means of unlawful nets) were taken before the Eton bench of magistrates, on Wednesday, charged by Mr. Charles Hester, who is a constable, and one of the Queen's watermen, with fishing in his v ters with a flue-net, between ten and eleven o'clock on the night of Thursday last. The prisoners, who were extremely abusive during their examination, admitted the magistrates' charge, and were committed to prison, upon which they entered into a conspiracy against them, were convicted in the penalty of 40s. each, and costs, amounting to 9ls. more; and, in default of payment, they were committed for the magistrates' warrant, and were lodged in Windsor gaol.

Alleged Death from Ill-Treatment.—On Wednesday, Mr. Baker resumed and concluded an inquest at the King and Queen, Old Kent-road, St. George's-road, Surrey, on the body of Thomas Bowman, aged sixty, two, a retired Custom-house officer, receiving a pension of £4 per month, who, it was alleged, had come by his death in consequence of having been ill-treated and robbed whilst in a state of intoxication. The only evidence adduced on the previous inquiry showed that deceased was labouring under an asthmatical complaint, and that for the last three days prior to his death he had been confined to his bed. On Sunday night last he was removed from one of the beer-houses in the neighbourhood, and went to bed. A short time after wards he called up his landlady and a lodger, as he was very ill: they wished him to send for a surgeon, but he refused saying he should get better. The decease's complaints increased, he had been heard to curse the eye by a person whom he did not name. He continued to get worse, and died at an early hour on Monday morning. There was a slight cut over his right eye. On the coroner being summoned, he said he desired to show the deceased's death had been caused by violence, although several witnesses (including Mr. Overton, the beadle of St. George's, who had instituted rigid inquiries) were examined, and the jury, without the slightest hesitation, unanimously expressed themselves perfectly satisfied, and returned a verdict of "Died from natural causes."

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.

The marriage of Lady Evelyn Leveson Gower, second daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland, and Lord Ramsay, was solemnised at Trentham, on Wednesday week; and so impressive a ceremonial of the kind as to form a celebrity in its rarely our lot to record. The whole of the arrangements were in excellent taste. The incidents of the day, the universal joy that reigned in and around the noble domain, rendered it a scene of delight not to be forgotten. Trentham Hall is a charming picture of rural life in England. By aid of the faithful pencil of Mr. H. L. Pratt, of Stoke-upon-Trent, we are enabled to present our readers with two of the most attractive scenes of the interesting event.

Trentham Hall is beautifully situated on the Trent, belo Newcastle, and is one of the finest residences in the county of Stafford As originally built, the house was a heavy, monotonous pile, of the semi-Dutch order, not unlike a reformed similar to Buckingham House, St. James's Park. It was of brick, with stone pilasters and dressings, and was as innoxentent as it was tasteless A few years since Mr. Barry renovated the entire pile, and remedied its defects. He refaced the exterior, crowned it with balustrades and vases, and enriched the entablature by a cantilever frieze, thus producing a bold imperial mass of buildings, to which he added pavilions, and built a conservatory, in lieu of the old one. We have not space to detail the several additions of suites of apartments, opening into an orangery, ranges of pavilions, or the marble paved terrace, which are among Mr. Barry's tasteful improvements; but we must not omit to mention the effective Belvedere tower, 100 feet high, which, in a genera view of the mansion, marks it out for a considerable distance. Below the terrace we have mentioned, is the "Pleasance," extending to the margin of the lake, through which the river Trent passes, and which covers about 80 acres. Rising from this lake is a small island laid out in terraces, similar to the celebrated Isola Bella, and crowned with picturesque Italian buildings. The entrance to the mansion has also been cleverly treated—it being now beneath glazed arches, and by a rich court of Corinthian architecture, with Mosaic pavement, fountains, conservatories, &c. In our view, the artist has shown the finest points of this princely residence.

Throughout the day of the marriage, the adjoining village of Trentham, as well as the noble demesne, presented a joyous appearance. Early in the morning, twelve of the elder female scholars, and the choir of the church, assembled on the south terrace of the hall and serenaded the lovely bride. Breakfast parties were unremarkable; crowds continued to pour into the village in streams until after ten o'clock. Several of the roads lead through the park, and the avenues on either hand, commanding the walks, or stationed amongst the trees, or on the verdant slopes of the park, [illegible] a picturesque effect. The principal drives were occupied by the coaches of the gentry. The church was filled up with scarlet cloth, and carpeted for the occasion; and in front of the altar were ranged [illegible] Sutherland's school, dressed with pleasing [illegible]. At twenty minutes to twelve, the Archbishop of York entered the [illegible] attended by the Rev. J. E. Edwards, Rev. J. Hutchinson, and the Rev. H. [illegible], chaplains of the Duke of Sutherland. Shortly afterwards the Duke of Sutherland came, the noble Duke leading the beautiful bride to the altar, and in their rear were Lord Blantyre, the Duchess of Sutherland, and the bridal [illegible]. In the train of the bride were the Ladies Elizabeth, Caroline, and Constance Leveson Gower, sisters of the bride, Lady Mary Howard, Miss Lascelles, and Miss [illegible], daughter of the Dean of Lichfield, who acted as bridemaids. [illegible] a magnificent robe of white [illegible] and white [illegible] of the skirt, which was trimmed with orange blossoms. Her Ladyship had a shawl of lace of exquisite manufacture, and a superb veil. Head-dress of white [illegible].

All the bridemaids wore dresses of India muslin over white satin, with [illegible] bonnets trimmed with white roses. The bride is under twenty years of [illegible], and is remarkably handsome, with fine dark hair, and brilliant eyes. Lord Blantyre is also handsome, more than six feet in height, and about twenty-three or twenty-four years of age.

As the noble bridegroom and his lovely bride passed down the aisle of the [illegible] church, they [illegible] the parents, friends, and the clergy then retired. At about two o'clock [illegible] the principal entrance of the hall. The [illegible] the grand staircase; the school girls were stationed on each side [illegible] as the noble pair entered the [illegible] and as they [illegible] to the [illegible] and the loud hurrahs of the crowd; and the best wishes of all. The carriage then passed on to Eccleshall, the Duke of Sutherland's seat, in Shropshire, escorted by a body of the Staffordshire Yeomanry Cavalry. At Eccleshall, the bride and bridegroom were met by a troop of the Shropshire Yeomanry, who escorted them to Lilleshall.

We have not space to detail the rejoicings of the day; there was a sumptuous déjeûner à la fourchette at the Hall, at which was a bride-cake, five feet in circumference, and, with the decorations, three feet high; besides other cakes—in all about 4 cwt. The whole of the establishment, and about 150 tenants and neighbours of the Noble Duke, were also feasted at the Hall; and in the evening there was a ball in the Steward's Room, at which the Duke, Lord Morpeth, Lord Leveson, and several others of the distinguished guests, joined in a country dance. The corridor and conservatories were illuminated, and the effect was magnificent.

THE [illegible] HALL [illegible]

[illegible] MARRIAGE OF [illegible] GOWER AND LORD BLANTYRE.—THE DEPARTURE.

The noble Duke's tenantry dined together at Trentham Inn; altogether the place was a scene of universal conviviality, and "Long as festivity the country round, Knew how to hail the real festivity of mirth."

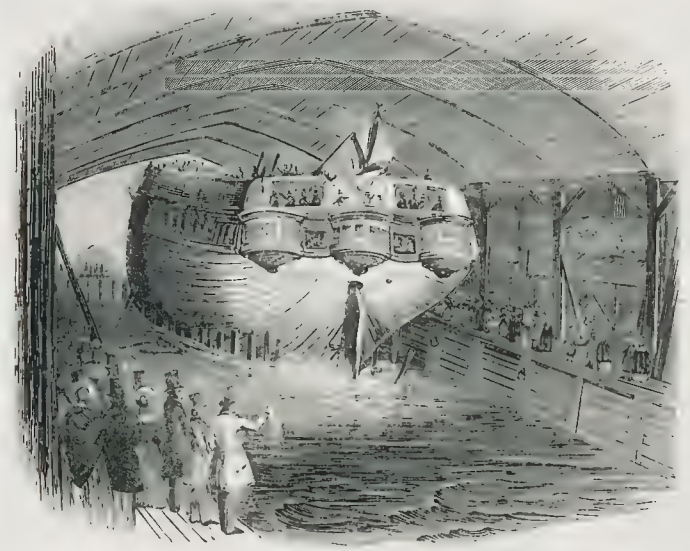
Among the distinguished persons present at the ceremony were—Viscount Morpeth, Lord and Lady Francis Egerton, Viscount Clifden, Dowager Lady Cawdor, Right Hon. T. Grenville, Viscount and Viscountess Leveson, Hon. and Rev. Francis and Lady Elizabeth Grey, Hon. William S. Lascelles, M.P., and Lady Caroline Lascelles, Lord Edward Howard, Mr. Vernon Harcourt, and Miss Georgiana Harcourt &c.



[LAUNCH OF H.M.S. "WORCESTER," AT DEPTFORD.]

LAUNCH OF HER MAJESTY'S SHIP WORCESTER.

This fine ship of war was launched from the Royal Dock-yard, at Deptford, on Tuesday last, and attracted thousands of spectators, both on the banks of, and in numerous steamers and boats on the river.

The launch took place at high water, a quarter before three o'clock, when the gallant vessel floated into the Thames amidst the cheers of the assembled thousands. The "christening" and breaking a bottle of wine upon the bows was performed by the daughter of the captain superintendent of the Dock-yard, Sir John Hill. This vessel is a 50-gun frigate. She has a round stern according to the model of Seppings, and is one of the earliest vessels constructed upon that principle. The Worcester has been many years in building; she was commenced cutting out the frame as early as the year 1816. The keel was laid in October, 1819, and the frame was completed in 1821. The vessel remained in frame till May, 1827, and was completed ready for launching in 1831. The launch, however, did not take place till Tuesday. The dimensions of the frigate are:

	Feet.	Inches.
Length from the front of figure to the afterpart of the steel ..	197	3
To the afterpart of the taffrail	194	0
